Next let us internationalize the military mission. The United States has sent military missions to 16 Latin-American countries to teach their governments how to improve upon even their own superb local talent for shooting. Our Congress is now considering legislation whereby we could send military missions to Syria, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, and other states lying within the jaws of Soviet-British conflict in the Middle East. Can we really believe that more military instruction is what the Middle East needs for its pacification? Let us stop maintaining schools for courses in slaughter. And let us ask Britain and the Soviet Union to stop doing it, too. Let us put an end to the competition between the three greatest powers to see which one of them, by military missions, can add the greatest number of small countries to its list of military satellites.

Then let us internationalize—during times of peace—the world's intelligence services, meaning, frankly, its systems of spies. Always some of the spies lose their supposed invisibility and get apprehended in acts which obviously are violations of international hospitality. Such acts by agents of the Soviet Government have recently been revealed in Canada. They have poisoned the relations between Canada and the Soviet Union.

Presently the United Nations, in its endeavor to outlaw the atomic bomb, will have an inspection service. That service, manned by scientists as well as soldiers, will have to traverse all countries to guard against atomic-bomb manufacture. In doing so, it will be obliged to observe all military preparations and installations whatsoever—everything that any truly legitimate intelligence service of any individual country could want to observe. In those circumstances a national intelligence service will become nothing but a wanton provocation and a deliberate request for hostile reprisals. Let national intelligence yield completely to international inspection.

Then comes the most difficult internationalization of all, which yet must be accomplished if the three greatest powers are to put a sense of peace into the United Nations and get the fact of peace out of it.

Journalists who reported the Disarmament Conference of the League of Nations at Geneva in the early thirties cannot but remember the thrilling appeals of Maxim Litvinov, when, time after time, he dared France and Britain and the United States to accept, along with the Soviet Union, the principle of complete disarmament. Our delegates to the UN might now well say:

"Gentlemen of the Soviet Union, we recall you to the days of your idealism when you were abandoning the old czaristic special privileges in foreign lands and when you were willing to abandon armaments. Can you not be again what you were then? Or are you, too, now, becoming just another great power?"

The technical difficulties in drafting an international agreement for a universal progressive reduction of armaments are terrific. Nevertheless a failure to attempt to conquer them will inevitably lead to an armaments race. Why not then expand the jurisdiction of the United Nations Committee on Atomic Weapons to include all weapons? Or do we think it is horrible for a city to die in an instant and not horrible for it to die slowly piece by piece?

A retreat from the grabbing of remote bases; a retreat from the manufacturing of "friendly governments"; a retreat from the dispatching of military missions; a retreat from the maintaining of intelligence services; and advance toward the internationalizing of these things; and an advance toward internationalized limits on arms and armed forces; could not these steps be the first rungs on a visible ascending ladder of peace?

Nations cannot go on acting toward one another in the spirit of war and then achieve peace by sitting now and then in the same room. Peace requires faith; but faith without works is dead; and what the world needs is the spectacle of the three greatest powers performing some works of peace, of positive progressing peace.

We do not suggest that the United States perform any of these works by itself. Never again, let us hope, shall we do what we did when we stayed unarmed and Germany and Japan became ready for aggression. We think that our policy should exhibit the olive branch but, if the olive branch is rejected, then the sword ready in its scabbard. We think that our delegates in the next General Assembly of the United Nations should say:

We Americans offer the world such and such and such works of peace. We ask the world to join us in them. In particular, we ask the Soviet Union, the only power that could hope to rival us in strength. And we say to the Soviet delegates:

You have more manpower than we have, much more; but we have more industrial power and more technological skill than you have, much more. Now choose.

Do you want to enlist in a great-power march upward toward less aggression and less capacity for aggression? We welcome you.

Or do you decline to enlist? Do you thus indicate that you still prefer ordeal by battle? Tell us. And we shall know what to do. And the whole world will see that the guilt for what happens will not be ours.

Thus should our delegates speak, we think. Thus should America discover if it must prepare itself for the old and tragic combat of great powers. But thus, first, should our New World offer to lead toward making all the world into a new world.

Proposed Fertilizer Plant at Mobile, Ala.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD D. COOLEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, for consideration of the Members of both Houses of Congress, I submit the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., July 3, 1946.

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR HAROLD: This is in reply to your letter of July 2 asking for our views with respect to the construction of a fertilizer plant by the Tennessee Valley Authority at Mobile, Ala., as provided in the recent Senate amendment to the act making appropriations for Government corporations and independent agencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947.

A similar plant was provided for in the appropriation acts in the 1945 and earlier fiscal years but was omitted in the 1946 fiscal year. It is our understanding that the plant was not constructed because of wartime construction controls and material shortages. We are not entirely clear as to whether the proposed plant is intended as an expansion of the experimental and pilot plant work now carried on by the Tennessee Valley Authority with respect to phosphatic fertilizers or as a commercial plant.

As a matter of policy the Department believes that the Government should participate in experimental and pilot-plant operation but that construction and operation of commercial plants should be by private enterprise, including farmer cooperatives, in all cases where such construction and operation will result in needed fertilizers being available at prices in keeping with efficient operation. We feel that the construction and operation of plants by the Government for commercial production of fertilizer should be as a last resort to get the job done.

The very great need for increased quantities of fertilizer to meet the present emergency is well known, as is the prospect for substantial increases in their use in the future, particularly in the Middle West. While the proposed plant would not be completed in time to aid in meeting the present emergency, it could have a part in meeting our long-term need. Production for the areas of increased use could be provided by establishing plants in the area of increased use, or by the manufacture of concentrated materials near Florida or western phosphate rock deposits. It is the Department's view that such plants should be located so that P_2O_5 can be used by farmers at the lowest possible cost. Such a determination of location would involve careful study of the area of need, available sources of raw materials, production costs, transportation costs, etc. We have not attempted to determine the feasibility of the construction of the Mobile plant based on these considerations and, without additional study, would not be in position to intelligently support or oppose the inclusion of the proposed authorization.

Sincerely yours,

CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Secretary.

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., July 3, 1946.

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COOLEY: In response to your inquiry regarding the item of $3,000,000 in the Government corporations appropriation bill for start of construction of a Government fertilizer plant at Mobile, Ala., the National Grange believes that the item should be deleted from the bill.

The Grange has not taken a position either in favor of or in opposition to that particular plant, but we believe it should receive careful study by Congress before a decision is made. Congress has not had the opportunity for such a study.

A fertilizer committee of the Grange is studying the entire problem of Government manufacture and distribution of fertilizer. The circumstances surrounding inclusion of the $3,000,000 item in the bill do not appear to us to be in conformity with sound legislative procedure.

Our opinion that the item should be deleted is based on the belief that Congress should not be asked to act hastily and without adequate hearings both as to advisability of such policy and the necessity for such a plant.

The Grange, as well as other interested groups, received no notice of hearings and, consequently, had no opportunity to appear before a committee of either House. We believe that all interested groups are entitled to be heard and the evidence weighed carefully before action is taken.

The Senate, we understand, passed the bill without a reading and under circumstances which made consideration of the Mobile plant item practically impossible. We hope that Congress will defer action on this item until the entire matter can be studied carefully.

Passage of the bill with the fertilizer plant appropriation included would, we believe, establish a precedent which might prejudice further consideration of the important principle involved.

Sincerely yours,

ALBERT S. GOSS,
Master, the National Grange.

Rent Controls Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, the unexpected veto of the price-control legislation by President Truman on Saturday, June 29, has resulted in one problem which should have had and which still needs emergency action. By reason of the veto all price controls expired at midnight on June 30. This left the country without any price ceilings on rents for dwellings and homes. There were, I believe, two notable exceptions. One exception was in the District of Columbia, which has its own price-control law. Congress had already acted to extend this for another year a few days ago. Very fortunately, President Truman neglected to veto this rent-control law.

As you know, New York State, under the able and forceful leadership of the Honorable Thomas E. Dewey, its governor, enacted a State rent-control law months ago, looking forward to the time when the Federal Government would abolish rent controls. Governor Dewey, as events the last 2 or 3 days have shown, used remarkable foresight and good judgment in protecting the people of New York State against the very irresponsible contingency now created.

Practically every State finds itself without any adequate rent controls and, in many instances, no rent controls at all. They also have, without exception, a shortage of housing facilities which makes it imperative that the American people be protected in this crisis and emergency.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I introduced legislation which would meet the situation and solve the rent-control problem by extending the Rent Control Act for another year. This legislation is known as House Joint Resolution 375 and reads as follows:

House Joint Resolution 375

Joint resolution extending the rent-control provisions of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, until June 30, 1947

Resolved, etc., That section 1 (b) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) The provisions of this act, and all regulations, orders, price schedules, and requirements thereunder, shall terminate with respect to the establishment and maintenance of maximum rents, on June 30, 1947, or upon the date of a proclamation by the President, or upon the date specified in a concurrent resolution by the two Houses of the Congress, declaring that the further continuance of the authority granted by this act is not necessary in the interest of the national defense and security, whichever date is the earlier; except that as to offenses committed or rights or liabilities incurred, prior to such termination date, the provisions of this act and such regulations, orders, price schedules, and requirements shall be treated as still remaining in force for the purpose of sustaining any proper suit, action, or prosecution with respect to any such right, liability, or offense."

SEC. 2. (a) (1) The provisions of this joint resolution shall take effect as of June 30, 1946, and (2) all regulations, orders, price schedules, and requirements under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, and the Stabilization Act of 1942, as amended, with respect to the establishment and maintenance of maximum rents which were in effect on June 30, 1946, shall be in effect in the same manner and to the same extent as if this joint resolution had been enacted on June 30, 1946, and (3) any proceeding, petition, application, or protest which was pending under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, or the Stabilization Act of 1942, as amended, on June 30, 1946, with respect to the establishment and maintenance of maximum rents shall be proceeded with and shall be acted on in the same manner and to the same extent as if this joint resolution had been enacted on June 30, 1946.

(b) In any case in which either of such acts or any regulation, order, or requirement thereunder prescribes any period of time within which any act is required or permitted to be done with respect to the establishment and maintenance of maximum rents, and such period had commenced but had not expired on June 30, 1946, such period of time is hereby extended for a number of days equal to the number of days from July 1, 1946, to the date of enactment of this joint resolution, both inclusive.

(c) No act or transaction with respect to the establishment and maintenance of maximum rents occurring subsequent to June 30, 1946, and prior to the date of enactment of this joint resolution shall be deemed to be a violation of either of such acts or of any regulation, order, price schedule, or requirement thereunder.

Many people, Mr. Speaker, recognize that legislation of this character ought to be enacted. While they thoroughly agreed with President Truman's action in abolishing wartime price controls, they feel that he went too far when he included rents in his veto message.

I hope that this bill of mine, or some similar legislation, is enacted immediately by Congress. I was surprised when my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE], spokesman for the President on this subject, blocked Representative WOLCOTT'S efforts to have enacted a resolution similar to mine, on Monday, July 1, immediately after the House had adopted the 20-day continuing resolution. Furthermore, it surprised me even more to learn today that the President's representatives in the other body had blocked similar legislation there. We cannot permit the President to continue to override the popular demand for protection against exorbitant rentals.

Stefan and the Guerrillas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in the Washington Evening Star, of March 11, 1946, regarding our distinguished colleague, Mr. STEFAN, of Nebraska, which pays tribute to the invaluable service which he rendered in the struggle for the liberation of the Philippines:

STEFAN AND THE GUERRILLAS

The award of the Philippine Military Merit Medal to Representative KARL STEFAN, of Nebraska, brings to light another fascinating episode in the thrilling story of behind-the-lines guerrilla warfare which helped to pave the way for American recapture of the Philippines.

Mr. STEFAN'S part in the story began more than 40 years ago when he forsook his telegraph operator's key in Omaha to answer his country's call for telegraphers to volunteer for service during the Philippine Insurrection. During 2 years of duty he not only taught many members of the Philippine Constabulary how to be telegraphers, but laid the basis for lasting friendships which were to pay high dividends. He renewed these friendships in 1935 when he attended the inauguration in Manila of the commonwealth government. Mr. STEFAN and his old comrades even then feared the day might come when they would have to stick together for more than fellowship reasons—in mind if not in person. They pledged themselves to keep in touch with one another, through thick and thin.

When the Japanese invaded their homeland in December of 1941, Mr. STEFAN'S Filipino comrades were cheered to receive the first of what was to be a long series of radio messages of encouragement from their congressional champion and friend. He urged them, after the fall of Bataan and Corregidor, to continue the fight behind the enemy lines, to organize guerrilla bands that would harass the Japs at every turn. And he had the satisfaction of receiving through underground channels not only acknowledgment of his broadcasts but word of guerrilla actions that told him that his Filipino associates were keeping their part of the pledge. The presentation of the medal on behalf of President Osmena was more than a gesture, therefore. It was a heartfelt token of appreciation by the Filipino people for Mr. STEFAN'S inspirational leadership in their darkest hours. He, too, had kept his pledge.

Veterans of Foreign Wars To Support OPA Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a letter addressed to me from the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of Massachusetts, who voted on June 22 at Lawrence, Mass., to support OPA controls.

MAJOR JOHN J. LEONARD POST, NO. 70,
VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
Springfield, Mass., July 1, 1946.

Congressman THOMAS J. LANE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: The Veterans of Foreign Wars, in convention assembled, June 22, at Lawrence, voted unanimously the support of OPA controls.

Many of our Congressmen and Senators submitted to President Truman an emasculated bill, which in its form would have meant no controls. As of today controls of essentials and other goods no longer exist. Not only the veterans, but their families and all other Americans will suffer as a result of the congressional action last week.

We have over 65,000 members in Massachusetts and we can no longer ignore the actions of our Congress in permitting controls to be outlawed and penalizing not only the veterans but their families and others. We ask that you, as our Congressman in Massachusetts, take steps at once to put controls back on the books. From the veterans' angle, those receiving pensions, those who are in training programs, those attending schools and colleges, the widows and the orphans of veterans will suffer because of the removal of controls.

We urge you to act now because delay is dangerous.

I would appreciate hearing from you about this important legislation.

Most sincerely,
JULIUS MELTZER,
Coordinator, Veterans of Foreign Wars,
Department of Massachusetts.

Our Policy on Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DUDLEY G. ROE
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. ROE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter written by the Nuttle Lumber & Coal Co., of Denton, Md., to all their customers as a result of the death of the OPA.

The letter follows:

NUTTLE LUMBER & COAL CO.,
Denton, Md., July 1, 1946.

OUR POLICY ON PRICES

DEAR CUSTOMER: We do not propose to raise our prices now that OPA is off, only where rising costs force us to do so. Nor do we at any time propose to increase our mark-up.

We propose to do everything in our power to help production, fight rising prices, and use every device to produce a better home at a lower cost. However, we feel that prices will increase to us and to you, then gradually stabilize.

We hope the removal of OPA or the subsequent renewal of OPA will do two things:

1. Place manufacturers in a position to produce badly needed products,

2. Give manufacturers and retailers a realistic pricing policy to prevent the majority of our products moving through the black market.

A policy of this kind would allow manufacturers in our industry to make flooring, finish moldings, windows, doors, and so forth, again so that we could start a building with the assurance that it can be finished with a minimum of difficulties.

A policy such as this would stop black-market operations and let materials move through normal channels. We could have sold our entire production at black-market prices, but we have always refused to take 1 cent more than what we believed to be ceiling prices.

The Government has many men hired in every department in times like this to fill every newspaper, radio programs, and every other method to urge you to write your Congressmen and Senators favoring President Truman's veto. Their jobs are at stake, as are those of the many thousand OPA workers, all of whom are paid by you at great unnecessary cost. Do not be fooled by this propaganda.

We believe that Congress should take no further actions on OPA, or reenact a realistic price-control bill that will give you butter, white shirts, clothes, autos, radios, and all the other products you are accustomed to.

We urge you to buy conservatively, until production can be adjusted to meet demand.

Respectfully yours,
ELIAS W. NUTTLE,
Manager.

Farmers Pioneering in Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I recently read an article in the spring issue of Plane Talk magazine, published by the Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corp., entitled "How Planes Serve the Farmer." The article was written by Mr. Harry Woodhead, president of the Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corp.

Farmers are utilizing the airplane for crop dusting, seeding, fire control, cattle round-ups, and many odd jobs, as well as for transport.

Because they have pointed the way to an everyday practical use of small planes, I insert in full the article written by Mr. Woodhead.

It follows:

HOW PLANES SERVE THE FARMERS

The American farmer, in his usual alert way, has been among the first to realize how useful the airplane can be in all sorts of daily chores.

Proof of this exists in the organization called the Flying Farmers, which started in Oklahoma only 2 years ago, and is now expanding rapidly. We haven't heard yet of any organization of flying doctors, or flying bankers, or flying plumbers, using the airplane in their everyday business.

It is probably natural that the Flying Farmers idea originated in the Southwest—where distances are vast. The Flying Farmers in Oklahoma use planes for supervising cattle round-ups, hunting for strays, chasing coyotes—which they actually shoot from low flying planes—and for such odd chores as looking for fence breaks. Then, of course, a plane is wonderful for making a fast trip into town to pick up a spare part for the tractor, without waste of time, or for just going visiting.

One leader in the Oklahoma group, a remarkable chap named Heinie Bomhoff, has taught 200 of his neighbors to be pilots; and the organization has grown so fast that over 200 Oklahoma farmers and their wives attended its second annual convention last August in Stillwater, where Oklahoma's A. and M. College is located.

Farmers are beginning to discover all the ways a small plane can be useful in farm operations. The Civil Aeronautics Administration reports great success, for instance, in using the airplane for seeding a large variety of crops. The crops include all kinds of range grasses, as well as wheat, oats, alfalfa, and rice. The story of how success was obtained in sowing rice from the air is typical.

In early experiments in aerial planting, dry rice was sown on fields already flooded. But the rice seed floated and drifted on the water, and finally sank in unsatisfactory bunches—too much here, too little there. Then experiments were made in soaking the seed—almost to the point of germination—before sowing from the plane. This works perfectly. The soaked seed sinks quickly without drifting. An even sowing results. Equally important, the birds do not have a holiday feast.

Today more than 80 percent of California's rice lands—some 130,000 acres—are being farmed from the air. Planes are used even after the crop comes up to scare off ducks and geese that might feed on the young plants—a kind of flying scarecrow.

Seeding of grasses over thousands of acres of grazing land is reported to be similarly successful. Once, when land was grazed to depletion or burned over, it was considered almost lost—especially in rugged regions where use of ground machinery was impractical. Today the aerial seeder can sow vast areas with grass seed in a few hours, completing the operation before a scheduled or forecasted rain.

One of the most important farming uses of the plane we've heard about in recent years has been in the protection of crops from pests. In this job, the speed of the plane is of all-out importance. When a pest appears, the loss of a few days in its control can mean disaster. But an airplane, covering 300 to 500 acres a day with one of the modern insecticides, can destory the menace almost overnight.

One of the earliest uses of the airplane for pest control was in the cotton lands of the South, where the boll weevil has created economic headaches for generations. Today airplanes are helping control insect pests in citrus groves, in fruit orchards, in truck farm areas. For some truck farmers, aerial spraying of dust seems to prove more effective than any other method of applying it, since the plane propeller gives a whirling motion to the poisonous dust so that it reaches down to the under side of the plant leaves, where most of the insects feed.

One of our important crops is timber, and one of its greatest hazards is fire. In the past, it could take several days for a fire crew to work through dense forest lands after a fire was discovered. By then the blaze could be wholly out of control. Today we hear of fire fighters being parachuted into the area immediately. We are probably nearing the time when fire-fighting chemicals can be sprayed directly from an airplane.

There is another special use for planes in rural life on which one cannot put a dollar value—the mission of rescue. Dreadful accidents can happen on the farm, just as in all industry where machines are used daily. Unfortunately, many rural communities do not yet have adequate hospital facilities.

Here the airplane can offer in peace the service that the L–5 flying jeep rendered in war.

These Stinson-built planes were good for every conceivable kind of liaison work—scouting enemy positions, acting as eyes for our own Artillery and Tank Corps, carrying documents to headquarters, surveying telephone lines to locate broken wires, rushing emergency equipment to a difficult spot. They even flew off aircraft carriers.

They could take off and land in the smallest kind of clearing. They rescued men from spots where no other plane could go. They saved thousands of American lives by rushing hurt men to adequate medical care before complications like peritonitis could destroy their chances for life. The time is here when every farming community without good hospital facilities should have a plane available as an emergency ambulance.

Some of the airplane jobs we have mentioned here require skilled piloting. Crop dusting and seed sowing, for instance, are no work for amateurs. But there is plenty of talent in rural areas for such specialized work. A lot of the 300,000 pilots in the Air Forces were farm boys, and to them the air maneuvers needed for dusting crops will be practical. On the other hand, ordinary short-distance flying in good weather is a simple enough job, with the planes we have now.

Not too many years ago the fellow who took flying lessons was supposed to be joining the Legion of Death. Modern plane design has changed that. The personal plane today is something a man of any age can learn to fly in a short time. The talk about flying being a young man's game applies only to military requirements—and not to piloting personal aircraft. I know men of more than 60 who are flying their own planes today. It's not years, but alertness and good judgment, that qualify a man for his license.

Cost of flying is a subject that concerns anyone who starts wondering whether he should have a plane of his own. You have heard it said that it's not the first cost but the upkeep that hurts. But here the farmer has an advantage over almost all other citizens. If he has a barn available, he may not need to pay for hangar space. He has enough land to maintain a flight strip of his own if he wants it, though some farmers may prefer community landing strips. A level mowed field makes an entirely adequate flight strip for some of the personal planes being made today.

Our new Stinson plane, for instance, the Voyager 150, travels at 125 miles an hour, but stalls, lands, at a speed of only 51. And it's easier to fly than some of the planes that land at 40. Full load take-offs can be made in 550 feet, and landings at gross weight require no more than 230 feet landing run.

When it comes to the item of fuel, oil, and replacements for a personal plane, the cost is very little if any more than for an automobile of comparable price.

The Voyager 150, for instance will fly for 8 cents per air-mile (based on 250 hours per year utilization. It carries 944 pounds of useful load. This means that a farmer-pilot can take with him three adult persons and some baggage or cargo in a Voyager, or if he's alone he can carry 500 pounds of produce, equipment, or supplies. As a family plane in which four adults can ride comfortably, the 8 cents per mile operation cost breaks down to 2 cents a passenger, cheaper than the passenger cost in any two-place plane. This explains why, mile for mile and dollar for dollar, the Voyager 150 outoperates the smaller planes.

The two-place plane that some farmers are using will not carry a Pennsylvania farmer and his family to St. Petersburg for a winter's vacation, or to a national park in the West on a summer's jaunt. But the Voyager 150 will even do that. Its incomparable over-all utility, as a plane in the medium price field, is one reason why we believe this plane is due to prove one of the best investments a responsible farmer can make.

Many farmers, for various reasons, may not wish to own planes of their own. But lots of these will club together in the ownership of planes which they will use by turns—just as many of them go partners in acquiring threshers and reapers and binders and other expensive farm machinery.

Now it isn't just the personal plane alone that promises to make revolutionary changes in many a farmer's way of life. The air liner, and especially the air freight service we are now developing, are also going to play their part.

Consolidated Vultee recently used one of its experimental planes in a series of transcontinental flights carrying farm produce from the west coast to the East. One object was to learn how low a goal we could shoot for in air freight rates.

We were vastly encouraged by what we learned. For one thing, full pay loads from East to West included items as varied as automobiles, grand pianos, and kitchen stoves. Once we moved the household furniture of several families simultaneously.

Flights carrying produce east from California gave us discoveries that seem of special interest to farmers. One air shipper of California's rich Salinas Valley, for instance, found that housewives would gladly pay an average of 10 cents a pound more for the fresh produce rushed to market by airplane.

When prices went above this premium, there was sales resistance, but the produce still sold. Air-borne grapes, for instance, brought 44½ cents in a city where the prevailing price was 27 cents a pound. Strawberries brought 59 cents, compared to a prevailing price of 29 cents a quart. You will note that these are hundred percent premiums. Cantaloupes were sold at 29 cents a pound instead of the usual 9½ cents—a 200-percent premium. OPA granted special price ceilings for the air-borne foods.

Two facts seem evident in this. First, in every great metropolitan center there is an important core of people with incomes far above the average—and these people are the most profitable market any producer can reach. Second, these buyers are willing to pay premiums for fresh luxury and out-of-season produce which run far above the cost which air transport adds to the freight bill.

Probably the most important factor in the prices obtained was the fact that out-of-season produce was offered at retail within 24 hours after being picked in the far West or deep South.

In these test flights, carrying produce, the shipper used the lowest published air freight tariff for his cost computations—26 cents a ton-mile. But that is a starting figure. We firmly believe, in the aircraft industry, that air freight rates before long can profitably come down as low as 10 cents a ton-mile or less.

For example, we have a new passenger plane in the works at Consolidated Vultee, the model 37, which will carry over 200 passengers—in deluxe comfort—at a direct flying cost of only a little over 4 cents a ton-mile. Now, if we leave all the luxurious furnishings and equipment out of this deluxe passenger plane to make a cargo plane version, we double its pay-load capacity. That gets the direct flying cost for freight down somewhere between 2 and 3 cents a ton-mile. Even if we tripled that, to allow for all the indirect costs, we are on our way to rates below 10 cents for the ton-mile cost.

At that rate, some producers should even be able to ship lettuce profitably. Those big producers who buy and operate their own airplane fleets direct to market will get rates down even further.

Farmers in the east will naturally ask how they are to benefit, if the airplane puts California and Florida produce within a few hours of the east-coast markets. Is this going to take away some of their present income? The reverse will probably be true. The chances are that the American market for fresh produce is going to be vastly stimulated.

Millions of people in this country do not know what it is, for instance, to eat sweet corn on the day it is picked—though most farm families think corn even 2 hours old has lost its freshness.

Fifty percent of the total ton-miles of our national traffic in fresh produce goes just to carry what is consumed in New England and three other Atlantic States—New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. New York alone consumes 800 carloads of so-called fresh food products every day—enough carloads to make a train 7 miles long. Clearly, the market in the Eastern States for fresh produce is so huge that imports from California and Florida will always be only a dribble by comparison.

Such imports, far from damaging the market for fresh produce that originates nearby, can only serve to build consumer demand for premium produce of the nearby area.

Air transport should help the eastern farmer benefit from this demand even more heavily than it will aid the western grower. Short-haul air lines, for instance, could put corn picked at dawn in Pennsylvania onto New York's dinner tables that noon. Air delivery may mean, eventually, that milk can be rushed swiftly to market at a fraction of the processing cost now required. In some instances, as in bringing the farmer a premium for day-old eggs, air transport should increase his gross income. In others, as in decreasing chances for spoilage, air transport should cut his costs and increase his net.

Most important of all, perhaps, is the fact that cheap air freight is going to give every farmer, no matter where he is located, a wide choice of markets that he previously could never reach by railroad; and that choice of market will automatically give many farmers a wider choice in the crops they raise. Forward looking farmers will see many an opportunity to step out in front and leave competition behind.

There has been pending in Congress a bill to appropriate a total of $650,000,000 over a 10-year period as Federal aid for our Nation's airports. All sorts of airports will be eligible, from the largest class V airfields down to the small class I ports and the airstrips used for personal planes. As pointed out in the national airport plan submitted to Congress by the Secretary of Commerce, our biggest present need is for many more landing fields in rural areas. The Civil Aeronautics Administration estimates we need at least 6,305 airports in this country, to serve our needs in the next 5 or 10 years.

Just as the Federal-aid highways are only incidentally farm-to-market roads, so the 6,300 airports are only a part of the needed airport network. Landing fields right on the farms and at village crossroads are also a need. Plans have been proposed for an ultimate total of 25,000 landing fields across the Nation, and some believe we shall eventually want such fields dotted from border to border, not more than 10 miles apart.

Good airports in our rural areas should produce great economic advantages. They will encourage the decentralization of our industries. They will establish new markets for the farmer, and broaden old ones. They will not only stimulate the growth of our smaller communities, but may encourage new ones to spring up.

We shall see many new local air lines organized, using smaller planes than most transcontinental lines, to link up with the national routes. They will give the farmer the same advantages which only large communities now enjoy in being linked by air travel, air mail, air freight, air express, and fast communications of similar kinds. The Federal Aid Airport Act, called bill No. 3615, is a good first step toward such a program, and is therefore a most important measure.

All industry has an interest in helping to increase the prosperity of our farms. It might be added that both industry and agriculture need a closer understanding.

A recent survey showed, for instance, that farmers' estimates of the profit made by industry during the war years averaged 37 percent. The farmers said they thought a profit of around 15 percent might be fair. The facts are, of course, that American industry even during the war years averaged a lot less than even that—the average was closer to 6 percent. The aircraft industry made a profit during the war of only 1.2 percent on its sales. Most farmers do a lot better—and should.

Businessmen know fully how the well-being of the whole country is linked to the farmer's prosperity. Business realizes, too, that the farmer needs a far greater share of our manufactured products. Too many of our farms, for instance, are still not even electrified. Too few of them have even the common convenience of running water.

We should remedy such matters, and we shall. Consolidated Vultee, for instance, is now manufacturing a number of things, in addition to airplanes, that the farmer needs and wants to make rural life a better life.

We are now using production methods of unexampled efficiency, which Convair developed during the war, to build an entire new line of gas and electric kitchen stoves and ranges. We are planning to manufacture a wide range of farm machinery and implements. We recently entered the manufacture of motor busses, trolley coaches, and specialized engines through purchase of a controlling interest in A. C. F.-Brill Motors Co., and its wholly owned subsidiary, Hall-Scott Motor Car Co.

All of these things play an important role in improving life in rural communities.

It is certain that this air age which we are now entering will effect important changes in our economy and in our way of life, most particularly in rural areas. Predictions are always hazardous. But with due qualification, we may make a few.

First. The air age will perhaps benefit the farm even more than the city. It will bring vast areas of rural land as near to the city, in point of traveling time, as the old suburban areas.

Second. The airplane should help to stop the decline of our farm population. The plane will put the city and distant friends in easy reach of every farmer's family; it will add an entirely new social dimension to rural living. This fact should help keep many young fellows at home. Their sisters will be able to get an order delivered by air express from a Sears Roebuck catalog in 2 days, as fast as most city folks can get a delivery from a local department store. That will help farm life, too.

Third. Flying is going to increase many a farmer's income. The small plane will often enable him to handle operations on a larger acreage. The large transport is going to bring him into closer touch with more profitable markets.

Fourth. The age of air transport is going to introduce many a citizen to the wide world, by putting the whole globe in his easy reach within 40 hours' traveling time. (We used to say 60 hours for flying anywhere in the world, but advances in plane speeds has cut by a third the figures of only a few years ago.)

Fifth. Flying henceforth is going to get steadily cheaper in cost, just as it has steadily been getting safer.

Last, and most important of all, we can see the airplane bringing us a new freedom, freedom of choice and freedom of action. The automobile brought millions of this kind of freedom in a limited way. The airplane increases man's freedom of action manyfold; the automobile by comparison is for stay-at-homers.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter that I have received from Mr. John L. Bubul, chairman, national policies committee, Chamber of Commerce of Fort Wayne, Ind., with reference to the proposed congressional reorganization bill, S. 2177:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF FORT WAYNE,
Fort Wayne, Ind., July 1, 1946.

The Honorable THOMAS J. LANE,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE LANE: A careful study has been made of the proposed congressional reorganization bill, S. 2177, together with the hearings made before your committee.

Not only are we in accord with the bill, but feel that you and all members of your committee are deserving of sincere commendation for the practical and thorough manner in which you have set out to solve a very difficult and important problem.

Certainly if the legislative branch of our Government is to meet its serious responsibility in today's complex society, members of that branch should have every possible tool at their disposal to assist them in forming conclusions, and the procedure under which they are required to operate should be as efficient and effective as possible.

In addition to the provisions contained in the proposed bill, we are making the following recommendations which we would like to see incorporated in this bill.

1. The cloture rule in the Senate should be changed to limit debate through majority vote rather than the two-thirds vote now necessary. Since it takes only a majority vote to pass legislation, why should it take more than a majority vote to bring it out of committee?

2. Seniority should not be the determining factor in the selection of committee chairmen.

We notice that in passing the bill the Senate has deleted section 201 providing for the creation of an Office of Congressional Personnel with employment determined by Civil Service standards rather than by the so-called patronage system now in effect. We believe this is a good provision and would like to see it reinstated in the bil.

Very truly yours,

JOHN L. BUBUL,
Chairman, National Policies Committee.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY L. TOWE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial published in the Herald-News, Passaic, N. J., under date of July 1:

LET'S SHOW IT CAN BE DONE BY HOLDING THE PRICE LINES

When Mr. Truman vetoed the OPA extension bill, it was as if the locomotive engineer jumped from his cab, warning the people in the passenger coaches to use good sense and not get excited.

If he had signed the bill and written a denunciation of it he would have discharged his duty and put himself on the record. The blame for ill consequences—if any came of it—would have been on Congress. Instead, he leaped from control to chaos.

It was a good bill that Mr. Truman vetoed. It continued badly needed rent controls. It kept many price controls and wiped out those which were holding up production of things we need. It provided for the eventual return to free competition without sudden imbalance.

The President ignored the advice of his big four counselors in Congress—Senators BARKLEY, and MCKELLAR, Speaker RAYBURN, and Representative MCCORMACK—men of his own party who assured him it was the best bill Congress could give him. He chose to go along with the Porter-Bowles crowd which believes that Congress may be scared into restoring bureaucratic controls once more if prices go up in a whirl.

It has been said that Mr. Truman has lost control of Congress. Put it the other way: His own party has last control of the President.

Now that the control-extension voted by Congress has been wiped out by the Chief Executive's ill-considered veto, the people themselves have the opportunity and duty of exercising self-imposed controls.

Business and industry, irked by OPA's illogical regulations, now have the chance to prove that American enterprise can function without a strait-jacket.

If they hold the line voluntarily, they will prove their point. If they seize the opportunity to gouge the buying public, Congress will enact stiffer controls.

The merchant's division of the Passaic Chamber of Commerce set the pattern for all our people today when it called upon its members and other businessmen to maintain OPA price ceilings voluntarily and urged shoppers not to buy overpriced merchandise.

It is an opportunity to show that Americans know how to meet a crisis. When the captain falls, the platoon sergeants take over. Now is the time to hold the line!

The acting Governor, Senator Proctor, should call the legislature into special session immediately to assure a continuance of rent controls, such as Governor Dewey gave New York State in anticipation of OPA's termination.

The housing situation, bad as it is, must not be made worse by greedy demands. There must be State-wide controls, preferably with local administration, and with opportunity to appeal local decisions to a State authority.

Inter-American Bar Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HATTON W. SUMNERS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on prior occasions I have called the attention of the Members of the House to the activities of the Inter-American Bar Association, which began its career here in Washington in 1940. The organization, which is made up of the bar associations of the Americas, has been steadily growing in importance and influence. Recently the executive committee of that association, preparing plans for the fifth conference, which is scheduled to be held in Lima, Peru, beginning April 6, 1947, met in Washington. The remarks of the chairman of the executive committee of the Inter-American Bar Association, Mr. George Maurice Morris, of Washington, give some idea as to what this association is doing.

Permission having been granted, I present for printing in the RECORD an address delivered by George Maurice Morris, chairman of the executive committee, Inter-American Bar Association, at the opening session of its meeting at the Pan American Union, Washington, D. C., April 23, 1946:

Dr. Rowe, Sr. Hernando de Lavalle, and gentlemen, it is a real pleasure, as chairman of the executive committee, to greet you and to thank Director General Rowe of the Pan American Union for the cordial welcome he has extended to us. The encouragement received from this union has inspired and aided us greatly in our pursuit of our purposes.

As you will recall, the functions and purposes of the Inter-American Bar Association include providing a forum for exchanges of the views of the members of the bar organizations of the Americas, advancing the science of jurisprudence—particularly the study of comparative law—and promoting the uniformity of commercial legislation.

Following these objectives, we, as members of the executive committee, have met together today to prepare for and fix the date for our fifth conference. That affair will be held in Lima, Peru, with the Colegio de Abogados de Lima as the host association. We are honored in having with us the president of that association, Dr. Hernando de Lavalle, a distinguished leader of the bar in his own country, a man of wide practical experience and learning, whose father and brother have served with distinction on the Supreme Court of Peru. We are also pleased to have Dr. Luis Echecopar Garcia, a professor of law and an active practitioner, participate in this meeting as the representative of Dr. Enrique Garcia Sayan, the distinguished Minister of Foreign Affairs of Peru.

Before embarking on the work of this meeting, it is appropriate to review briefly some of the accomplishments of this young organization which was founded in Washington on May 16, 1940, at the close of the Eighth Scientific Congress.

The first conference was held in Habana, Cuba, in March of 1941. At that conference, among significant actions were passage of a resolution that an academy of comparative and international law should be established in Habana, and a resolution recommending the resolving of the differences and the harmonizing of the laws of the countries of the Americas respecting immigration, naturalization, and citizenship.

The resolution regarding the academy has resulted in the establishment of that academy. It held its first session a year ago in Habana and is expected to hold a second session in February of 1947. The resolution regarding immigration, naturalization, and citizenship laws has resulted in measures for simplification of the requirements for travel in this hemisphere and particularly those for travel by air.

The second conference held in Rio de Janeiro in August 1943, the third conference held in Mexico City in August 1944, and the fourth conference in Santiago, Chile, October 1945, have all resulted in actions which have been in furtherance of our association's objects and purposes. For example, a committee, under the leadership of the Barra Mexicana, is making gratifying progress in preparing the text for a dictionary of Spanish-English, English-Spanish legal terms. A group canvassing Portuguese-English, English-Portuguese legal terms for the same purpose is in the process of organization. Work is also underway in the field of legal education promoting the interchange of students and professors among the universities of our respective countries. In the field of penal law we are moving toward internationally uniform codes and cooperation in the apprehension and return of fugitives from justice. The cause of avoidance of double taxation on business enterprises carrying on activities in various American countries has been advanced at an accelerated pace as a result of our recommendations.

We are confident, Dr. Lavalle, that at the fifth conference in your beautiful city of Lima, the steady progress in attaining the objects and purposes of our association will receive further impetus. In addition, we believe that understanding and friendship, which arise among men who work together for common goals and which have proved to be such delightful and impressive features of our endeavors, will be further advanced. We are happy to have you and Mr. Echecopar with us in Washington, and we look forward to being with you in Lima.

Filipino Naturalization Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, July 2, President Truman signed the Filipino naturalization bill. I recall when this bill was first taken up on the House floor in April 1945. We had just heard Resident Commissioner ROMULO deliver a most powerful address on Filipino loyalty to the United States, and I then moved for unanimous approval of the bill as our tribute to the worthy Filipino spokesman in Congress. I am proud to have made such a motion, because the loyalty of the Filipinos to America in the recent war is a highlight in our national history which does honor to both America and to the Philippines. General ROMULO worked indefatigably in Congress for the passage of this naturalization bill, and also recently for the Military Assistance Act, and credit must be given where credit is due. Under unanimous consent of the House, I insert General ROMULO's statement and also the statement of Antonio Gonzalez, president of the Filipino intercommunity organizations of the Western States, on the signing of the naturalization bill:

GENERAL ROMULO'S STATEMENT

Before leaving Washington for Manila, I conferred with congressional leaders of both Houses, and had the assurance that H. R. 776, in its new form and improved at my specific request, would be passed by Congress before June 28. Both floor leader, JOHN W. MCCORMACK, and House rules chairman, A. J. SABATH, as well as minority leader, JOSEPH W. MARTIN, promised me the bill would be given priority.

I wish to thank them and also the members of the conference committee and the members of the Senate and House Committees on Immigration for finally approving the bill. I also wish to thank Senators JOSEPH H. BALL, WARREN G. MAGNUSON, SHERIDAN DOWNEY, CARL HAYDEN, CLYDE R. HOEY, Representatives DAN R. MCGEHEE, HARRY R. SHEPPARD, chairman of the House Immigration Committee JOHN LESINSKI, and Delegate JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON of Hawaii for their valuable cooperation. To Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL, chairman of the Senate Immigration Committee, and Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND, I wish to express my appreciation for their expeditious handling of the bill.

It is gratifying that the Filipinos should have been given by congressional enactment this new recognition not only of their war role, but also of their civic worth as citizens of this great country. As an added evidence of America's friendship for us, it forges another link that welds us closer as allies to the American people. My congratulations to all my countrymen in the United States and Hawaii, and it is my hope that they will live up to their new responsibilities. I am happy that as their Resident Commissioner I was able to help in the enactment of this law.

STATEMENT OF MR. ANTONIO GONZALEZ

The law recently enacted by Congress and signed by the President authorizing the admission of a quota of Filipino immigrants and naturalization of Filipino residents in this country and Hawaii has removed one of the most controversial and thorny spots in American-Filipino relations.

Two generations of Filipinos born under the American flag and nurtured in American institutions and traditions welcome the long-delayed grant of justice as recognition at long last of Filipino manhood and of its loyalty to America.

This particular naturalization law does not only remove for all time the stigma of inferiority attached to Filipino nationality and race, but with the rights and privileges citizenship affords, the Filipinos in this country can rest comparatively secure in their "pursuit of happiness."

As president of the Filipino Inter-Community Organizations of the Western States, I must thank Resident Commissioner ROMULO for his efforts in pushing this bill through. I saw him in action in Congress while working for this bill, and I can say its enactment is due to his aggressiveness and to the friendship and respect that Members of Congress of both Houses have for him. In behalf of FICOWS I extend to him our heartfelt appreciation, for he has worked sincerely and effectively for us Filipinos in the United States and Hawaii.

Democracy's Child Is 21

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN B. SULLIVAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, former Senator Hawes, also a former Member of this House, who wrote the first Philippine Independence Act, and has represented the Philippine Commonwealth in a legal capacity, has requested me to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a brief historical sketch of Philippine relations and what is before the new Republic. As July 4 is the boundary line I take the liberty of making this request now so that part of the history of our relations with these brave people may be part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

DEMOCRACY'S CHILD IS 21

(By Paul V. McNutt, United States High Commissioner to the Philippines)

(On July 4 the Philippines become independent. But like a father whose son has come of age the United States must stand back of its offspring ready to help, for this son has been gravely injured.)

July 4 has been celebrated for 47 years in the Philippine Islands as American Independence Day. This year, after a Japanese-inspired interruption of 3 years, July 4 will be celebrated again, not as American Independence Day but as Philippine Independence Day. It will be celebrated in every hamlet, every barrio, every village, and every city of the far-flung islands. In Manila it will be celebrated as the most historic day in the several thousands of years during which those islands have been inhabited by the short, stocky, brown-skinned people of the Malayan race.

It will be a day of history, not only for the Philippines but for the United States. In a larger sense it will be a day of history for the entire world.

On that day a new nation will be born to the community of free peoples. It will not be a nation spawned in violence or revolt, nor one resurrected by a treaty between victorious powers who have liberated it by war. It will be an entirely new nation—given birth by the free will of its former sovereign, the United States. It will be the culmination of a studied and irregular pattern of preparation which was started almost immediately after the Philippines were acquired from Spain in 1898.

Never has a nation started off its existence under more dramatic and difficult conditions. This is a nation destroyed by war, its economy paralyzed by destruction. The people are completely dislocated, shell-shocked, and confused. An angry and passionate national election has just been held, and the wounds are deep. In some sections armed bands of bold and reckless men defy law and order. Local demagogs feed on long-festering discontents.

Vast numbers of Filipinos, unsettled and displaced by the war, will be unwilling to return to their old jobs in mill and on farm. Filipino veterans, their widows and orphans, will have to be cared for—in large part by the United States Government—for almost 100,000 Filipinos died fighting under our flag. Lack of public health facilities, sanitation, and adequate housing threatens the entire nation today with epidemic.

There are great maladjustments in land ownership. Many millions live in virtual bondage to landlords to whom the tenants are perpetually in debt. Sharp lending practices are common. As a result, there is a great unrest in some of the agricultural areas.

The Philippines still have their collaborationist issue to dispose of. Some 6,000 individuals have been indicted for giving aid and comfort to the enemy during the occupation. A people's court was established a year ago to try collaborationist cases. Its facilities are inadequate. Means of transportation and funds for investigation are limited. But the court is moving slowly to dispose of this explosive situation. Recently a top collaborator, the secretary of national defense in the Japanese puppet cabinet, was sentenced to life imprisonment. Other trials are expected to follow more quickly.

GRAVE DANGERS TO THE REPUBLIC

Add up the economic chaos, the discontent of the farm tenants, the question of the collaborators, and the bitterness that was engendered in the recent national political campaign, and the result is a mountain of responsibilities facing the new Government as it starts out on its adventure in independence.

I believe firmly that the Filipino people and their leaders can solve these problems with our help and friendship. They are resolute and ingenious. Their leaders are patriotic and highly educated. I do not doubt, as I once did, that they can make a success of independence. It is the obligation of the United States to help them over their many obstacles and to set them on the road to true twentieth-century democracy.

The election of Manuel Roxas as the third President of the Commonwealth and automatically as first President of the Philippine Republic, was not unexpected. President-elect Roxas is a comparatively young, vigorous, and imaginative man. Before the war he had been identified in the Philippine public mind with liberalism of the Rooseveltian variety. He had achieved a reputation as an economist and expert in national finance.

It is true that Roxas, who has served in both the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Philippine Congress, occupied a position in the puppet government that was sponsored by the Japanese during the war. But he brought forward evidence purporting to show that he was "spiritual director" of the entire underground resistance movement in the Philippines during the war.

President-elect Roxas was chosen because he represented the inarticulate yearnings of the great mass of the Philippine people for drastic, even radical, action to rehabilitate their shattered land. President Osmena, gallant and gracious gentleman though he is, was too firmly tied to the traditions of political conservation and to the governmental practices of the preindependent period. He was a great and historic figure in the long struggle for independence. His place in the history of his people is secure.

But the Philippine voters apparently decided that their republic must be headed by a man acquainted with the new economy of the Western World—with economic planning, regional development projects, and government regulation of private enterprise. It was this philosophy that Roxas represented to the people. All other issues and charges, and there were many others involving political bossism, dictatorship, inefficiency, corruption, fascism, and imperialism, apparently made little impression on the electorate.

The new government must solve, first of all, the land problem. Too many people cultivate too few acres, and receive too little compensation. In some provinces 80 percent of the land is farmed by tenants. The average annual cash income of most of these tenant families was, before the war, 20 American dollars. Many had less.

One solution would be the opening up of the vast untouched acres of the national domain. Over 60 percent of the arable land of the Philippines is virgin. But much of this land is far from town and city, cut off by poor communications from the cultural centers. It will take wise and careful planning to solve this problem.

Water power, of which the Philippines has a tremendous potential, must be developed. Electricity, communications, and social aids must be provided to wrest the nation from a state of semifeudalism and assure to the people the benefits of the twentieth century.

For the achievement of these objectives the half billion dollars of war-damage payments which will be made available by the United States Government will be only a bare beginning. It will take many millions more to transform the Philippines into a modern, producing nation capable of competing with the bustling enterprise of China to the west, and perhaps again of Japan to the north.

The land is rich in all the resources needed for a modern and prosperous nation. There are coal, iron, water power, manganese, chrome, timber, fertile soil, and an aggressive and ingenious people. The additional financial aid which they will need to develop these resources can be in the form of a loan from the United States. It could be as much as $1,000,000,000, and it would be a sound investment.

Of course, it is to be expected that such a loan would be based on a very practical specific program which would spread economic benefits among all the sectors of the population. This is a must for the Philippines if the islands are to survive as a democratic nation. The exploitation of the many by the few must be curtailed. The control of government by economic interests must be prevented. Literacy must be widely spread.

The isms of both the Western and the Asiatic worlds have sown their seeds in the Philippines. There is a small but extremely vociferous Communist Party, which, at the moment, is receiving considerable aid, comfort, and attention from the Communist Party of the United States. There are still relics of the prewar Ganaps and Sakdals who model their beliefs after those of the Japanese militarists and nationalists. These groups are racialists and nationalists. They could find fertile ground for their views if democracy failed in the Philippines.

The United States has it within its power to see that this does not happen. We may have to go out of our way more than a little. We may have to support experiments by government which we would call socialistic if they were proposed in this country. But in the end, if we succeed, we will have enabled a democracy-loving people to preserve and extend their freedom and to perpetuate the existence in the Orient of a miniature version of our own way of life.

AN OFFSHOOT OF OUR SYSTEM

For the new nation and government which will be inaugurated on July 4 will be, as it is today, a virtual replica of the United States Government, except for certain modernizations which were introduced to avoid some of the cumbersome aspects of our system of checks and balances. Thus the world will see an offshoot of the American system, a branch bank of western democracy, sprung full grown from 47 years of association with the United States. The United States will retain no strings of sovereignty, no veto power over the internal affairs or foreign policy of the new republic. We will have no greater legal authority in the Philippines after July 4 than we now have in Argentina or Colombia.

But our relations with the Philippines will be much closer than between the United States and any other country. The United States will have as much interest in the welfare of the Philippines, and as great an obligation to uphold that interest, as a parent retains in the welfare of a son turned 21. That interest and obligation will be enhanced by the fact that the Philippines is now a wounded offspring, a convalescent, still not quite ready to fend for himself. The islands could not survive a month without the economic aid of the United States.

The Philippine national economy before the war was, for better or worse, an export economy which supported two-thirds of the population. Ninety percent of the national production, except for locally consumed rice and fish, was for export. Eighty percent of the total exports in 1939, and 90 percent in 1940, went to the United States. The export commodities were foods, raw materials, and their processed products; first of all—sugar, then coconut products (copra and coconut oil), hemp and cordage, tobacco and cigars, pearl buttons and embroidery, gold, chrome, manganese and lumber.

Some copra and some hemp are being exported now, but none of the other major products. Little cash income from exports is reaching the Philippines. The islands are living on the cash bonanza which came in the form of GI money. That money is being quickly dissipated into the hands of traders and middlemen. The hosts of GI's who were once in the Philippines have melted away. Approximately 69,000 will remain as a peacetime force. The millions of United States dollars paid out to Philippine Commonwealth Army soldiers are also disappearing fast into the hands of profiteers. By July 4 the Commonwealth Army will be down to approximately 40,000, and will be transferred to the Philippine Government pay roll.

But that government, now being stripped of the funds which had accrued to its account in the United States before and during the war, faces a long period of deficit financing. The government is budgeting approximately 180,000,000 pesos for essential services and the support of its small armed forces for 1946–47. Its expectable revenue is about 20,000,000 pesos.

There is still considerable cash in the hands of businessmen in the Philippines. The local stock exchange, recently reopened, throbs with activity. Gold stocks are booming, although no gold is being mined and the mines are still flooded, their timbers rotted away. There is a fantastic boom in business marts because there is money, but no productive enterprises to attract investment. The government has recently moved cautiously to see if it can soak up a small portion of the loose cash with an internal bond issue. But until now, businessmen have viewed all production investments with great skepticism. There was much more profit to be gained in buy-and-sell. There was no assurance of future trade relations; hence no inducement to invest money in production or rehabilitation.

The United States Congress, after a 10-month delay, has completed action on two pieces of legislation which will define preferential Philippine-American trade relations after independence, and will provide money for the payment of war damage claims. The first and most important piece of legislation provides for 8 years of reciprocal free trade after July Fourth, and 20 years of gradually decreasing trade preferences after the expiration of free trade.

It also provides for absolute quotas on competitive Philippine products shipped to the United States, such as sugar, oordage, and coconut oil. These quotas are designed both to limit competition with American products in the American market and to encourage the Philippines to branch out into other lines of production designed either to meet local needs or to compete in the world market. A number of new lines of endeavor have been suggested for such a program of diversification—peanut production, rubber and cotton (the Japanese tried unsuccessfully to promote cotton production in the Philippines), and light industries, such as sponge iron (the Philippines have great deposits of iron ore), textiles and ceramics.

Of course, it is not the desire of the United States Government to perpetuate the dominating position held by the sugar industry in the Philippine economy before the war. I believe it unwise for any single industry, especailly an export industry, to be the crux of a nation's economy. However our job in the Philippines today is the rehabilitation of the economy and of the Government in the shortest time possible. The Philippine sugar exports from 1936 to 1940 accounted for 34 percent of the value of all Philippine exports and roughly, 15 percent of the national production of all commodities.

ISLAND MUST SEEK NEW PRODUCTS

The sugar industry probably can come back, at least in part, in a relatively short time. Sugar income will be a shot in the arm, both for the domestic economy and for government revenues. The whole effect of the Trade Act is to encourage diversification in addition to providing for restoration of the prewar economy. The establishment of absolute quota limits and a progressively increasing tariff duty on some commodities, including sugar, beginning in 1954, together with progressively decreasing quotas on other products, including coconut oil, cigars, and tobacco, will require the Philippines to find new economic products beginning that year. If they are wise, they will begin such a process immediately.

The Trade Act is also designed to encourage American capital, especially small capital, to invest in the Philippines by assuring American citizens equal rights with Filipinos in business and in the development of natural resources. This latter provision has been subject to some attack in the Philippines as impinging on Philippine sovereignty, since it requires an amendment to the Philippine Constitution. It is not an ideal requirement to be made on the eve of Philippine independence.

Nevertheless, Congress decided the provision was essential to invite new American capital—the only free capital in the world today—to venture into the Philippines. It was considered especially important to encourage small capital investors, as contrasted with the big established American corporations who already are acclimated to the Philippines, to enter this theater of enterprise.

Inasmuch as this assurance will last only for the 28-year life of the special trade arrangement, there is no infringement of Philippine sovereignty. It was not the desire of Congress to restrict the freedom of the Philippine Government to protect the people of the Philippines against exploitation. The Government will have full freedom to tax and to regulate, and it should and will, I hope, use that power to the maximum to prevent unscrupulous business of any nationality from obtaining a strangle hold on the national economy, or from exploiting the natural resources solely for profit.

Full and proper consideration must be given by private enterprise in the Philippines to the welfare of the Islands and the well-being of the individual workers and producers. Because it was these people, the common folk of the Philippines, who resisted so heroically and fought so desperately for our cause during the war.

By and large, American commodity interests did not try, during the Congressional consideration of this legislation, to prejudice the welfare of the Philippines for their own selfish advantage. American cottonseed-oil producers, tallow producers, linseed-oil interests, cordage interests, and above all, sugar interests—the interests which in the past fought to grant the Philippines their independence for selfish reasons—did not oppose our recent grant of these special trade privileges to the Philippines, provided the domestic interests themselves were protected by quotas.

There was one exception. There was an attempt to reduce the Philippine sugar quota—the amount of sugar which could enter the United States in any 1 year—by 252,000 short tons. The argument was made that the Philippines could not fill their quotas anyway—the Philippines are now actually importing sugar, although before the war they were one of the world's principal producers. The disclosure that this attempt was under way evoked widespread protests from the American press as well as from the Philippines.

Although the actual economic significance of such a cut was debatable, there was no doubt that it was a shameful gesture toward a people who had served us at such tremendous cost to themselves. The only possible beneficiary would have been Cuba, with its unlimited potential for the expansion of its production. But in the end, the cut was restored.

The second part of the United States congressional program for Philippine rehabilitation was the War Damage Act. This provided $400,000,000 for the payment of private claims for war damages; $120,000,000 for the restoration of damaged roads, public buildings, and other Philippine Government property, and $100,000,000 worth of surplus property to be transferred outright to the Philippine Government.

The two acts provide a protective structure within which the Philippine economy can be nourished back to recovery. It is a structure based on private enterprise, guided as it must be by the cooperative efforts of the United States and Philippine Governments.

The War Damage Act sets up a United States War Damage Commission to adjudicate private claims and to guide, in consultation with the Philippine Government, the physical progress of the reconstruction program. The reconstruction, itself, is necessarily based on the continuation of trade relations with the United States and the provision of a market for Philippine products.

Sugar mills, coconut mills, tobacco factories, cordage factories, and farm lands can be restored and rehabilitated only on the assurance that their products can be sold in the United States.

The half billion dollars provided in the War Damage Act can pay for only half of the actual war damage, perhaps even less. For the rest, the Philippines must depend on private capital.

But a nation destroyed by war cannot be rehabilitated with dollars alone. It will require the sweat and sacrifice of the entire Philippine people. It will require the patience and painstaking assistance of the United States through all its agencies. We now have engaged ourselves to a new destiny in the Far East.

Our enlightened Philippine program has become a major tenet of our international policy. The entire Far East is looking to the Philippines as the shining example of enlightened treatment of a dependent people. We cannot afford to disappoint the hopes of a billion people of the Orient, and of the 18,000,000 people of the Philippines who are anxious now to try out their independence. We are thus obligated not only to grant the Philippines their indenpendence but to insure the new nation's economic survival.

STRATEGICALLY VITAL UNITED STATES BASES

We are already committed to the maintenance of naval and air bases in the islands. These are not designed merely for the protection of the Philippines, nor even for the defense of the United States. These bases are expected to be secondary, supporting installations, for supply, repair, and staging activities for all our armed forces in the Far East. The Philippines, with their sufficient hinterland and ready supply of civilian labor, are ideal for such establishments. Neither Guam, nor Okinawa, nor any other of the islands in the far Pacific can provide the facilities for logistics which are available in the Philippines. Committed as we are to long-time occupation of Japan, to a strong policy in Asia, the Philippines are destined to play a major role in our diplomacy in the Orient.

Our military leaders recognize the advantages of strong secondary bases in the Philippines. But today we are faced by the anomaly of maintaining these bases in a foreign land. For the Filipinos, too, it represents a contingency on their independence which to be acceptable must be looked at in the broad framework of a new kind of relationship between peoples. Should the United States ever again be involved in war in the Orient, for instance, the Philippines would be automatically drawn in. This cannot be considered independence in the old meaning of the word. Yet when the true nature of future Philippine-American relations is viewed in perspective, independence takes on a new meaning.

The maintenance of American bases in the Philippines guarantees not only the stability of Philippine independence, but an expanded international stature for that nation. The Philippines now become an instrument for the maintenance of the peace of the Orient and the world, since the first principle of American foreign policy is that American power is to be used for the preservation of peace and the support of democracy wherever possible in the world.

The United States has no intention of using its power to undermine the national integrity of any nation or people. Certainly we have no such intention with regard to the sovereignty of a nation we have ourselves created. That is a new concept in foreign relations. We look to the Philippines not to support our national interests, but to support the cause to which our Nation is committed—the preservation of democratic principles in the world.

To the accomplishment of this purpose all our other interests must be subsidiary. No vested interest, no economic profit to the United States can be weighed in the balance against the value of the objective we have outlined in the Philippines. By keeping that objective paramount, we can gain more for our democratic creed and for our way of life than by any other single activity I can think of, either at home or abroad.

Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, communism is rapidly becoming a far more dangerous threat to our national existence than most people realize because its principles, activities, and purposes are known to so few. This fact has been stated repeatedly; but very seldom are the vicious doctrines of communism, the seeds of which have been so insidiously imbedded in the social order, explained in detail. The time has arrived when it is vitally important that the average citizen of the United States be brought to a realization of the objectives of the Communists and how they expect to accomplish them. Communism is regarded by too many Americans as a temporary phase which will disappear in a few years, something which cannot affect the lives of those outside of Soviet Russia. Unless this complacent attitude is changed, disaster is sure to follow.

There is nothing new about communism. Let the pages of history reveal its record.

As early as the latter part of the twelfth century, there was an organization known as the Confrerie de la Paix, whose communistic principles were much the same as those which exist today. They believed that all wealth should be equally distributed. Their ideas were to undermine, to break down, to level; they began to burn chateaus and cathedrals, and to destroy works of art. But the French Government was too strong and they themselves were destroyed.

The next major movement of a communistic nature was that of the Society of the Illuminati, organized in 1776 by a Bavarian professor named Adam Weishaupt. It was a very carefully worked out and cunningly devised scheme. Only a comparatively few insiders were fully informed as to the designs and policies which were to be carried out. The basic principle was secrecy. The leaders went under assumed names; the society itself was not publicized, and its operations were conducted by devious underground methods. It flourished a few years, then expired.

Three times within a hundred years, communism reared its head in the stricken city of Paris when torn by the desperation of suffering people. Three times in a century, in one country alone, Communist leaders imposed their doctrines at a time when human resistance was susceptible to the duplicity of its votaries who had waited long and patiently for just such an opening. Each time repeated efforts were made to destroy government and substitute their own leadership.

In November 1793, midst the horrors of the French Revolution, atheism reigned supreme; the national convention abolished the Sabbath and the leaders of the Paris Commune declared that they intended to dethrone the king of heaven as well as the monarchs of the earth. Finally, the leaders of the Paris Commune Chaumette, Nomore, and the Prussian anarchist Clootz prevailed upon the national convention to decree the abolition of the Christian religion in France.

But this insurrection was only a prelude to the great Communist rebellion of June 1848. Fearing another demonstration on an extensive scale, the government made all necessary preparations to meet it. Finding the burdens imposed upon the national treasury too heavy to be borne, the government discharged more than 1,000 workmen uselessly employed in Paris at the public expense. The workmen immediately organized for another desperate struggle to bring about the realization in practice of the theory of socialism and communism.

Once more and with even greater terror, communism took its toll when, after the communal elections in Paris on March 26, 1871, which resulted in an overwhelming majority for the revolutionists, the Commune was organized. A reign of terror was inaugurated in Paris and the outrages of 1793 were repeated. The cry of the Socialists and Red Republicans was: "Death to the priests," "Death to the rich," "Death to the property owners."

Aristocrats and wealthy persons were in constant danger of the guillotine, and more than 100,000 fled the city in consternation. Priests were arrested and thrown into prison, churches were sacked and religious services suspended, journals which supported the Versailles Government were oppressed, and several journalists were sentenced to death. The insurgents boldly avowed their determination to march on and disperse the national assembly, overthrow the Thiers government, and establish the universal republic. The most shameful outrages and excesses were perpetrated. More priests and nuns were thrown into prison, and a demand was made on the church for one million francs, the insurgents threatening to kill the archbishop of Paris if the sum was not paid.

A revolutionary attempt led by Lenin and Trotsky was made on the czarist government in Russia in 1905, but it did not succeed.

Following more careful planning, another revolution this time against the liberal Kerensky republic in Russia under the same two leaders succeeded in November 1917, as a result of which Russia came under the control of Communists. Although Communists had succeeded on the earlier occasions just described in overthrowing constituted government, they had not then developed the technique and knowledge of how to retain what they had gained; but by this time they had. From that day to this Russia has remained under Communist control, enhanced and strengthened as a result of World War II. Let us see how this was done.

Immediately upon obtaining control in 1917, there began development of the well-laid plans of the Communist leaders looking to the elimination of all opposition. This newly developed technique involved terrorism beyond any heretofore known. Some idea of just what this means can be gained from a British official document entitled "A Collection of Reports on Bolshevism in Russia," presented to Parliament by command of His Majesty, April 1919. A selection from its pages of individual reports from English officials in Russia to the British Government, is quoted below:

NOVEMBER 10, 1918.

DEAR SIR GEORGE: The following points may interest Mr. Balfour:

1. The Bolsheviki have established a rule of force and oppression unequalled in the history of any autocracy.

2. Themselves the fiercest upholders of the right of free speech, they have suppressed, since coming into power, every newspaper which does not approve their policy. In this respect the Socialist press has suffered most of all. Even the papers of the Internationalis Menesheviks like "Martov" have been suppressed and closed down, and the unfortunate editors thrown into prison or forced to flee for their lives.

3. The right of holding public meetings has been abolished. The vote has been taken away from everyone except the workmen in the factories and the poorer servants, and even amongst the workmen those who dare to vote against the Bolsheviki are marked down by the Bolshevik secret police as counterrevolutionaries, and are fortunate if their worst fate is to be thrown into prison, of which in Russia today it may truly be said, "Many go in but few come out."

4. The worst crimes of the Bolsheviki have been against their Socialist opponents. Of the countless executions which the Bolsheviks have carried out a large percentage has fallen on the heads of Socialists who had waged a lifelong struggle against the old regime, but who are now denounced as counterrevolutionaries merely because they disapprove of the manner in which the Bolsheviks have discredited socialism.

5. The Bolsheviki have abolished even the most primitive forms of justice. Thousands of men and women have been shot without even the mockery of a trial, and thousands more are left to rot in the prisons under conditions to find a parallel to which one must turn to the darkest annals of Indian or Chinese history.

6. The Bolsheviki have restored the barbarous methods of torture. The examination of prisoners frequently takes place with a revolver at the unfortunate prisoner's head.

7. The Bolsheviki have established the odious practice of taking hostages. Still worse, they have struck at their political opponents through their women folk. When recently a long list of hostages was published in Petrograd, the Bolsheviki seized the wives of those men whom they could not find and threw them into prison until their husbands should give themselves up.

8. The Bolsheviki who destroyed the Russian Army, and who have always been the avowed opponents of militarism, have forcibly mobilized officers who do not share their political views, but whose technical knowledge is indispensable, and by the threat of immediate execution have forced them to fight against their fellow countrymen in a civil war of unparalleled horror.

9. The avowed ambition of Lenin is to create civil warfare throughout Europe. Every speech of Lenin's is a denunciation of constitutional methods, and a glorification of the doctrine of physical force. With that object in view he is destroying, systematically both by executions and by deliberate starvation every form of opposition to bolshevism. This system of terror is aimed chiefly at the liberals and non-Bolshevik Socialists, whom Lenin regards as his most dangerous opponents.

10. In order to maintain their popularity with the workingmen and with their hired mercenaries, the Bolsheviki are paying their supporters enormous wages by means of an unchecked paper issue, until today money in Russia has naturally lost all value. Even according to their own figures the Bolsheviki's expenditure exceeds the revenue by thousands of millions of rubles per annum.

These are facts for which the Bolsheviki may seek to find an excuse, but which they cannot deny.

Yours sincerely,

R. H. B. LOCKHART.

Ever since its inception by Lenin and Trotsky in 1919, the Communist Third International, or Comintern as it is popularly called, has been an instigator of class warfare and social revolution in all countries, the declared purpose being to establish a world soviet union ruled from Moscow. The Third International was dissolved in May 1943, according to official pronouncements, but its acts and philosophies are still in force.

The Communist Parties are dedicated to establish a dictatorship of the proletariat—the wage working class—as an instrumentality for the overthrow of capitalism—imperialism—particularly in western Euorpe and America, with special emphasis on Geat Britain and the United States. "Revolution" and "insurrection" are words constantly stressed in their political speeches and literature. Strategy is carefully planned to the minutest detail and with a view to every contingency however remote. Stalin himself once said:

It is inconceivable that the Soviet Republic should continue to exist for a long period side by side with the imperialist states. Ultimately one or the other must conquer.

The Communist Party in America was formed in 1919 in Chicago by a group of radicals, but almost immediately went "underground" because the alien nature of its activities was such as to engender Nation-wide resentment and opposition. In 1925 its official name was changed to the Workers Party of America. In 1928 it came out into the open as the Communist Party of the United States of America. In 1944 the party name was changed to the Communist Political Association. In 1945 the organization again assumed the title, Communist Party. In other words, after several changes of name, all more or less misleading, it has come right back to where it started.

It is characteristic of Communists to change names frequently not only of organizations but of individuals as well. Members assume what are known as party names, invariably Anglo-Saxon patronymics. Make no mistake about it, the rank-and-file is well disciplined, the leadership is intelligently astute. The fifth column is here, and the termites have long been at work on the structure of the body politic. They make no secret of the fact that they take orders from Moscow and carry out policies laid down by the political bureau of the Supreme Soviet, or that some if not all of their movements are financed by the same source.

Nothing ever happens by chance or coincidence in communistic movements. They are all carefully planned in advance all over the world. To achieve its dictatorship of the proletariat, the Communist Party here must secure predominant influences in trade unions, factory councils, cooperative societies, sport organizations, cultural organizations, even the Army and the Navy. Class antagonisms are constantly being stirred up, antinegroism and antisemitism being the favorite themes.

In promoting propaganda within the armed forces, the Communist hierarchy in its official capacity has worked out and authorized very specific lines of strategy. The faithful are told to cause misunderstandings between officers and men; to agitate for the election of all commanding officers by the men in the ranks; to organize soldiers in alliance with the revolutionary proletariat; to convince the soldiers that the only war worth waging is one for their own liberation under a soviet; to join military organizations in order to bore from within; to fight compulsory military service; to demand broad extension of privileges; to abolish saluting at all times; to influence political-education work in the armed forces. All this is ordered to be done, illegally if necessary, in order to undermine the foundations of capitalism. "Whatever helps the proletarian revolution is ethical."

We have but to look a few months—weeks, in some instances—to see every one of these made an overt issue in our country. These are not merely propaganda; they are works of propaganda brought to actuality, and they afford food for serious thought—and action—before it is too late.

William Z. Foster, thrice Communist candidate for the Presidency of the United States and present leader of the Communist Party in America, once told a congressional investigating committee:

Our party considers religion to be the opiate of the people, as Karl Marx has stated, and we carry on propaganda for the liquidation of these prejudices among the workers. * * * Many workers join the Communist Party who still have some religious scruples, but a worker who understands the elementary principles of the Communist Party must necessarily be in the process of liquidating his religious beliefs, and when he joins the party he will soon get rid of them * * * A member of the party of the Soviet Union who would be married in the church wouldn't be of any value to the Communist Party * * * The workers of this country and the workers of every country have only one flag. That's the red flag * * * We are part of the revolutionary class, and all capitalist flags are flags of the capitalist class and we owe no allegiance to them.

The same Foster on another occasion had this to say:

On the one hand we are destroying their (workers') illusions about the sacredness of capitalist property and are encouraging them to seize this property wherever they have an opportunity. On the other hand, we are teaching the working-class soldiers not to shoot their brothers and sisters who are in revolt, but, if need be, shoot their own officers and to desert the army when the crucial moment arrives.

Communist leaders know that their movement can thrive only where there is discontent, strife, discord, and misery. It is, therefore, their recognized strategy not only in this country but all over the world to originate all the trouble they can, and when they find trouble they did not themselves start, to exacerbate it. They pour oil, not water, on every fire. In this country, if there is a strike or a period of racial tension or discontent with the Government or dissatisfaction in the armed forces, Communists are always to be found in the midst of the scene, doing everything they can to hinder a settlement, and add to any fear, suspicion, or ill-will which exists.

Communism thrives on misery. The most glaring and cruel exhibit in this respect is the present world famine. One-third of the people of the world are hungry. Hungry people cannot think straight. Hence, they will be more ready to turn to the golden but specious promises of communism. Therefore, say the Communists, let us keep as many people hungry as we can. While America and other countries are straining every nerve to feed the world and to restore peaceful conditions so that as soon as possible the world can feed itself, Russia is doing all it can to block every move toward a rational peace. Nor are they aiding in the provision of food to hungry peoples in Europe, China, and India.

Herbert Hoover declared on June 5, 1946, that "to date we have not gotten a pound of food out of Russia"; and that "Communists like to see the people of Europe hungry in order more easily to establish their political ideals." Communism does not hesitate to prolong the world's misery if by doing so it can further its own political ideological or military advantage.

What follows is a picture of life in the United States, as it will be if the Communist group is able to carry out its designs.

The information on which it is based comes from statements which used to be made openly by Communist leaders—they are far more wary of expressing their designs now for reasons of policy—from official utterances from the days of Karl Marx through the Third Internationale, and from the pattern realized in Russia—the Communist "holy land"—and now being set up, with remarkable uniformity, in Poland, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Manchuria, and wherever Communists have gained sufficient control.

First comes the revolution. The Communist zealot and the less bold fellow traveler are just as certain that it is coming as we are that day will follow night, but they are unable to calculate its arrival with such exactitude. In that respect they are not given the confidence of the master minds in Moscow. We are constantly reminded, however, that it will be soon, sudden, violent, the Trotskyites, the Fascists, the economic royalists—names Communists apply indiscriminately to everybody who does not accept their political philosophy, and intended as insults—will disappear as completely as did the Romanoffs 28 years ago and in much the same manner.

The Soviet leaders will lose no time and spare no suffering in destroying our present political and economic system by force and violence—since the membership is too weak numerically to do very much at the polls—and substituting therefor a reorganized social order in which common ownership and operation of the national economy is vested in a government of the people led by the working class.

We need only look back to the early days of Soviet rule and consider what happened to the Russian kulaks—peasant landowners—in order to get a preview of what is scheduled for American monopolistic forces and their hirelings. All farm lands were seized by the newly formed Soviet Government in 1918 and declared public property for distribution among the nonlandowning peasantry. Owners who objected were either slain outright or sent to Siberia as forced laborers.

Instead of the two-party political system, which has been the birthright of this land of ours even before there was any United States of America, there will be but a single party, which means one-man leadership, which in turn means dictatorship. There will be no such thing as a voting opposition because there will be no opposition. Party members will vote perfunctorily for a given set of candidates or be liquidated. On the other hand, faithful and obedient party members will be accorded certain social privileges and granted priorities, even favoritism, in political affairs.

There are less than 6,000,000 members of the Communist Party in Russia, out of a total population of perhaps 180,000,000, but they run the government although not a constitutional part thereof. Far less than this number, as an organized minority, took over all the functions of government in 1917 and throughout all the years that followed they have run the government and regulated the lives of all within their sphere.

One of the first enemies of authoritarian Government to be destroyed is freedom of speech and the press. Our Constitution will, of course, be promptly scrapped and with it the first amendment, which guarantees that there shall be no abridgement of the freedom of speech or of the press. No dictator could dictate with anything like that on the statute books. Witness Hitler and Mussolini in their heyday and Stalin, who is still in his heyday. The expression of an opinion, either orally or in print, is pretty unhealthy for the offender anywhere but in a democracy like ours. There will be no more news, as we understand that term, only censorship and propaganda. Such news as is passed along to the general public will be handcolored and constitute just what leader wants reader to believe and nothing more.

Hitler's propaganda chief was so adept at that sort of thing that the ordinary German citizen had no idea the war was going along as it was. German prisoners of war brought into this country via the port of New York were dumfounded when they sailed by the city. They had been told, by their own controlled press and radio, that it had been leveled to the ground long ago.

One of the paradoxes indicative of the workings of the Communist mind is that its press takes full advantage of the freedom accorded here in propagandizing for a system that denies such freedom.

Ever since 1791 our fundamental law has guaranteed no interference in the free exercise of religion. What will happen to that right, should the Communists take over, can readily be surmised if we consider the sorry state of religion in Russia today. The following is taken from an editorial in a Communist-front magazine, now happily defunct:

> The church is usually the tool of the ruling class. It is a mental chloroform with which masses are lulled to sleep. It is the instrument for the creation of apathy, lethargy, inertia—contentment with one's lot. In this respect it is acting in the interest of employers.

Organized religion of any sort is regarded as inimical to a dictatorship, at least those which have been tried in our day. Church and clergy suffered the fate of those whom the dictators chose in regard as opposition—imprisonment, liquidation, blood purge.

According to Lenin:

> Our morality is entirely subordinated to the interests of the class struggle. We don't believe in eternal morality, and we expose all fables about morality.

Government ownership and operation of means of production is a basic principle in the philosophy of communism. The means include banks, land, transport, mines, oil wells, raw material, machinery and factories. Labor union and the rights of labor, as we understand those terms in the United States, are nonexistent in the totalitarian states. Lenin's own words are frankly revealing:

> It is necessary to be able to agree to any and every sacrifice and even, if need be, to resort to all sorts of devices, maneuvers, and illegal methods, to evasion and subterfuge, in order to penetrate the trade unions, to remain in them, and to carry on communistic work in them.

There is a type of trade organization in Soviet Russia, but it bears no resemblance to our AFL or CIO, nor has it the influence, authority, or standing. All workers in a plant are in a single union—not organized by crafts. Soviet workers are the poorest paid in Europe.

Communist leaders of late seem to have arrogated to themselves the exclusive use of the word "democracy." William Z. Foster is on record as declaring that "communism is the most profoundly democratic social movement in the world." Communists and prospective Communists are led to believe that they actually do govern themselves by virtue of their complete independence and the lack of class distinctions. It seems logical, however, that the 180,000,000 people in Russia and the 135,000,000 people in the United States cannot all be commissars. As a matter of fact, a group of less than 80 men are the actual rulers of the Soviet Union. Yet the proletarians, whose lot in life is supposed to be far superior to that in the western democracies, are told where they shall work, when, and how long.

Cardinal Spellman, in an article in the American magazine for July 1946 has this to say:

America is infected with the germs of communism, which, spreading its poisonous propaganda and false philosophies, is twisting and tempting the minds of good men until they too, become serfs to the perjuring, pandering spirit of confusion and chaos.

Today, Communists, suppressing and distorting truth, are intimidating men and inflicting despotism on America, trying to convert Americans to communism. In Government, in industry, in labor unions, in our political and educational systems, even in the armed services of our country, Communists and Communist sympathizers hold responsible positions, while members of their party use the press, the radio, and the films to influence and divide us against ourselves.

They live under the American flag, enjoy the priceless privilege of being citizens of our Republic, while their own allegiance is pledged to an emblem representing a theory of government opposed to everything for which Old Glory stands.

Mr. Speaker, do the people of America want communism?

Independence of the Philippines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following proclamation of the President; also a broadcast by President Truman to the Philippine people; and the text of an address by Gen. Douglas MacArthur at the Philippine independence ceremony at Manila:

PHILIPPINES PROCLAMATION

WASHINGTON, July 4.—Following is the text of President Truman's proclamation formally declaring the independence of the Philippines:

INDEPENDENCE OF THE PHILIPPINES

(By the President of the United States of America, a proclamation.)

"Whereas the United States of America by the treaty of peace with Spain of December 10, 1898, commonly known as the Treaty of Paris, and by the Treaty with Spain of November 7, 1900, did acquire sovereignty over the Philippines, and by the convention of January 2, 1930, with Great Britain did delimit the boundary between the Philippine Archipelago and the State of North Borneo; and

"Whereas the United States of America has consistently and faithfully during the past 48 years exercised jurisdiction and control over the Philippines and its people; and

"Whereas it has been the repeated declaration of the legislative and executive branches of the Government of the United States of America that full independence would be granted the Philippines as soon as the people of the Philippines were prepared to assume this obligation; and

"Whereas the people of the Philippines have clearly demonstrated their capacity for self-government; and

"Whereas the act of Congress approved March 24, 1934, known as the Philippine Independence Act, directed that, on the fourth day of July immediately following a 10-year transitional period leading to the independence of the Philippines, the President of the United States of America should by proclamation withdraw and surrender all rights of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty of the United States of America in and over the territory and people of the Philippines, except certain reservations therein or thereafter authorized to be made, and, on behalf of the United States of America, should recognize the independence of the Philippines;

"Now, therefore, I, Harry S. Truman, President of the United States of America, acting under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by the aforesaid act of Congress, do proclaim that, in accord with and subject to the reservations provided for in the applicable statutes of the United States,

"The United States of America hereby withdraws and surrenders all rights of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty now existing and exercised by the United States of America in and over the territory and people of the Philippines; and,

"On behalf of the United States of America, I do hereby recognize the independence of the Philippines as a separate and self-governing nation and acknowledge the authority and control over the same of the Government instituted by the people thereof, under the Constitution now in force.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington this 4th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1946, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and seventy-first.

[SEAL] "HARRY S. TRUMAN."

TEXTS OF STATEMENTS ON PHILIPPINES

Following is the text of the President's broadcast to the Philippine people:

"To the People of the Philippines:

"I am, indeed, happy to be able to join with you in the formal inauguration of the Republic of the Philippines.

"This is a proud day for our two countries. For the Philippines it marks the end of a centuries-old struggle for freedom. For the United States it marks the end of a period of almost 50 years of cooperation with the Philippines looking toward independence.

"Now the new Republic faces the problems of independent nationhood. These problems will be difficult and trying. The road to independence has not been an easy one. The road of independence will, likewise, not be an easy one. The mettle of a people, the mettle of a nation, are on trial before the world.

"But the United States has faith in the ability and in the determination of the Philippine people to solve the problems confronting their country. The men who defied Magellan, who fought for a republic in 1898, and who were recently on Bataan, Corregidor, and at a hundred other unsung battlegrounds in the Philippines flung back the Japanese challenge, will not lack the courage which is necessary to make government work in peace as well as in war. The will to succeed, I am sure, will continue to govern the actions of the Philippine people.

"The United States, moreover, will continue to assist the Philippines in every way possible. A formal compact is being dissolved. The compact of faith and understanding between the two peoples can never be dissolved. We recognize the fact and propose to do all within our power to make Philippine independence effective and meaningful.

"Our two countries will be closely bound together for many years to come. We of the United States feel that we are merely entering into a new partnership with the Philippines—a partnership of two free and sovereign nations working in harmony and understanding.

"The United States and its partner of the Pacific, the Philippine Republic, have already charted a pattern of relationships for all the world to study. Together in the future our two countries must prove the soundness and the wisdom of this great experiment in Pacific democracy.

"May God protect and preserve the Republic of the Philippines."

PRESIDENTIAL STATEMENT

Following is the statement by President Truman on the Filipinos' ability to meet the challenges of independence:

"The independence achieved today by the Philippines comes after a period of 48 years of American sovereignty over the islands.

"Throughout this period it has been the consistently expressed policy of this Government, as revealed in the instructions of President McKinley to the Philippine commission, the Jones law, and the Tydings-McDuffie law to prepare the people of the Philippines for independence.

"An ever-increasing measure of self-government has been granted to the Filipino people as year after year they demonstrated their capacity for democratic self-government.

"With independence the Republic of the Philippines is admittedly confronted with many difficult problems. Almost any new nation facing independence would be confronted with similar problems.

"I am confident, however, that the Filipino people will meet the challenge of independence with courage and determination. The United States stands ready to assist the Philippines in every way possible during the years to come. Together, solutions will be found for the problems which the Philippines will encounter.

"It is more than symbolic that our two countries should be jointly celebrating July 4 as Independence Day. It is my hope that each succeeding July 4 will constitute a milestone of progress along the path of mutual cooperation for the achievement of international understanding and well-being."

GENERAL DOUGLAS MACARTHUR'S ADDRESS

Following is the text of Gen. Douglas MacArthur's address prepared for delivery at the Philippine independence ceremony:

"With this ceremony a new nation is born—a nation conceived in the centuries-old struggle of a people to attain the political liberty to embark upon its own national destiny—a nation dedicated to the furtherance of those rights and those principles which serve to compose and advance man's dignity upon the earth—a nation upon whom the eyes of all oppressed peoples are today cast with the burning light of a new faith.

"Forty-eight years ago the mantle of American sovereignty fell over this land and this people, American beneficent sovereignty of a liberator pledged to be withdrawn as soon as the well-being of the people would safely permit. America never wavered in that purpose—America today redeems that pledge.

"For 48 years our Army has stood on these shores. An Army of free men dedicated to humanity's higher service, its role has never been to rule, never been to subjugate, never been to oppress.

"These years have seen many men come and many men go—men truly representing a cross-section of that land beyond the seas who brought with them a better understanding of the West and carried back with them a better understanding of the East—and through it all helped develop a relationship of mutual understanding, mutual respect, and mutual affection.

"The qualities which now bind our two peoples together, founded upon a community of interest and dedication to common purposes and common ideals, will not diminish with the sovereign change this day has wrought.

"For 48 years, as our two peoples have marched forward, shoulder to shoulder, toward a common destiny, through the bitter years of war and the ofttimes onerous adversities of peace, a purposeful relationship has been welded which will not yield to sovereignty, nor to any man-made convention, nor to any artificial political distinction—a relationship which will last forever."

Says independence was earned

"For 48 years since my father first led our Army down the long road to liberate this great city of Manila close identification with you has been my personal privilege. Through these years I have witnessed with admiration the magnificent progress in self-sufficiency and your long, earnest, and unyielding aspiration for independence.

"Through these years of steady and advancing preparation, by your resolute perseverance in holding firmly to the course long charted by the architects of your political future, despite seeming unsurmountable obstacles which barred the way, the world must bear witness that you have earned the right that this day of destiny might be.

"Let history record this event in flaming letters as depicting a new height of nobility in the relationship between two separate and distinct peoples of the earth—peoples of the East and peoples of the West. Despite racial, cultural, and language differences and great distances of geographical separation, they forged an affinity of understanding which survived both the vagaries of peace and the shock of war.

"They shattered for all times the deceptive philosophy that 'East is East and West is West, and never the twain shall meet' by demonstrating, through complete and effective cohesion, that peoples of the East and peoples of the West have common cause in human progress—and can live together and work together and strive together toward a common destiny.

"Let history record this event in the sweep of democracy through the earth as foretelling the end of mastery of peoples by the power of force alone—the end of empire as the political chain which binds the unwilling weak to the unyielding strong. Let it be recorded as one of the great turning points in the advance of civilization in the age-long struggle of man for liberty, for dignity, and for human betterment."

Salutes new Republic

"As this infant Republic stands at the threshold of an adventure in the society of other nations upon an identical sovereign plane, its political destiny depends upon the courage and wisdom of its leadership and the unity of its people. Never before in history have more vital and complex issues stirred mankind than today.

"Never have issues weighed more heavily upon the destiny of the human race. In their solution, this new Republic will be called upon to take its stand. God grant that it may raise its voice firmly and fearlessly in alinement with those great forces of right which seek to avoid the destructive influences which, despite our past victories, still harass the world.

"I rejoice with you that your great political goal has this day been reached, and shall watch your forward march under the banner of your own sovereignty with deep pride in the achievements of your past and with abiding confidence in those of your future. In behalf of the great Army which I here represent, I stand at salute to the Republic and the people who proudly compose it—this land and this people that I have known so long and loved so well."

General Eisenhower's Report: A British Appraisal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit a copy of an editorial from the London Times which is a tribute paid to the leadership of the AEF's supreme commander, as follows:

EISENHOWER'S REPORT: A BRITISH APPRAISAL—TRIBUTE PAID TO THE LEADERSHIP OF AEF'S SUPREME COMMANDER

General Eisenhower was appointed supreme commander, Allied Expeditionary Force in northwest Europe, in February 1944. He then received a directive from the Combined Chiefs of Staff. It was to them that he was responsible for the conduct of operations, and to them that his report on his mission is addressed. General Marshall acted as their executive in conveying to him their orders and instructions, being besides the direct superior of General Eisenhower in the latter's capacity as a commander of United States Army forces. The report is similar in type to the dispatches of British commanders-in-chief, but longer than is common in British usage, and goes into detail to an extent which would not have been possible had not the supreme commander's staff been international in composition. It is a sober and formal account of the great victorious campaign in the west, but is nevertheless compiled not without an eye for the dramatic. It contains some matter which would have lent itself to sensational handling had that been in accord either with the nature of the author or the general character of the document.

For example, General Eisenhower reveals that both Mr. Churchill and General Koenig made strong representations to him to forego attacks with heavy bombers, American by day and British by night, on railway targets in France on grounds of humanity and for fear that the result might be to alienate the French from the British and Americans. He could not agree. His feeling on this matter was so strong and he regarded the interruption of communications in France in order to prevent a speedy German concentration as so vital that he demanded and obtained direct control of the American Strategic Air Forces and British Bomber Command from the Combined Chiefs of Staff, who had not intended to hand them over to him. Again, he confesses that, as 1944 drew to an end, he became more and more perturbed because he knew nothing of Russian intentions and found difficulty in deciding upon the nature of his own operations while he remained in this state of ignorance of the plans of the eastern ally. It will be recalled that the Russian offensive had been confined to the south after the check on the Vistula in the summer of 1944, and General Eisenhower was naturally anxious to learn something of Russian plans regarding the north German plain, into which he himself designed to launch his forces. The personal intervention of President Roosevelt induced Marshal Stalin to give an interview on the subject to General Eisenhower's representative. In January 1945, Air Chief Marshal Tedder, General Eisenhower's deputy, with two Army staff officers, visited Moscow and were given highly reassuring information about the tremendous new offensive which was actually launched in the middle of the month and which excelled the hopes founded upon it.

Nothing can be easier than to seize upon a series of differences of opinion, of the accidents inevitable in warfare, of the occasional hasty words uttered by men unaware that a recorder with pencil and notebook, and possibly a gift for embroidery, was so close at hand, and to create out of them a picture of wrangling and frustration. Conflicts of view cannot be escaped while there are commanders of strong and independent intellects, and armies do not prosper under leaders afraid to say what they think. Such conflicts appear in purely national armies, but when they appear in international armies they are heightened by a factor which in no way dishonors those concerned—the condition that every national commander necessarily bears, in addition to his responsibility to his chief, a responsibility to his own government for the national contingent committed to his care.

That is the major problem which the armies of a coalition campaigning under a united command always have to face. It is one which in formal logic can admit of no absolute solution because no state, unless it be merely a satellite or an instrument of that which provides the supreme commander, can free itself from its obligation to watch over the safety and welfare of its own forces. In practice, with good will and common sense, the organization can be made to succeed. In the campaign fought under the supreme command of General Eisenhower it did succeed; in fact it could scarcely have been more triumphantly vindicated. Frivolous criticism, in search of what tickles the tired appetite of the sensation hunter, may be harmful in its effect upon the unthinking but it cannot explain away the efficiency and suitability of the organization set up by the Combined Chiefs of Staff and based upon the experience which had already produced excellent results in other theaters of the war.

The supreme commander here pays no empty compliments, but he does make brief references to outstanding features of the British contribution to victory which will be read with pleasure in this country. He describes Field Marshal Montgomery's tactical conduct of the operations in the Caen sector as "masterly." He praises the combined effort of the Admiralty, the Royal Corps of Signals, and the Post Office in providing the landing force with a submarine cable at an early stage and recognizes fully the effort involved in the preparation of "Mulberry." He pays tribute to the two British officers who played so great a part in the venture and lost their lives before its end, Admiral Sir Bertram Ramsay and Air Chief Marshal Sir Trafford Leigh-Mallory. But still more important is his insistence upon the harmony and good fellowship in which his staff worked, "obliterating all distinction of national outlook in their zealous service to a single organization, while in the field of battle the men of the allied armies fought shoulder to shoulder under my supreme command." General Eisenhower himself will always be remembered as the very personification of the greatest experiment in integration hitherto made in warfare and for the success with which, under his leadership, it served the cause for which it had been created.

Declaration of Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that every sovereign citizen of the United States will read the Declaration of Independence, which, under leave to extend, I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This great document must not suffer the fate of the Atlantic Charter, which was first hailed as the hope of the world, later its existence denied, then published as a public document, and finally repudiated at Yalta.

There must be no repudiation of the Declaration of Independence in whole or in part by any generation of United States citizens who value the birthright of freedom.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

(The Declaration of Independence was adopted by the Continental Congress, in Philadelphia, on July 4, 1776, and was signed by John Hancock as President and by Charles Thomson as Secretary. It was published first on July 6 in the Pennsylvania Evening Post. A copy of the Declaration, engrossed on parchment, was signed by Members of Congress on and after August 2, 1776.)

When, in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these rights Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shewn, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evidence a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former Systems of Government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained, and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other Laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the Legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places, unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public Records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions, on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the meantime exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the Laws for Naturalization of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new Appropriations of Lands.

He has obstructed the Administration of Justice, by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary powers.

He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies, without the Consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation: For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us: For protecting them by a mock Trial from punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States: For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world: For imposing Taxes on us without our Consent: For depriving us in many cases of the benefits of Trial by Jury: For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offenses: For abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighbouring Province, establishing therein an Arbitrary government, and enlarging its Boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies: For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments: For suspending our own Legislatures and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated Government here by declaring us out of his Protection and waging War against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravished our Coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large Armies of foreign Mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the Head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow Citizens taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian Savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions. In every stage of these Oppressions We have Petitioned for Redress in the most humble terms. Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A Prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people. Nor have We been wanting in attention to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity, which denounces our Separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, Enemies in War, in Peace Friends.

We, Therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions do, in the Name, and by authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be, Free and Independent States: that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved: and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do. And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honor.

"Red-Tape" Houses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, everybody knows there is a housing shortage in the land of the free and the home of the brave. The political woodpeckers are busy drilling holes in the November hollow trees in an effort to get the veterans' votes. They demand one law right after the other, and they seek to create one new Government agency right after the other. In this way they are able to make a lot of noise, which is the echo of the grinding of the legislative machinery necessary to produce legislative houses. A fellow wrote me the other day that by time the veteran had filled out 64 forms he was not quite certain as to whether or not he would ever get started on a building program. Governmental red tape is not going to build houses. Note the following newspaper item on July 1, 1946, which I clipped from one of the great newspapers in Minnesota, the Hibbing Daily Tribune, of Hibbing, Minn. It proves the point and reads as follows:

SET-UP IS A LITTLE BIT COMPLICATED

WASHINGTON.—Like the business it operates, the Government's housing set-up is complicated.

At the top is the National Housing Agency (NHA), created early in 1942 and now headed by the aggressive Wilson W. Wyatt, former mayor of Louisville, Ky.

NHA has these three main sections: The Federal Housing Authority (FHA), the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration, and the Federal Public Housing Authority (FPHA).

FPHA in turn has three main activities: Low-rent housing under the United States Housing Authority (USHA); war housing; providing 200,000 units of temporary housing for the veterans' emergency housing program from surplus war housing (like 35,000 trailers) and through the conversion of old barracks, mess halls, and other structures.

Tucked away elsewhere in FPHA are these smaller items: The subsistence homestead projects and "green town" model communities built by the Farm Security Administration, the original slum-clearance projects built by the Public Works Administration during the depression, and mortgages on limited-dividend housing projects built privately with Government loans.

At this point in an interview, Philip M. Klutznick, FPHA Commissioner, asks, "'Are you sufficiently confused, or should I go on?"

When he does go on, it boils down to this:

The two Government housing activities which touch the most people are FPHA's low-rent program under the USHA and the drive for 2,700,000 new homes for veterans.

For 15 years or more before the war we had what FPHA calls deficit activity in the home-building field. Families accumulated more rapidly than did homes to shelter them.

USHA, established in 1937, was able to do a little toward catching up with this deficit before the war. It helped communities build 117,000 low-rent homes, which replaced about 107,000 slum dwellings.

States passed legislation in order to take part in this program. Then the States and communities financed their projects with Federal assistance. USHA also provided technical advice and other services.

The necessary laws are on the books in 40 States, and local housing authorities are operating in 448 cities and 368 rural counties.

The National Housing Act requires that dwellings built under this program cost less than $4,000 each in cities under 500,000 population, and under $5,000 in larger cities. Slum dwellings must be demolished for each low-rent project completed.

The weekly income of families admitted to the projects averaged $14.92 in 1940. Even after general wartime rise in wage levels, the average was only $23.83 in 1944. Rents are set generally at the level of slum rents in each community. Including utilities, they range in average from $14.55 to $22.34 a month across the country.

Mr. Speaker, those of you who have read this complicated description of a complicated set-up for complicated machinery for complicated houses, will, I am sure, agree with me that this write-up covers everything from "deficit activity"—another name for bureaucratic foolishness—to prefabricated nonsense.

GIVE FREE ENTERPRISE A CHANCE

We are going to get houses, Mr. Speaker, when we get rid of wartime controls and restrictions and red tape. When we do that, then people who make lumber and building materials will begin to produce the materials. Capable contractors assisted by bricklayers and carpenters and other skilled mechanics will begin to build houses. This is called the American system of free enterprise. We operated under this system for 170 years, up to and including yesterday, minus the beginning of World War II, which was on or about December 7, 1941. What we need to do, Mr. Speaker, is to make up our mind that the war is over, kick out the bureaucrats, let them get into productivity because they are producing nothing now but headaches, and the world will soon be all right again. I do not believe that the veterans are being fooled by the political hucksters who are trying to capture their vote with political prefabricated houses.

New Hampshire as a Law-Abiding State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Boston Traveler of Tuesday, July 2, 1946, entitled "FBI Survey Ranks New Hampshire Most Law-Abiding State." I think the article should be of particular interest to the country, and I hope it is to my colleagues.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FBI SURVEY RANKS NEW HAMPSHIRE MOST LAW-ABIDING STATE

New Hampshire is the Nation's most all-around law-abiding State, according to an article in the August issue of the American magazine which shows that the old-time gangster hunting grounds of Greater New York have been supplanted by far Western States as leaders in crime in proportion to population.

New York State, in fact, ranks in a class with Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, North Dakota, and New Hampshire, as having the least crime per capita. During 1945, according to FBI records, each had less than 10 crimes per 1,000 inhabitants.

In contrast to New Hampshire, which had "the fewest robberies, the fewest burglaries and the fewest auto thefts," and Pennsylvania, which "was lowest in thefts other than auto," the Southland led in murders even when only the white populations were considered. Incidentally, Vermont has the enviable record of not having shown a murder in the FBI's Uniform Crime Report for 2 years.

Second-best States with a crime rate of from 10 to 12.4 per 1,000 inhabitants are Illinois, Maine, Vermont, New Jersey, Connecticut, Wisconsin, Iowa, Louisiana, and South Dakota.

In the 12.5 to 16.1 per 1,000 group are Ohio, West Virginia, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and Montana.

Those rating 16.2 to 22 crimes per 1,000 are Michigan, Indiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, and New Mexico.

The 22.1 to 29.9 class includes Virginia, Kentucky, Georgia, Florida, Texas, Utah, Idaho, and Wyoming.

The highest crime-rate group, those reporting more than 30 per 1,000 inhabitants, embraces Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, and Arizona.

"The West is really wild," states the American magazine article. "One of the main reasons given by FBI officials and other authorities is that the Western States have swollen tremendously in population in the past 30 years, and particularly in the past decade, with the influx of migratory workers, military personnel, and camp followers * * *.

"Most of the criminals there are extremely young—wild, irresponsible kids around 17."

The article points out that while west coast criminal offenses were primarily against property—burglary, theft, robbery—the Southland is way out ahead in crimes of violence, such as murder and aggravated assault.

"There were 12 times as many murders per 1,000 people in the South last year as in New England," the magazine states. "Georgia had more than 50 times as many murders as New Hampshire. * * * If you consider only white populations, the 10 worst States for homicide in America are still all in the South. The white residents of Kentucky, for example, kill one another 10 times as often as the white residents of Vermont.

"Not only are our most murder-ridden States in the warmest part of our country, but the 12 least murder-ridden are in the coldest part, in the fringe of States near the Canadian border. In fact, as you go down the Atlantic coast from New England to Florida, the murder rate rises so uniformly that it is startling."

Philippine Republic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Vicente Villamin, from the Washington Post of July 4, 1946:

PHILIPPINE REPUBLIC

(By Vicente Villamin)

HISTORY, OUTLOOK OF NEW NATION

On July 4, 1946, the Philippine Republic is born. America is its sponsor. An American law, the act of Congress of March 24, 1934, brings the new nation into existence. The President of the United States has issued a proclamation recognizing the independence of the Philippines and withdrawing American sovereignty over them.

The Philippines came under the control of the United States as a result of the Spanish-American War. By treaty signed at Paris on December 10, 1898, Spain ceded the Philippine territory of 114,000 square miles to the United States.

President McKinley announced that the American policy would be to develop the Philippines—the country and its people. There would be no oppression, exploitation, or imperialism. The policy would be radically different from the colonial policies of other nations. The American policy has been followed faithfully and the Philippines are a monument to American unselfishness and helpfulness.

On July 1, 1902, the American Congress passed the first organic law for the Philippines. In it is incorporated the Bill of Rights with two exceptions: The trial by jury and the right to bear arms, which were both left for the Filipinos to adopt or not as they wished. In other words, the Filipinos since 1902 have enjoyed the same civil liberty as is guaranteed to the American citizen under the Bill of Rights. No dependent people had had that boon before in all history.

A government suited to the genius and condition of the people was established. Filipinos occupied important posts. The chief justice of the supreme court has always been a Filipino. The overwhelming majority of the civil service were Filipinos.

In 1907 the Philippine Assembly was inaugurated. Its members were elected by the people. Its first act was to appropriate a sizable amount for the education of the Filipino masses. The assembly was in effect the lower house of the legislature, and the commission the upper. The members of the commission were appointed by the President of the United States. There were Filipino appointees, but there was an American majority.

Free trade was established between the United States and the Philippines in 1909. That gave impetus to industries, particularly sugar, coconut oil, cigar, embroidery, and cordage. These industries became the main prop of the Philippine economic structure. Other industries are gold, chrome, manganese, and iron mining, lumber, pearl buttons, and straw-hat making.

On August 29, 1916, Congress passed the Jones law. This placed the legislative power in the hands of Filipinos, reenacted the bill of rights, and established a nearly complete self-government. The chief executive, called governor-general, continued to be appointed by the President of the United States.

Finally, on March 24, 1934, Congress passed the Independence Act. This law created the Philippine Commonwealth, with the president and congress elected by the people (including women voters), a constitution drafted by their representatives, and a government 100 percent Filipino in direction, personnel, and policy. American sovereignty was represented by the American High Commissioner, who watched and was consulted, but did not take part in governing.

It should be made clear that the Philippine Government has always been self-supporting. Its budget had never been out of balance. It amounted to around $80,000,000 a year before the war. Its bonded debt is less than $40,000,000, or only a little more than $2 per person.

The prewar trade with the United States was about $181,000,000 annually, being 73 percent of the Philippine total overseas trade. There were in that trade less than 16 percent of American ships as compared to 27 percent Japanese and 20 percent British. Filipino ships represented less than 4 percent.

The war has upset everything. The Government treasury is empty. Most of the industries have been destroyed. Reorganization of different fields of endeavor is just starting. The Philippine Government is seeking a loan of $400,000,000, which is 10 times its present debt. The budget for the first year of the Republic amounts to $125,000,000, against an income of only about $20,000,000. This is, of course, a temporary condition.

But, withal, the future of the country is bright and far from gloomy. The challenge is to the Filipino leaders to mobilize the forces that would compel success. The 18,000,000 Filipinos are determined to progress and to make the new Government a success. That is the chief asset. The material assets are, if properly protected and employed, capable of increasing the Filipino people's national income of $1,000,000,000 five times over, giving the Government a possible yearly revenue of around $350,000,000 without increasing taxes.

Two of these assets are the approximately $500,000,000 spent in the Philippines by the American Government and members of the armed forces during and since the war and the credits of more than $200,000,000 payable by the American Government to Filipino veterans, including the recognized guerrillas.

Congress has recently passed the following laws: An act turning over to the Philippine Government about $73,000,000 in certain taxes collected in the United States; an act appropriating $400,000,000 to pay private persons for war damages and $120,000,000 to the Philippine Government for reconstruction work plus $100,000,000 worth of surplus property; and an act establishing free trade, fully exempt from duty in the first 8 years and partially so for 20 years after that period.

In relation to these appropriations, two things should be remembered: (a) The Philippines didn't receive any lend-lease aid from the United States and (b) the Filipino participation shortened the war, saved American soldiers' lives and saved roughly $10,000,000,000 in expenses. The amount of destruction in the Philippines is estimated at about $1,000,000,000.

Two weeks ago Congress passed a law providing for military assistance to the Philippine Republic. Under a joint resolution of Congress of June 29, 1944, sites for naval, air, and military bases may be reserved by the United States on Philippine territory. The plan is to build a formidable American military establishment.

It is clear that, although the two countries have separated politically, their relations will continue to be very close, maintained as they will be by special economic and military arrangements and buttressed by nearly half a century of intimate relationship that has been sanctified by the war, with the simple loyalty of the Filipinos to the American flag when it was under relentless attack by a determined enemy.

Proclaim Liberty Throughout the Land

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able address entitled "Proclaim Liberty Throughout the Land," delivered by the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], at the Fourth of July celebration held by the citizens of the District of Columbia at the Washington Monument yesterday. I think this was the greatest patriotic assemblage that has ever been held in the National Capital.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROCLAIM LIBERTY THROUGHOUT THE LAND

This is the birthday of our Nation, the first Nation in all the history of mankind to be founded upon the principle that all men are created equal and are, as a matter of right, entitled to govern themselves.

We assemble to celebrate that birthday beneath the towering shaft a grateful people have erected here in honor of the man who, as commander-in-chief of the Continental Army, as presiding officer of the Constitutional Convention, and as the First President of the Republic, won their freedom and then made it secure.

MEMORIAL TO SOLDIERS OF FREEDOM

But this shaft is not only a memorial to George Washington, it is also a memorial to all who contributed to the success of the American Revolution and all who, in succeeding years, have sustained the principles of liberty to which he devoted his life; for no leader can be successful unless he also has followers who are firm in the faith he proclaims. If the people of America had not believed in the things for which Washington stood, this monument could never have been erected, and, if it were not for the fact that we also believe in them, we should not be gathered here today.

The meeting has a special significance. It is the first Fourth of July Americans have been able to celebrate for 5 years without hearts heavy with fear for their sons, their brothers, their husbands fighting another war of liberation. We pay our tribute, therefore, in this first peacetime Fourth of July since 1941 to the men who carried our flag to every quarter of the globe in the war against arbitrary power.

On July 4, 1776, the Declaration of Independence proclaimed to all the world that this was a Nation of freemen. On July 4, 1946, we renew that proclamation. We stand here, as Washington stood, believing that people everywhere have the right to govern themselves.

FREEDOM IN DANGER

This celebration, however, will be only a formality and our reassertion of the principles of the Declaration of Independence only empty words, if we do not realize the solemn fact that freedom for people is in greater danger now than at any time since this Nation was born.

Victory over Germany and Japan has not terminated the threat of arbitrary power. Great areas of the world are still dominated by those who believe that the people must take orders from their rulers because, they think, the people are not capable of taking orders from themselves.

This doctrine we repudiate for ourselves and for all people everywhere. "Proclaim liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof!" This Biblical injunction engraved upon the Liberty Bell that in 1776 rang out the tidings of our independence, still holds our allegiance. It is still the aim and purpose of American policy at home and abroad.

Today, pursuing that policy of liberty, we have given freedom to the Philippines. We have established a new free republic. The President of the United States has released from allegiance to this country all the soldiers of the Filipino Army, and Congress, by law, has established the right of self-government among the Philippine people. Wherever our forces have gone and wherever they still remain, they are carrying the message of liberty.

But, while such is the record of our Nation, elsewhere there are powerful governments seeking even now to subjugate other peoples to their alien will. There are still arbitrary governments which are denying to the inhabitants of small countries the right of self-government.

The danger to human liberty and human rights is greater now than ever before, because the instruments of war are more terrible now than they ever were before. Totalitarian governments can wage total war with instruments that people, as individuals, cannot successfully resist. Modern tyranny, armed by modern science, has such appalling and irresistible power that the free man often can resist only in death, like the unhappy victims of the concentration camps.

THE STATE IS OUR SERVANT

This is the crisis the people of America face on the Nation's one hundred and seventieth birthday. Free government is still an experiment because arbitrary power is again proclaiming that democracy is a delusion and that people must be governed by dictatorial power through the state. All Americans deny it. Like the leaders who wrote the Declaration of Independence and drafted the Constitution, we believe that the people are the source of all the political and economic authority that may be exercised over them. We believe that this Nation belongs to the people, with all its resources and all its future. We believe that the Government belongs to the people. We believe that no man, no group, no class, no party has any rightful power or responsibility save that derived from the consent of the whole people. We believe that the state is the servant, not the master of the people.

It will not, however, be sufficient merely to proclaim this faith. We must make it live. We must make it live here and now for, if we are to save the ideal of free government, which the founders of this Nation brought into existence, we can do it only by proving to the world that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness for all can be more successfully attained under free institutions than under any other form of government.

This is a day for unity. It is a day on which to put aside discord and discontent, to forget annoyances and even hardships. It is a day on which to unite for the preservation of our fundamental freedoms, for the re-assertion of our devotion to the heritage of liberty we have received from all Americans of all previous generations.

A TIME FOR UNITY

This is a day for tolerance and understanding. It is a day on which to recognize that the people of America are intelligent and reasonable. They do not ask the impossible. They ask only sincerity and industry and patriotic devotion to the national interest.

Leaders who are intent on "blasting" the other fellow, who seek to build themselves by sowing the seeds of uncertainty, fear and hate, are not in harmony with the heart of America. The people of America are people of character. They are people of good will. They are people of constructive purpose. They have demonstrated in the war that they can unite for victory. They are ready now to unite in peace, to prove to all the world that people can be trusted.

This, then, is a day on which to make a solemn pledge to all who have gone before, to those who have died in the service of our country, to those who have lived and are working to make it a better country, that it is our firm determination on this national birthday to keep the United States of America what our predecessors made it, a Nation of liberty and opportunity for all.

Unification of Housing Activities of the Federal Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, during my many years of service in Congress I have had the pleasure of observing many outstanding and efficient administrators and executives; and I can truthfully say that I know of none that has surpassed in ability, and in administrative effectiveness, the President's Housing Expediter, the Honorable Wilson Wyatt.

It is with pleasure, therefore, that I embody in my remarks a statement prepared by Mr. Wyatt answering some of the unfair charges and insinuations that have been made on the part of those who would disparage and discourage his efforts to build, as speedily as possible, desperately need housing for veterans.

The text of his statement follows:

UNIFIED NATIONAL HOUSING AGENCY

The charge has been made that the reorganization plan on housing is against the interests of private enterprise.

That in fact this is not the case, is indicated first of all by the widespread and general public support for a unified national housing agency which was revealed in connection with the Senate hearings on the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, the first title of which would consolidate the Government's housing activities, along the same lines as the reorganization plan.

ENDORSED BY MILLIONS

During these hearings, scores of national organizations whose membership runs into the millions, on the basis of their own careful scrutiny of the bill, went on record as being in favor of this Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, including its provisions for a unified national housing agency. These organizations include such groups as the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United States Conference of Mayors, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the Federal Council of Churches of Christ, the National Conference of Catholic Charities, the National Institute of Municipal Law Officers, and leading Wall Street investment houses. Certainly we cannot say that these organizations would come out so strongly in favor of a bill which is against the interests of private enterprise.

Actually, as a matter of simple undisputed fact many of the trade organizations who are so very vehement in their opposition to a single national housing agency have themselves strongly favored a unification of the housing activities of the Federal Government. These organizations have specifically and clearly shown their hearty approval of the results already attained through the temporary unification of housing activities through Executive Order 9070, of February 24, 1942.

APPROVED BY PRODUCERS COUNCIL

For example, Mr. Douglas Whitlock, testifying as president of the Producers Council at the hearings on postwar planning held by the Lanham committee of this House in January 1944, made the following statement:

"So long as housing is deemed a concern of government, Federal-housing policies should be stipulated by Congress, and the carrying out of all such established policies should, in our opinion, be vested in a central agency of the executive branch of the Federal Government. * * * It should provide over-all supervision and coordination of the programs of its constituent agencies. This means that an agency, either the National Housing Agency or a similar type of unit, should be established by legislative enactment for postwar operation."

Similarly, a press release issued by the Producers' Council on June 13, 1944, stated:

"BOSTON, June 13.—The functions of the National Housing Agency should be continued by Congress after the war in order to coordinate all Federal-housing activities and to encourage a sound governmental housing policy for the postwar era, James W. Follin, managing director of the Producers' Council, stated here today at a meeting of the Boston Building Congress held at the Architectural Club.

* * * * *

"It is essential that this agency—NHA—or some similar branch of the Federal Government be set up with adequate authority and facilities to prevent a recurrence of the unsatisfactory experience during prewar years when there was a multiplicity of agencies dealing with housing matters and offering incompatible and conflicting programs."

NAHB ALSO APPROVES

Likewise, the National Association of Home Builders, in its Washington Letter, dated February 25, 1944, made the following statement:

"NHA observes second anniversary: Born of a war need and created February 24, 1942, by Executive order, NHA looks back on its accomplishments with modest satisfaction. Only those who were intimate with the housing situation 'prior to NHA' have a full appreciation of the benefits of the consolidation. Nearly a score of governmental bodies had a finger in the housing pie. No one was sure as to the size of the war job, or how it should be done. Priority procedure was something of a mystery, the wildest sort of rumors existed, and red tape ensnared everyone in a chaos of confusion. The outlook for private enterprise doing a part of the war housing program was dubious, and the accomplishment of the total job seemed doubtful.

"Alphabetically, we had the following: DDHC, FHA, FHLBB, HOLC, FSLIC, USHC, FHA, PBA, TVA, FSA, and DHC. These stood for the Division of Defense Housing Coordination, Federal Housing Administration, Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, United States Housing Corporation, United States Housing Authority, Federal Works Agency, Public Buildings Administration, Tennessee Valley Authority, Farm Security Administration, and the Defense Homes Corporation. In addition to all of this, the Army, Navy, and Maritime Departments were very much in the building picture, as were other agencies of lesser importance not listed here. Under Mr. Blandford's able administration, uniform control was set up and an intelligent housing policy established and carried out.

"A brief review of the war housing program under NHA is evidence of fine accomplishment."

AND NAREB RECOMMENDS IT

The report of the Senate Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Redevelopment sums up as follows the reply made by the National Association of Real Estate Boards in mid-1944 to a written questionnaire of the subcommittee:

"The National Association of Real Estate Boards favors placing all those concerned with housing and community developments under one general agency. * * * A Federal community development authority is urged comprising all the agencies now included in the National Housing Agency, as well as a certain portion of public works dealing with community development."

BANKERS APPROVE, TOO

The president of the Mortgage Bankers' Association, in testifying before this same Senate subcommittee, while stating that the consensus of the membership of the association was that FHA be divorced from the National Housing Agency, had this to say:

"At the beginning of the present war, 1941, we found on the urban side a cumbersome and varied group of Government agencies. * * *

"With respect to urban housing, it is obvious that without central direction the many existing agencies created at different times for entirely different purposes, and by various authorizations, will be working at cross-purposes with a duplication of effort. We belive, also, that the cost can be greatly reduced if a comprehensive program is developed under unified direction.

"The Federal Government, in your opinion, acted wisely in simplifying the organization in order to expedite war housing and to prepare the Nation for any emergency which might arise to improve our war effort and production. * * * We believe that many benefits were derived by this simplified organization and that the program for war housing and the program for financing such housing was expedited and was very beneficial during the wartime emergency.

"In brief, a plan of organization of the housing activities of the Government along the very lines embodied in the reorganization plan is vigorously supported by organizations who have just as much right to consider themselves as representatives of private enterprise as the trade organizations opposing the reorganization plan; also, a number of the very organizations who, because of irrelevant issues, now profess to oppose a single housing agency are actually on record as being in favor of a single agency when this question is divorced from such issues."

Let Freedom Ring in 1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Let Freedom Ring in 1946," which I delivered at the Welcome-Home Day ceremony at Millville, N. J., on July 4.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET FREEDOM RING IN 1946

Fellow Americans, I am happy to be in this great State of New Jersey and to be with you fine people of Millville in order to welcome home the veterans of your community on the Fourth of July.

Your State is indeed an historic spot. It was first visited in 1524 by Giovanni da Verrazano, a Florentine navigator. Later, in 1609, Henry Hudson explored the river between Sandy Hook and Raritan Bay. In 1614, Cornelis Jacobson Mey explored the lower Delaware. And, in 1638, the Swedes settled near modern Wilmington.

At the outbreak of hostilities with England, this Colony deposed the Governor and ratified the national Declaration of Independence. We all know that in this great State some of the most important engagements of the Revolutionary War were fought. And your State in 1787 became one of the Thirteen Original Colonies which accepted the Constitution. It is a privilege to be with you on this occasion.

It is my privilege also to know both of your Senators very well—Senator HAWKES and Senator SMITH—both fine gentlemen of character. I can well agree with Senator SMITH'S statement about you folks. He said: "You are going up to talk to the 'salt of the earth.'"

Right here is the home of "Stretch" Garrison, credited in various yarns with riding sharks and porpoises up the Maurice River; with training does to decoy buck deers into his corrals where they were transformed into venison; with raising a rooster that grew tall enough to eat from the porch roof. "Stretch" was a mighty hunter and fisherman and held all records for wood-chopping. No matter what feat was required of him, "Stretch" could do it better. You oldtimers know the story. It reminds me of that mythical character of my own section, Paul Bunyan. You have probably heard of him. He imported some of your Jersey "skeeters" and crossed them with dragon flies and created the model for the modern four-engine Constellation airplane. Yes, it is good to be in New Jersey with folks like you, and with you commemorate the occasion when freedom first rang throughout the land, the first peacetime Fourth of July celebration since 1941.

Let freedom ring.

The holiday—the holy day—of American freedom is at hand. It is the anniversary of the dawn of freedom on this blessed continent after the long night of tyranny and despotism from abroad. The Fourth of July is a holy occasion, a hallowed occasion, a sacred occasion for every man, woman, and child of the Republic.

HISTORY OF INDEPENDENCE DAY

One summer day, 170 years ago, a group of men sat in a plain red brick building in Philadelphia, the Philadelphia State House. Half a hundred Delegates had come there to affix their signatures to a document. It was a bold document, defying one of the mightiest powers of that time. It was a document—the Declaration of Independence—which was to become one of the great landmarks in the history of man's fight for freedom.

The Delegates that day in July 1776 were humble men. There was a farmer named Thomas Jefferson, a printer named Benjamin Franklin, and John Adams, Robert Livingston, and John Hancock and others.

By around 2 o'clock that day, the great document—the Declaration of Independence—had been signed. A little boy ran from the doorway into the street with uplifted arms and gave the tidings of the birth of the new Nation to the crowd that had assembled outside. The little boy gave the word to the men who were waiting to ring the great Liberty Bell.

On that bell there was this message: "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land, to all the inhabitants thereof."

The message on this bell was first spoken to Moses on Mount Sinai by God: "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land, to all the inhabitants thereof."

The bell pealed forth the news of liberty. That message went not only to the people of the infant Thirteen Colonies, but the message encircled the globe.

Thus, American liberty took as its keynote the spiritual message from on high. It was America's destiny to realize that message, to proclaim and maintain liberty for our own people and to inspire all other people by our example.

Freedom really rang.

THE MEANING OF INDEPENDENCE DAY

Fellow Americans, the Fourth of July is no empty occasion. It is not a time for either you or me merely to hear or speak a few patriotic words in the name of an event which occurred a century and three-fourths ago.

The Fourth of July each year is a time for reconsecration. Reconsecration to the principles which the wise founding fathers of 1776 conceived.

To the principles for which the brave men of Valley Forge and Bunker Hill and Lexington and Concord, yes; the brave men of the Argonne Forest and Chateau Thierry in the First World War, and Tarawa, Guadalcanal, Okinawa, Bastogne in the Second World War—the principles for which these brave men fought and died.

To the principles which we have lived by in the American way, in government, in politics, in our business affairs, in agriculture, in science, and art, in these 170 years.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

But why was this occasion so meaningful to America and to the world?

It is not merely that the Thirteen Colonies declared themselves on that day free and independent of Great Britain. It was that these Colonies wrote a Declaration of Independence and gave that declaration to all mankind. That declaration is a living creed on which civil government in our own and all other countries should be based.

The founding fathers proclaimed the sovereignty of the American people. They proclaimed the political equality of all citizens. They established justice.

They set up a reign of law—not the law of dictators, not the law of brute force, but a law of justice, based on the consent of the governed.

What exactly did they say?

I quote:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

How meaningful these words are today, when most of the world is still held in the shackles of dictatorship, when there are forces in our own land which would deny the self-evident truths that men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights, and that among these rights are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

When we consider the greatness of these principles, we see why we should reconsecrate ourselves to the maintenance of freedom and liberty, and to all that these concepts entail.

What are some of these concepts?

They are the concept that government is the servant and not the master of the people. They are the concept that men have enough wisdom and judgment and understanding, under God, to forge their own destiny in their own way without either Government paternalism or intervention.

THE LESSONS OF THE FOURTH OF JULY

And, too, there are certain lessons which we can gain from this holy occasion, from this occasion on which freedom rings out more clearly than on any other day.

THE FIRST LESSON

What are some of those lessons? They are, first, the lesson of sacrifice. Every generation tends to forget that freedom is not only gained by sacrifice, but is preserved by sacrifice. Each generation must renew it and revitalize it.

We dare not forget that the independence which was proclaimed on July 4, 1776, was not actually won by force of arms until 6 years later in October 1781, when Cornwallis surrendered to George Washington at Yorktown. Between those two dates, what heartache, what pain, what anxiety, what sacrifices were experienced by our infant country.

Let us recall the sweat of the men who trod to battle and built the battlements, the tears of the widows of men who did not return from battle, the blood that stained the snow at Valley Forge, and at a thousand other scenes of the battle for freedom.

Yes, the road to freedom was a long one and a hard one, and it is ever such. The Republic is only maintained by the sacrifices willingly made by its citizens on behalf of the general welfare.

THE SECOND LESSON

But there is a second lesson. It is the lesson of alertness. During the Revolutionary War one of the most popular banners carried by the Colonies showed a coiled rattlesnake. Underneath that rattlesnake was the inscription: "Don't tread on me."

This is a message which we might well heed today. Let not any other nation seek to tread on America, on her rights, on her integrity, on her security. Nor let any American nor any group in this country seek to tread on the rights of a fellow American or on the rights of all other groups.

Nothing will prevent such cruel domination except alertness. Perhaps you will remember the words of Thomas Jefferson on his death bed were, and I quote:

"Tell the committee to be on the alert."

Yes, let us all be on the alert. We want no more foreign Pearl Harbors and no domestic Pearl Harbors which will destroy the liberties won after so much struggle.

What constitutes being on the alert in this atomic age? That is the question which every man and woman must answer. That responsibility cannot be passed completely to public servants. Concretely, what is your own idea as to giving away the secrets in relation to the atomic bomb and atomic energy—giving them away to nations which are on a different level from us politically, spiritually, economically; the nations whose whole past indicates that treaties are made and lived up to only when they can say it is to their advantage to do so.

What constitutes being on the alert? Let me tell you the story of the old darky named Mose.

Mose, during the depression, had no home to which he could go. He wandered up and down the highways and byways of the Southland. He had no worldly possessions, only a singing heart. He was a real Singing Sam, but he had no place to rest his head.

Once there was a white man like that. He was called Jesus of Nazareth, and of Him it was said "He was so poor that He had no place to lay His head."

One day this colored man was told, "Mose, you can go up to that half-acre lot. There is an old shack there in which you can live." Mose went there and found that the shack was in very bad condition. The windows were broken, the shutters were about ready to fall off, the doors were falling off their hinges, and the roof was caved in. The half-acre lot was filled with weeds, stones, and poison ivy. But Mose went to work.

By the next spring, Mose had fixed up the little shack. He had put the doors back on the hinges; he had repaired the windows and the roof, and he had painted the little building. Roses were climbing over it. Out in the half-acre lot, the weeds and rocks were gone. Flowers were blooming there.

Just about then the old colored parson came by. He said, "Mose, you and the Lord is sure done a good job here." Mose replied, "Parson, you should have seen it when the Lord had it alone."

One who is on the alert in this period is aware of the racketeer impact of foreign isms, the excessive Government bureaucracy and the reckless spending, the need for balancing the national Budget, the imperative requirement that America go to work again, as one team as she did in the war, in order that production can be had to meet the pressure of our accumulated buying power.

THE THIRD LESSON

But now there is a third lesson which I should like to mention. It is the lesson of the triumph of justice.

"Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just."

These are the words of a great American anthem, words which are followed by the eternal sentiment, "For in God is our trust."

The lesson of the Fourth of July is that justice will triumph, that right will prevail against might, that a free people cannot be downed.

If any cynic were to have surveyed the chances of the infant Nation of surviving that day, July 4, 1776, he might well have had doubts about its chances.

Our Continental Congress had no money of its own. It had no authority either to levy taxes or to borrow. All it could do was issue Continental currency.

Our people at that time faced the largest navy in the world, and even at the close of the Revolutionary War, we had only a few small vessels of our own. We faced a well-trained army, but could muster only a few unskilled and undisciplined colonial volunteers. We faced professional soldiers and could muster against them only men enlisted for short terms. We faced splendidly equipped, well-fed troops, while our own men were wretchedly supplied and fed.

Yet, by force of arms and by the force of ideas, and faith in our cause, truth and justice prevailed.

Let us remember this lesson, my fellow Americans. Truth and justice will prevail. Let us have faith—that faith which moves mountains; that faith which is the substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things unseen; that truth and justice will conquer in 1946 and forevermore, as they conquered in 1776 and 1781.

THE MEANING TO THE FUTURE

The true meaning of Independence Day is a meaning of the future and not of the past. We look back upon the great scene of the half hundred delegates in the Philadelphia State House, signing the Declaration of Independence.

But we look forward to other men signing other compacts in the future which will make for freedom and liberty in America, and throughout the world and, for example, for industrial peace which is so sorely lacking in our own beloved country, for freedom and liberty to work uninterruptedly and for management and labor to enjoy the fruits of their respective toil and for the public to enjoy freedom from industrial conflict.

We remember what Walt Whitman once said:

"Others take finish, but the Republic is ever constructive
And ever keeps vista,
Others adorn the past, but you, O days of the present,
I adorn you.
O, days of the future, I believe in you."

THE VETERANS' PLACE IN THE FUTURE

It is more than appropriate that when we discuss the future of this great Republic that we contemplate the role that our 16,000,000 ex-servicemen of World War II will play in the America of tomorrow. I know how proudly Millville respects her own sons and daughters who went forth to war and who have now returned to resume their respected place in this community.

The ex-servicemen—sons and daughters—of Millville, together with their veteran friends throughout America, have demonstrated their fitness to serve this Nation and this world. They have demonstrated their fitness for leadership in civilian life in the America of today and tomorrow.

These young men and women have journeyed to foreign parts. They have seen other lands and other peoples. From their travels, they have gained a new insight and understanding of the meaning of America to the world and of the wonders of our free way of life in comparison to those of other lands.

These veterans—men and women—know that ours is the best way of life now existing on earth. To them, any such ridiculous claim to the effect that the collectivist way—the Russian way—is better than our own, is ridiculous and is disproved completely by the incomparable standard of living enjoyed by our people and by the priceless liberties and freedoms which are our greatest blessings.

The veterans know, however, that the greatness which America has achieved in the past and present is but a prelude to more wonderful tomorrows, if we all evidence that spirit of work, of cooperation, of thrift, and of industry, which made America great in the days of the past and which saw us through to victory in the war just concluded.

CONCLUSION

My fellow citizens, you and I have briefly contemplated the history of this wonderful occasion. We have seen some of the lessons of this occasion. We have felt the need for reconsecration of ourselves to the principles of July 4, 1776. We say now, as the youngster said in effect that summer day 170 years ago outside the Philadelphia statehouse: "Let freedom ring. Let freedom ring."

We say: "Let the Liberty Bell peal forth the message—'Proclaim liberty throughout all the land and unto all the inhabitants thereof.'"

On this day we say in our hearts the words of an anonymous poet:

"Lord, the people of the land
In Thy presence humbly stand;
On this day, when Thou didst free
Men of old from tyranny,
We, their children, bow to Thee.

"With one heart the Nation cries,
From our choral lips arise
Thou didst point a noble way
For our fathers through the fray;
Lead their children thus today."

The OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. LEE O'DANIEL

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address which I made this afternoon at 3:30 p. m. over the American Broadcasting system.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow countrymen, George Washington, the father of our country, in his farewell address to the American people, warned us against entangling alliances with foreign nations, and he also solemnly warned us that the danger to the United States was not from without, but from within. Today we know how wise those warnings were. Today we know we failed to heed them. We got tangled up in the affairs of foreign nations, and the terrible price we paid in the loss of our precious men and women who fought and won the war for us is today fresh in our memory. We have also failed to heed the warning of the Father of our Country about the danger on the home front. As a result our democratic form of Government is being destroyed by people right here in America. OPA is one of the most dangerous weapons used by the New Deal dynasty in overthrowing our American form of government. These New Deal politicians have discovered that they can get more votes and larger political campaign contributions by advocating OPA than by any other trick. It is not the welfare of the people that concerns them. They have no interest whatever in helping poor people get food, and they have no hesitancy whatever in overthrowing our American form of government. What they want is to continue in power, regardless of what happens to our people and our form of government. Let us remember the admonition of Thomas Jefferson when he said, "In questions of power let no more be heard of confidence in man but bind him down from mischief by the chain of the Constitution." Let me list some of the groups of voters the New Deal gang is catering to when they fight for the renewal of defunct OPA.

First. They get the complete support of every Communist, Red, and radical in this Nation. Second, they get the complete support and heavy money contributions from the huge army of racketeers and underworld characters who grow rich by operating black markets which are created by OPA and could not continue without OPA. Third, they get the votes and financial support of many of the largest merchants and manufacturers in the Nation who worm their stooges into OPA positions to write rules and regulations which benefit them, and impose restrictions on the smaller merchants and manufacturers who are their competitors. And last, but not least, they get the support of some people in the great rank and file of honest, patriotic American citizens who are misled by the tricky propaganda which is carried on by hundreds of agencies of the New Deal dynasty, all of which is paid for out of the taxpayers' pockets.

Now friends, I was born and raised in dire poverty. I have rubbed shoulders all my life with honest hard-working people. I understand and respect the plain citizens and I regard them as the real backbone of this Nation. I am proud that I am one of that large group. I have the utmost confidence in the rank and file of the common citizens of this Nation. Nine times out of 10 or more often than that they will do the right thing, providing they know the truth, and the whole truth, about the subject. While most of my friends are plain, every-day working people, they are honest, honorable, and real loyal Americans.

In all of my wide acquaintance I can truthfully say that I do not know of a single person who would go to the polls and vote the Socialist ticket. They would not vote for a government that would take property away from other citizens and give it to them. They are self-reliant and would not tolerate socialism in any form. It takes a trained detective to recognize socialism when it is all dressed up in a fake costume like it is being introduced to the American people by our scheming politicians, but the sound people of this Nation are not asleep. They recognize the deceit and deception of those tricky politicians. OPA is pure socialism, and nothing else. It uses the force of law to take money out of the pockets of some of our taxpaying citizens and uses that money to pay part of the grocery and fuel bill of other citizens. It does not do this to help the poor people, but to win votes of the poor folks and rich folks alike, because this New Deal dynasty helps pay the grocery bill, and the fuel bill of the richest families on Fifth Avenue. By the use of false propaganda the New Deal administration dresses up socialism in the garb of a saint and deceives thousands of honest housewives and other buyers. It tricks you into supporting socialism under the guise of trying to make you believe that they are enabling you to buy your groceries, clothes, and other commodities cheaper than you would in a free competitive market.

Every housewife knows that under OPA the quality of every loaf of bread she buys is lowered, the size of the loaf is smaller, and the price is higher. Although we have an abundance of wheat, you find it difficult to get bread at your grocery store or bakery. The quality of all foods and manufactured products is lowered to the lowest standard possible. Even with this lowered quality, reduced weight, and scarcity, the OPA during the past few weeks has deliberately increased the prices of more than 500 commodities which you buy. The tremendously high cost of administering OPA and paying subsidies has cost the American people many billions of dollars. This enormous amount of money has been borrowed and added onto the huge public debt for you, your children, and your children's children to pay, with compound interest. Do you honest folks of this Nation want this socialism? Do you approve this deceit and deception? Do you want to harness this terrific tax burden onto your children and grandchildren to pay? I do not believe you do. I have utmost confidence in you, and I believe you have been tricked into it.

Abraham Lincoln said that the Lord must have liked the poor folks because he made so many of us. Abraham Lincoln was known as a poor man and as Honest Abe. I believe that most poor folks are honest and God-fearing. And let me tell you that it is the poor people who will have to pay this enormous public debt of around $300,000,000,000, with compound interest, and it will take over 100 years to pay it. Practically all tax money is collected from poor people in hidden taxes. Every article you buy includes a tax. The large corporations do not pay any taxes—they simply add the taxes they are to pay into the price at which they sell their products. Thus they collect their taxes from their customers, and simply pass the money on to the Government.

So when these New Deal political demagogs shout from the housetop about collecting the taxes from the giant corporations and the wealthy people, they know it is not true; they are only trying to deceive you.

I am not complaining about the big corporations, or the little corporations, or anybody else, either large or small, making a legitimate profit. What I am doing is exposing these deceitful and dishonest politicians who are trying to deceive and mislead a lot of honest, hard-working, patriotic poor folks. When you folks see that by supporting the OPA you are supporting socialism in America, I believe you will rise up in righteous indignation and wire or write you Senators and Congressmen in Washington to do everything in their power to keep OPA dead and buried. OPA, in addition to being purely socialistic, is also communistic. I do not believe many of our citizens would vote the Communist ticket, but in supporting OPA you are voting for pure communism. As proof of this statement, I remind you that OPA is being supported by every Communist, Red, and radical in this Nation, without exception. I also warn you that the main objective of communism is to overthrow our American form of government. The two best known methods for wrecking a person, business institution, or a government is to stop their production and squander their accumulated resources. OPA does both. In over 150 years this Nation, without OPA, never had a serious famine, but with OPA in operation less than 5 years, production has been stopped to such an extent that we are now suffering a severe famine in bread, butter, meat, milk, clothing, building material, farm machinery, household appliances, and most everything else.

Thomas Jefferson once said, "Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap we should soon want bread." Our people now want bread and all because this New Deal dynasty has told our farmers when to sow and when to reap and then set the prices of what they reaped below the cost of production. OPA and other quack political bureaus of the New Deal dynasty have squandered the accumulated resources of our people until taxes of varying amounts from 20 percent up to 95 percent of the income of all of our people vanishes as fast as it is collected, and on top of that a public debt of around $300,000,000,000 has been piled on the backs of the weary and confused taxpayers. Do you folks out yonder want any more of this dangerous red communism that is eating the very heart out of our Nation and destroying our American form of government? I do not believe you do. Then wire or write your Senators and Congressmen to do everything within their power to keep OPA dead and buried. OPA is unconstitutional. There is not one single word or sentence in the Constitution of the United States wherein the people of this Nation delegated to their Federal Government the right to set a price on their lives, or one single hour of their time devoted to any kind of work, or for the product produced by them working 1 hour or 1 day or 1 week. The citizens retained that God-given right to themselves. We are supposed to be free people to raise wheat, cattle, or hogs—or write a book, or catch fish, or teach school or preach a sermon, and charge for your services or the products you produce, exactly what you want to charge for them, and keep them if nobody will pay your price. OPA robs you of that great freedom which is guaranteed to you by the Constitution.

Some of you good people may rejoice when your fickle Government, to gain your vote, takes the pound of butter away from some poor farmer and passes it along to you at a price below what he wants for it, but if you subscribe to that philosophy now, just bear in mind that under that same philosophy your Government will get around to you some day and take away from you some of your prized possessions and give them to some other citizen who wants them, and pay you much less for them than you desire to accept, and you can do absolutely nothing about it. Break down the constitutional fence that protects the rights of other citizens and your own property or services are exposed to the same ravishing forces that destroy all human liberties and freedoms. The fires of communism have already destroyed the freedom of millions of good people in other nations who misplaced their trust in the hands of tricky politicians, and it is sweeping this Nation now under the cloak of social justice and other flimsy, false colors.

OPA is un-American, and everybody who has enjoyed Americanism in this Nation who will stop just a moment and honestly study the case, is forced to admit that it is un-American. It violates every principle of Americanism and blocks the aims and aspirations of boys and girls at the cross-roads and grass roots from ever getting above the first rung of the ladder of success, unless they get the wink or nod from some fat bureaucrat in the New Deal dynasty, and become forever its willing stooge or rubber stamp. OPA is unnecessary. Americans lived and grew and prospered for over 150 years without OPA, and under it less than 5 years our economic life has withered and almost died. I plead with you, my fellow countrymen, to go on bended knees before your God and ask Him for wisdom to understand this subject and courage to take your stand on the right side of the line. It is more important that you retain your freedom, liberty, and independence than it is that some bureaucrat in Washington dictate the price you shall pay for a pound of beef that you cannot find. It is time for action. The momentous question as to whether you folks in this Nation are to lose your liberty, freedom, and independence is now being decided by your Senators and Congressmen in Washington. There is no time to lose. Wire or write your Senators and Congressmen now, and urge them to use their power to defeat the bill that is intended to resurrect OPA and reimpose its bureaucratic dictation on the free citizens of this Nation.

Law and Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a short but beautiful poem entitled "Law and Peace," by Capt. James P. McGovern, of the District of Columbia bar. The poem was originally published in the February 1945 issue of the Journal of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAW AND PEACE

(By James P. McGovern)

What is the brotherhood of him who knows no brother?
What is the faith of him whose creed respects
no other?
What is the kin of him who wrongs dust,
all men's mother?
What is the peace of him who sets it for another?

Solon made laws for Greece, Aurelius for Rome;
Moses write rules for Hebrews, Christ taught
all Christiandom;
Hammurabi's Code graced a Babylonian dome;
All Europe has justice stored in many an ancient tome.

The law is always dead in parchment, marble,
stone,
Unless each generation relives it as its own;
"A scrap of paper," adorned with names,
tempts power on its throne
As fuel for world-wide flames by all the four winds blown.

When the spirit transcends the law, men see beyond the letter,
When justice frames the law, revenge has no abettor,
When mercy guides the law, virtue holds vice its debtor,
When hearts enshrine the law, peace stands free from fetter.

The Equal Rights Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix excerpts from a letter by the General Counsel of the Federal Security Agency, in his individual capacity, showing the adverse effect of the so-called equal rights amendment—Senate Joint Resolution 61—on old-age and survivors insurance under the Social Security Act.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In its most recent form the proposed amendment would provide that "equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex."

Because of the very general nature of this language the actual legal effect of the amendment in any given situation, until there has been some process of judicial interpretation, would be extremely difficult to predict. It would, however, in my opinion jeopardize certain of the basic and most recently adopted features of the old-age and survivors insurance program.

The 1939 amendments to the Social Security Act, adopted after a period of study of experience under the original statute, were designed to strengthen and extend the principles and objectives of the act. The changes were particularly extensive in the title providing old-age benefits. Broadly speaking, these changes expanded that program from one providing benefits only to insured wage earners to one which provides benefits for insured wage earners, for their wives and minor children, for widows and children of deceased wage earners, and for aged parents who had been dependent on an insured worker who died without leaving a widow or child. The scope of this program and its significance in terms of protection on the death or retirement of the family wage earner is suggested by the fact that over 65,000,000 persons now living have earned some wage credits in covered employment.

PROVISIONS ARE BASED ON DIFFERENCES BETWEEN MEN AND WOMEN

Under these new provisions a woman who is 65 and is not herself an insured wage earner may receive a monthly benefit equal to one-half the monthly benefit of her husband. A husband, however, is in no case entitled to benefits based upon his wife's entitlement to benefits. Again, the widow of an insured wage earner may be eligible for benefits if she is 65 or if, although less than 65, she has in her care a child of the deceased wage earner. A widower has no similar right based upon the insured status of his deceased wife.

A further differentiation involves the requirement that for entitlement to a child's benefits, the child must have been dependent upon the insured parent who has qualified for benefits or died. The definition of the dependency of a child upon a mother differs from that of its dependency upon a father. Generally a child would automatically meet the requirements for dependency upon a father, but dependency upon the mother can arise only if at the appropriate time the father was neither living with nor contributing to the support of the child.

The variations introduced into the program in 1939 were designed, as the House and Senate committee reports show, to afford more adequate protection to the family as a unit and especially to pay benefits more in accord with the probable needs of the beneficiaries. The criteria for establishing child dependency were designed not only for the protection of the family as a unit and to accord with probable needs, but to facilitate the administration of the act by making it unnecessary to inquire in each case into the details of economic dependency.

More striking than any of the present variations based on sex is the proposal to reduce from 65 to 60 the eligibility age for a woman who is otherwise qualified for benefits whether as wife, widow, or parent, or on the basis of her own earnings. Whereas the present differentiations apply only where a marital relationship is involved, this change would for the first time make a distinction between insured men and insured women in the rights based upon their individual earnings. The Social Security Board bases this recommendation on what it believes to be differences in fact. One of these is that women when they are in their sixties have greater difficulty in getting or keeping positions than do men of the same age. The other is that wives are ordinarily younger than their husbands with the result that when a worker retires at 65 there is usually a lag before the wife reaches 65 and becomes eligible for benefits as the wife of an insured worker.

CONGRESS AND STATE LEGISLATURES WOULD BE RESTRICTED IN DEALING WITH SOCIAL-SECURITY LEGISLATION

Differences in earnings and occupation, differences in age, differences between married persons and single persons, differences between spouses and parents, differences between parents and collateral relatives, and differences between men and women are among those which Congress has hitherto been free to take into consideration in the development of the social-security program. Aside, therefore, from its effect on the present provisions of the act, the amendment might compel a drastic change in the basis on which social security legislation may be developed in the future. However the amendment is ultimately construed, its legal effect appears to be in the direction of tying rather than in freeing the hands of Congress and of State legislatures in dealing with such legislation.

ADMINISTRATION OF PROGRAM WOULD BE DISRUPTED

If the amendment should be adopted and Congress should leave the Social Security Act unchanged, litigations involving the constitutionality of these features of the old-age and survivors insurance program would seem very probable. On the other hand, if Congress acted to eliminate these differentiations, it might do so by providing the same benefits for men as are now provided for women, thereby increasing the cost of the system, by eliminating benefits now provided for women that are not also provided for men, or by decreasing the benefits for women under certain circumstances and providing equal benefits for men under the same circumstances.

The amendment would have a disrupting effect on the administration of the program also, because of the uncertainties which it would introduce into the field of State law. In determining whether an applicant for old-age or survivors benefits is the wife, widow, child, or parent of an insured person, the Board is required to apply the law which would be applied in determining the devolution of intestate personal property in the State in which the insured is domiciled. The laws involved vary greatly from State to State and embrace such matters as marriage and divorce, adoption, guardianship, and the law of intestate property, as to which there are many differentiations based on sex. It is quite impossible to estimate the effect of the amendment in this broad field.

The statements contained in this letter are my own and are not intended to represent the position of the Social Security Board or the Federal Security Agency.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE TO DEFEAT THE UNEQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT.

Preservation of United States Shipping

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Boston American of July 2 entitled "We Must Save United States Shipping."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE MUST SAVE UNITED STATES SHIPPING

Congress should either amend the Civil Aeronautics Act to permit the operation of an integrated sea-air service in the world-trade lanes by American steamship companies, or pass an entirely new enabling act.

Otherwise the magnificent American merchant marine, which did so much to win the recent war and which is so essential to the peacetime prosperity of the United States, will wither and die.

The present Civil Aeronautics Act is inadequate in this situation, not because Congress ever intended that American steamship companies should be forbidden to operate air services in conjunction with their existing surface fleets, but because the meddling and bungling Civil Aeronautics Board has arbitrarily misinterpreted the intent of the act and has arrogantly distorted its own authority under the act.

The Civil Aeronautics Board has passed a death sentence against the American merchant marine in its prohibition against an integrated sea-air service under the American flag, and it has thus become the duty of Congress to intercede—lest the total destruction of American maritime enterprise be accomplished.

It is inevitable that in the future maritime advantage and prosperity will accrue solely to those nations of the world which combine their air and sea facilities to best meet the requirements of world travel and transport.

All of the maritime nations of the world, except the United States, have moved swiftly to effect this indispensable combination.

At least four powerful maritime nations—Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and the Netherlands—have established overseas air lines in which private steamship shipping enterprises of those countries have either controlling or substantial interest.

At least five other powerful maritime nations—England, France, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand—are undertaking integrated Government operation of air lines and steamship companies in overseas commerce.

At least 43 additional countries, either presently or potentially powerful in maritime enterprise, have the right under treaties which the United States is pledged to honor to use aircraft and steamships jointly in world commerce and in a manner competitive with American maritime and aviation enterprise.

All of these foreign maritime and aviation enterprises, constituting an integrated sea-air service in all instances, have been or in the future will be approved by the Civil Aeronautics Board and given authority to utilize American ports and facilities.

But the nine American steamship companies which have petitioned their Government for the same right have been refused it.

Unless Congress intercedes, it will be the fixed policy of the United States under the ruling of the Civil Aeronautics Board that neither any of these nine nor any other American steampship company will be permitted to match the superior facilities of their foreign competitors.

In this event, the American steamship companies will go out of business and the American merchant marine will go out of existence.

Since the Civil Aeronautics Board has failed and refused to interpret and enforce the Civil Aeronautics Act in our American interest, according to the intent of Congress, why does not Congress clarify its intent and compel its fulfillment?

Birth of a Nation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Marquis Childs, from the Washington Post of July 4, 1946:

BIRTH OF A NATION

(By Marquis Childs)

Across the Pacific a new nation is coming into being, choosing as a formal birthday our own Independence Day. For nearly half a century destiny has linked the United States and the Philippines.

While historians like to trace orderly patterns, human events seen from a little distance off have an air of formless accident. Only a few Americans understood what it meant at the turn of the century to take possession of the Philippines from Spain.

We had blundered into what many were later to call imperialism. The world sugar market collapsed as Germany used subsidies to pour beet sugar into markets that had been monopolized by the Carribbean. One consequence was the explosion in Cuba aimed at the tired, corrupt rule of Spain.

Uncle Sam, acting partly as defender of the weak and the oppressed and partly in the interest of rich Americans with large investments, stepped in. It was a glorious little war. Our victory was swift and overwhelming. One of the prizes was those Pacific islands that were picturesque and a long way off.

A few Americans, Theodore Roosevelt was one, understood that in keeping the Philippines we had projected our frontier to the coast of China. We had made ourselves for the first time in our history a world power with world responsibility.

Still most Americans did not want to recognize it. Right up until Pearl Harbor many Americans wanted to go on pretending that nothing had been changed by the fact that we had acquired what we called a Territory 5,000 miles away.

Our record in relation to that Territory has been good. We set out to give the Filipinos independence and with some minor deviations we held to that line. In fact our record has been so good that it impressed colonial peoples throughout Asia. It gave them confidence in our intentions.

This historic Independence Day does not, of course, close the record. Technically speaking, the Philippines have their independence. But without our cooperation and continuing assistance it will prove a doubtful gift.

The Philippines suffered fearful losses during all three phases of the war—the fall, the occupation, and the liberation. The ravages in terms of both property and human life were terrible.

Without help from the United States the Filipinos cannot rebuild their islands. Much depends for the future on the nature of that help and how it is administered.

Congress has authorized generous sums for Philippine reconstruction. If that money is used largely to restore the property of foreign investors, the mass of the Filipino people will be left worse off than they were before the war. Apparently there are many who now believe that the perils and sacrifices they endured in the resistance movement were in vain. They see those restored to power who prospered during the occupation.

There are, it sems to me, two dangers ahead for the new Philippine Nation. One is that the United States economic embrace will continue to be so all-pervasive that the Philippines will remain an economic colony even though they have achieved political independence.

The second danger is that the hold of the United States military, both Army and Navy, will be so excessive that independence will be a carefully fostered fiction. Cooperation is essential. The terms of that cooperation can be worked out so the security of the islands, both for the Filipinos and their friends on the other side of the Pacific is assured. But it must be worked out on a new basis with the rights of the Filipinos clearly recognized.

There is evidence that our Navy would like to take over the Pacific as an American lake. Repeated protests are coming over the treatment accorded native populations on Guam and Samoa. The Navy, if these reports are to be credited, comes as conqueror, laying down a law which is a different law from the one under which the white conquerors live.

If Navy policy is to predominate, and apparently it is, the Navy will govern the islands that after World War I were mandated to Japan. We know, of course, that we have only the noblest intentions. But as Andre Visson and William Hard point out in an article in the current Reader's Digest, this business of taking sole authority over Pacific islands does not look quite the same to other people as it does to us.

Millions of brown and yellow people in the Pacific know they have a stake in the outcome of Philippine independence. For them this Fourth of July can have a new and an even greater significance than it had before.

Republicans Are Filibustering Wagner-Ellender-Taft Housing Bill in Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it is much to be regretted that Republican members of the Banking and Currency Committee have undertaken a filibuster against the Ellender-Wagner-Taft public-housing bill, in the face of urgent Nation-wide demands from the people, and above all from returning servicemen, that this bill will be expedited.

I hope the House Commitee on Banking and Currency will not permit the long delays which kept the bill in committee in the other body; but already it has been 2½ months since the bill was passed by the Senate, and referred to the Committee in the House.

We know of the savage fight against any adequate relief of the housing shortage through public action which has been made by the powerful and widely ramified housing lobby—we remember all too clearly the battle against the veterans' housing bill. The same forces are endeavoring to defeat the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill by any means which may come to their hands. I imagine that every Member of the House is receiving the same propaganda barrage I am getting in opposition to this much-needed bill. Meanwhile rents are soaring, with OPA dead or dying. We have brought our servicemen out of the fox holes; but we offer them nothing but hell holes for homes.

If the Republicans should persist in these unfair and dilatory tactics, I feel it should be brought to the attention of the whole country and the blame should be squarely placed where it belongs—on the Republican Party.

When the newspapers publish a picture of an ex-GI and his wife and baby camping in a tent, let the veterans know the Republicans are holding up the Wagner housing bill.

When the papers publish a picture of a family served with a notice of an exorbitant rental increase, let the people know the Republicans are holding up the Wagner housing bill.

The papers are filled with stories of extortionate rents, of a housing shortage so acute that even those who can afford to pay outrageous prices cannot find a roof to go over their heads—let the people know that the Republican Party has blocked and obstructed by every unfair means the effort this administration has made to relieve the situation, while the real-estate lobby has distorted and misrepresented facts.

Mr. Speaker, I know there are quite a few Republicans, in and out of the House, who disapprove of these delays. I hope they will make their influence felt and will persuade their colleagues on the House Banking and Currency Committee to stop their willful delays and the filibuster they have been conducting these last 2 months.

In that connection, as I have stated, I have received hundreds of messages from civic and social and public organizations, from veterans' groups, and above all from individuals who cannot find a house or build one, and from outstanding citizens who have a keen realization of the need for this bill.

I shall not encumber the RECORD with any large number of these; but I am inserting a letter received from the Honorable Edward J. Kelly, mayor of Chicago, with my reply, and a letter from Public Housing Association, Inc., of Chicago, with resolutions adopted by representatives of 109 organizations at a conference:

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
CITY OF CHICAGO,
April 26, 1946.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It is most heartening to learn that the Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill had the full support of the Senate and is now before the House.

In November of last year as you undoubtedly will recall, we communicated with you informing you it was our desire to support this legislation, and you generously promised your full assistance.

This bill, as you are well aware, authorizes the most comprehensive, long-range housing and urban redevelopment program ever considered by the United States Congress, and the welfare and future progress of Chicago and other large cities will be vitally affected by the outcome of the legislation.

Therefore, I urgently request you to give this program your immediate consideration and lend your complete support toward getting the measure approved in the House, which will mean the beginning of the rebuilding of many of our cities.

Thanking you for your usual splendid support and helpfulness, and with best personal wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. KELLY,
Mayor.

APRIL 30, 1946.

The Honorable EDWARD J. KELLY,
Mayor of Chicago.

MY DEAR MAYOR: Thank you for your letter of April 26 regarding the Wagner-Taft-Ellender public-housing bill. I am happy to assure you that I have anticipated your own interest. The bill has my unequivocal support, and there already is an informal steering committee composed of House supporters of this proposal, of which I am one.

The principal danger to the bill comes, of course, from the powerful and ruthless group of industries loosely termed the "real estate lobby." My information is that elaborate plans and a substantial fund exist for the purpose of combating the bill. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today I am inserting one of the frankest statements I have seen, together with my answer.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. SABATH.

PUBLIC HOUSING ASSOCIATION INC.,
Chicago, Ill., June 6, 1946.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SABATH: At a conference called by Public Housing Association on Wednesday, June 5, 1946, in the city hall council chambers, the enclosed recommendations were endorsed by delegates from approximately 100 organizations, a list of which is also enclosed, representing many hundreds of thousands of citizens of Chicago.

We urge your immediate attention to the recommendations and beg that at this time of great crisis you exert every effort in behalf of their enactment into law without delay.

In addition to adopting the program, prepared in advance of the meeting, the assembly unanimously and insistently urged that immediate action be taken to put the Chicago veterans' emergency housing program back into operation.

Sincerely yours,

RUTH ATLAS BINSTOCK,
Acting Executive Director.

FEDERAL

1. Immediate enactment of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill. This measure, which has been termed by Wyatt an integral part of the veterans' emergency housing program and which provides the added tools needed to make the program succeed, has already been passed by the Senate by overwhelming vote and now awaits action by the House of Representatives.

The bill provides financing aids to stimulate the production of 1,250,000 dwellings a year, all except 125,000 (10 percent of the total) to be privately built, and to be built mainly for the middle-income groups in which brackets most veterans fall. The provisions making federally guaranteed mortgages available to cooperative- and mutual-ownership housing and providing for "yield insurance" for private moderate-rent housing are vitally needed by veterans. In addition, the bill provides for continuous research in the housing field so that new, better, and less expensive methods of construction may be developed which of course would greatly benefit veterans.

2. Retention of OPA and price and rent control for at least 1 year, and as much longer thereafter as may be necessary until the supply of housing and building materials catches up with the present tremendous demand.

3. Additional legislation to give the National Housing Expediter the authority to curb the inflationary price increases in existing houses and apartments and on lots.

4. Additional Federal appropriations to pay the costs of converting and moving additional surplus military and naval barracks and war housing to communities for veterans' dwellings in the event that the local or national quotas for permanent veterans' housing are not met. The Federal Government should also bear the expense of site improvement where local communities, such as Chicago, are unable to supply sufficient funds.

5. Utilization of the Gardiner General Hospital for emergency veterans' housing. The War Department should transfer this structure, formerly the Chicago Beach Hotel, to the Federal Public Housing Authority, thus making it available for use as a veterans' housing project.

A Couple of Masks and a Little Imagination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article from Political Guide, a publication of the National Citizens Political Action Committee, entitled "A Couple of Masks and a Little Imagination."

This is an amazing article which I think should be read by every thoughtful citizen.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A COUPLE OF MASKS AND A LITTLE IMAGINATION

The "living newspaper" type of drama can be a powerful campaign technique, particularly effective in dramatizing the record of your Congressman. The form is remarkably adaptable, easy to produce, and valuable in making a political rally unstereotyped and exciting.

USE THE BEST TALENT

Writing and acting talent are needed to produce a living newspaper, but they need not be professional talent. Any community group will find it has the necessary people. Get the best writing talent available and keep everything simple.

One way to dramatize the effect your Congressman has or can have on the people of the community is to use a mask to represent the candidate you oppose or the one you support. Of use two masks—one for each. If you can't find anyone to make a mask, a large picture or cartoon will do. It should be hung fairly high on the stage and large enough to be seen clearly and recognized by the audience.

The mask is the principal character of the play. The voice of the mask will be spoken by the most talented actor in the group. If a public-address system is available, let the unseen actor use the mike and hang the loud speaker behind or near the mask. The mask should light up as he speaks. This is easily done by connecting a spotlight on the mask or a light in the mask to a simple doorbell switch on the actor's desk. He only has to push the bell and hold it down while he speaks.

On each side of the proscenium arch on the apron of the stage, place a table, chair, small lamp, and complete script. These are for the commentators—a man or a woman prominent in community activities or both. They act as chairmen, commentators, prompters, announcers, or even stage managers. Their parts call for them to introduce scenes which will be played on the stage; to argue with the mask, to give the facts which prove or misprove his statements; to call on members of the audience for their side of the picture. Although they may read from scripts, it is best for them to be both casual and dramatic, and to seem to speak extemporaneously.

Have a member of the audience get up and introduce the chairman to the audience to begin the show. A chairman may then introduce the mask. The latter's speeches may be mainly quotations from his political speeches. If he is the villain of the play, it will probably be fairly easy to use his own words against him.

USE SHORT SKITS

Short skits are the backbone. Simply put the happenings in the lives of the audience into dialog. The people play themselves. Let the mask, the commentators, and the audience interrupt the skits for variety and sharp excitement. Let the mask, commentator, and audience argue amongst themselves between skits.

For example, a commentator might call on a committeeman—planted in the audience—for a report on a situation. The mask ridicules the report. An argument ensues. The chairman supplies the facts that prove who is right, or introduces a skit on stage which show the effect on the people of the community of the report and the mask's action or inaction.

AUDIENCE PARTICIPATES

Or, if the candidate perhaps has a bad labor record the mask might say: "Our veterans will not tolerate labor strikes." The chairman then may cite the case of a veteran who was wounded and is now on a picket line fighting for a better wage. Then the veteran himself may come on stage with his family and act out a short scene showing their struggle to get along.

Or the mask may make a racist remark. A Negro will rise from the audience and tell how he and his people have contributed to the wealth and the strength of the country. He can protest the discrimination which denies him good housing and a good job. The mask and the man it represents are being dramatized as an enemy to the community. The audience will carry this picture of him out of the theater.

Keep everything informal. Call everyone by first names. Don't try anything that depends on complicated scenic effects, lighting, or timing. Be sure all speeches and skits are short. Keep the show short if possible.

ROBERT L. CRAIG.

Northwestern University Conference on UNO

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, not long ago I had one of the most inspiring experiences I have ever had. I attended a meeting at Northwestern University on the concluding night of the week of what was called United Nations Week, during the course of which more than 200 students at Northwestern University had devoted themselves to a simulation of the United Nations Organization. They had a great parade. They did a magnificent job in educating the student body to the meaning and importance of the United Nations Organization as an instrument for peace.

I have a letter from one of the ladies who had an important share in making that program possible. She is chairman of the preparatory commission. Her name is Rozanne Rupp. She has given me a complete statement of how the United Nations Organization simulation was organized on Northwestern campus. I feel that it is of great public interest, and will interest as well the Members of the Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EVANSTON, ILL., June 1, 1946.

DEAR SENATOR PEPPER: I have not as yet had a personal chance to express my sincere appreciation for your cooperation and your interest in our Northwestern UNO. Your speech was a splendid climax to a successful conference, and your interest in our efforts has proved to be an incentive to all those students who worked so diligently on this year's conference.

When you were here in April you expressed a desire to have an informal written record of the history of our UNO. I held up the writing of this record so that I could send you at the same time a copy of our Post Conference Bulletin which gives a complete summary of our final resolutions, but publication on this bulletin was delayed with the strikes, and it will be sent to you within the next 3 weeks.

The idea of a UNO conference on this campus came to Barbara Park and myself last October. We both felt that college education had skipped over the most important phase of learning, by that I mean the current affairs and problems of today. We felt that the students (ourselves included) knew far too little about the situation of the world. It was our desire to make our campus UNO conscious, to prepare the students, in part, for the problems that will be theirs to solve when they leave the sheltering walls of college, and to grow together, as a student body, in our understanding of the United Nations Charter, its structure, its weaknesses, and its aims.

Barbara and I drew up a plan which we submitted to the junior council of our college, of which we are both members, and our plan for a Northwestern UNO was accepted.

With the backing of the junior council we then presented our plan for approval to the student governing board. The plan was accepted and the first step was the drawing up of a preparatory commission to plan and execute the plans for the conference. The following representative group was selected:

Eleanor "Pinky" Hudgins was a representative from the senior council and was elected secretary of the preparatory commission.

Don Campbell was a representative from the sophomore council and he was elected copublicity chairman of the preparatory commission.

Cliff Mezey was a representative from the freshman council and was elected speakers chairman for the conference.

Eleanor Durham was a representative from the Young Women's Christian Association and she was elected special nations chairman.

Hugo Hollereth was a representative from the Young Men's Christian Association and he was elected treasurer of the preparatory commission.

Bill Lim of the international relations club was elected commissions chairman of the conference.

Barbara Park and myself were elected as representatives from the junior council and Barbara was elected copublicity chairman and I was elected chairman of the preparatory commission.

The commission moved ahead from this point, completing the final plans, choosing an adviser—Dr. John McDiarmid, an associate professor of political science—and setting the week for the conference April 22–26.

The Northwestern board of trustees made our UNO financially possible through their generous gift of $1,000 for our expenses. Realizing the importance of this conference in stimulating more interest in world problems among the students, President Snyder made the recommendation to the board after meeting with the chairman and several members of the preparatory commission.

Next the preparatory commission went to work assigning countries to organizations. We worked according to sorority houses, fraternity houses, independent housing units, and large organizations on campus. We took the population of each of the 72 countries in the world (we didn't want to limit our study to the United Nations alone, but the non-United Nation countries were not voting members in the general assembly, but could petition for membership into our united nations). Next we took the population of all the organizations that would be representing countries and grouped countries and organizations into classes according to population so that the largest countries would be represented by the largest organizations. The four class councils represented the Big Four: The senior council represented China, the junior council represented Russia, the sophomore council represented the United States, and the freshman council represented Great Britain. Anchor and eagle, the veterans' organization here on the campus, represented France.

Each organization was then asked to elect two delegates to represent their country in the general assembly. The delegates were asked to act as mediators to get their organizations interested in the United Nations problems and to carry back the happenings in the general assembly to their organizations.

At the first general assembly meeting, plans for the conference were discussed and the set-up of the commissions was explained. It was our idea to have four commissions: an amendments commission, to pass on amendments to the United Nations Charter, an atomic energy commission to prepare a report, in the form of resolutions, as to what should be done with the atomic bomb, a social and economic commission, to report on trade and economic problems of the world, and a trusteeship and colonies commission, to report on the colonial phase of world problems. Nations, not individuals, would be elected to these commissions—there would be 10 voting members and two nonvoting members on each commission. Nations—six nations—would also be elected to the security council (these six members plus United States, Russia, Great Britain, China, and France made up our security council). The elections of the commissions and of the security council took place at the second general assembly meeting. Each of the 72 nations was allowed two minutes to speak, explaining why they believed that their nation should be represented on the amendments commission or on the atomic energy commission or on whichever commission they believed that their country could do the most good, not only for the country itself but for the world as a whole. After the election of the commissions and the security council, elections were held for chairman and secretary-general of the general assembly. Frank Haiman, a delegate from Ethiopia, was elected chairman, and Edith Bannon, a delegate from Czechoslovakia, was elected secretary-general. Frank and Edith were automatically made members of the Preparatory Commission. Marv Chaiken, when he was elected president of the Security Council, also became a member of the Preparatory Commission.

After the commission and security council elections the work began in earnest. Members of our faculty were asked to act as advisors to each of the commissions and chairmen of the commissions were elected. The commissions formed committees and subcommittees and set to work on their background work and reports. The commissions met twice or three times a week, sometimes holding open meetings, so that the entire student body would have the chance to hear a particular speaker that the commission may have asked to speak to add to their background knowledge on their problems. The commissions handed in reports on their progress every 2 weeks to the Preparatory Commission. Meanwhile the General Assembly held weekly meetings, and the Preparatory Commission continued to meet twice a week. All our work was headed toward United Nations Week. During this week we would have outside speakers discussing the problems which we had been studying. During this week all the resolutions of the commissions would be handed in and passed, amended, or rejected in the General Assembly, and then our final resolutions would be read the final night of the conference.

In the meantime the Preparatory Commission planned a speaker's forum, using representatives of four of the Chicago newspapers, to speak before the student body on the future of the UNO. This really started student thinking in the direction of the United Nations, and the houses and organizations began to have bull sessions at dinner and in the evening to discuss world problems so that they would have more background in understanding the purpose of the UNO here on the campus. The members of the Preparatory Commission divided up the organizations and went to talk and lead discussions in each of the houses.

Our UNO followed as closely as possible the real UNO structure, but our attitude toward world problems was different in this respect. We worked with the element of time in mind in drawing up our resolutions. Perhaps our resolutions would not completely answer the problem today or tomorrow, but in drawing up our resolutions we looked ahead to the time when we would enforce them as voting members of the United States. As you read over the resolutions you will see what I mean.

On April 17, Quincy Wright, from the University of Chicago, spoke on the atomic bomb and its problems to the student body.

Monday morning our United Nations Week really began after all our months of planning. The beginning was heralded by a special edition of our school newspaper, put out by members of the Preparatory Commission, with the week's events, the history of the Northwestern UNO, and backgrounds of all the speakers.

A parade on Monday night with all the countries dressed as their countries and with all the houses decorated in terms of their countries, a parade that was almost eight blocks long with students on foot walking to the first evening of UNO Week. The band was playing, the flags of all the nations were flying in the breeze, and when the parade arrived and assembled up at Tech auditorium President Snyder officially opened NU's UNO. Then the crowds went inside to hear Harley Notter from the State Department speak on the future of the UN.

On Tuesday night the General Assembly met to consider the Commission's recommendations and I only wish that you could have been there to see the spirit, the stick-to-it-iveness of all the delegates, and the intelligence with which they backed up their country's stand.

On Wednesday night there was a banquet for the general assembly. As a speaker we had Lieutenant Commander McGovern speak on his experiences with the United Nations. Then there was further discussion on the commission recommendations and the final vote was taken. It was after 1 o'clock when the delegates turned homeward, and there was a wonderful feeling of satisfaction expressed on every face—our resolutions were a result of months of planning and research and everyone went home with a secret feeling of pride way down deep inside them.

On Thursday night Ralph Bunche, also of the State Department, spoke on colonies and trusteeships.

On Friday night, our last night, we had in our audience 35 counsel generals from Chicago as guests of the campus delegates. The final resolutions were read and the closing highlight of the evening was your speech, Blueprint for World Peace.

Officially our UNO closed on April 26, but things are still happening in a UNO way. Besides the post conference bulletin presenting our resolutions and history, we have begun plans for an Intercollegiate United Nation for next year. I went before the student governing board and asked for permission to write to 50 other colleges to see if they would be interested in this type of intercollegiate conference, I, myself, gained so much more than I can express, not only in knowledge but through a united spirit with united friends. When I saw how our campus responded to our conference I wanted to share our experiences with other colleges and universities.

That's our history. I'd like to thank you once again for your help and enthusiasm, and for your kind efforts in our behalf.

Sincerely,

ROZANNE RUPP,
Chairman, Preparatory Commission.

Philippine Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER H. GROSS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Fred Brenckman:

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

1898: "YOU MAY FIRE WHEN YOU ARE READY, GRIDLEY"—1946: A NEW REPUBLIC IS BORN—FILIPINOS CHOOSE TO WALK LONG ROAD BACK AS FREE MEN—GRANGE HELPED FIGHT FOR FREEDOM

(By Fred Brenckman)

Nearly half a century has passed since that historic May day in 1898 when Commodore George Dewey, standing on the bridge of his flagship, the Olympia, said to the captain of the vessel, "You may fire when you are ready, Gridley." The roar that followed opened the Battle of Manila Bay, and when it ended the Spanish fleet had been annihilated without the loss of a man in the American squadron.

In a few short months the power of Spain in the Philippines was broken, bringing to an end a regime that had lasted for more than 350 years.

Begins career on July 4

And now, on July 4, the Republic of the Philippines begins its career as an independent nation, with Gen. Manual Roxas (pronounced Ro-haws) as its President. In the election, which was held on April 23, Roxas won over Sergio Osmeña by a majority of more than 200,000 votes. Elpidio Quirino was elected vice president. Roxas was inaugurated May 28.

As the Republic of the Philippines begins to function as a full-fledged member of the family of nations, it is buoyed by the prayers and best wishes of the people of the United States. The ties of loyalty and genuine friendship that have so long united the people of the islands with those of the United States were immeasurably strengthened by all that transpired during the war against Japan.

It was clearly understood from the beginning of American rule in the islands that the Filipinos should be given their independence when they had demonstrated their capacity for self-government.

Civil government was established in the islands in 1901. Political autonomy was gradually and progressively extended to the Filipinos. The Philippine Autonomy Act, passed by Congress in 1916, contained a definite promise of eventual independence for the people of the islands, while the Tydings-McDuffie Act of 1934 provided that 10 years after the constitution of the Philippines had been approved by the Filipino people and the President of the United States, the Commonwealth government organized, and the president and other officials installed, the Filipinos should be given their complete political liberty. The Commonwealth government was established on November 15, 1935, with the late Manuel Quezon as president and Sergio Osmeña as vice president. It must be understood that the Commonwealth government was simply intended to function until complete independence became effective.

Manuel Roxas

Manuel Roxas, the new president of the Philippines was born in 1892. He was, therefore only 6 years old at the time of the Battle of Manila Bay. Two years after that, American soldiers came to the small town in which Roxas lived to quell Filipinos who were resisting the authority of the United States.

The future president improved every opportunity to mingle with the soldiers of Uncle Sam, from whom he received his first lessons in English. It was from these soldiers that he imbibed the story of America; it was from them that he learned to know about George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and other national heroes.

He received his primary education from the first American school teachers sent to the islands. He finished the Manila High School in 1910. Three years later he graduated at the head of his class in law from the University of the Philippines. After graduation Roxas became a professor of the law at the National University in Manila.

Entering public life, he was in 1919 elected governor of the province of Capiz. Later he became a member of the Philippine legislature, being chosen as speaker, which position he filled with ability from 1922 to 1933. He was a member of various Philippine independence missions to Washington, where he gave a good account of himself.

An alert speaker

On one occasion when he appeared as a witness before the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, one of the Senators addressed this question to him:

"Now, Mr. Speaker, in your opinion, has the period of probation through which the people of the Philippines have gone qualified them for self-government."

Without a moment's hesitation Roxas shot back:

"Absolutely, Senator, and I might add that if independence should be denied a little while longer they might even learn some of the vices of democracy."

Without intending to be sarcastic, perhaps that was his way of letting us know that we were not quite perfect ourselves.

Representatives of the National Grange and other farm organizations stationed at Washington often conferred with Roxas and his colleagues in promoting the movement for Philippine independence. The agricultural interests of the country warmly supported the efforts of the Filipinos to secure their political independence.

With the Japanese attack on the Philippines, Roxas was commissioned as a major and fought beside the gallant band of Americans and Filipinos who won undying fame at Bataan and Corregidor, even though they were eventually compelled to surrender.

Senate president

On the reestablishment of the Commonwealth Government of the Philippines, Roxas was elected president of the Senate, rounding out a career that led to the Presidency of the Republic.

It is interesting to note that as President of the Philippines, Roxas will preside over the destinies of from five to six times as many people as inhabited the United States when George Washington was inaugurated as our first President. The population of the United States was then only 3,000,000, while that of the Philippines is estimated at more than 15,000,000, scattered over 7,000 islands.

The constitution of the Philippines, adopted in 1935 and approved by the President of the United States the same year, is closely modeled after our own, providing for a government of three branches—legislative, executive, and judicial.

Suffrage may be exercised by both men and women who are citizens, providing they have reached the age of 21 years and are able to read and write.

War devastation

Paul McNutt, High Commissioner to the Philippines, has given us a graphic picture of the ruin and desolation wrought in the islands by the war. Speaking of Manila as it was last March, he said:

"Manila today is a city of missing places and missing faces. Vast stretches of the city, once crowded with shops and houses, are flattened and bare, with only rude scars of brick and stone to recall the stately and simple buildings which once made of Manila the Pearl of the Orient. There are districts where the drum-fire of our own artillery has left only ghastly heaps of columns and hanging cornices, scarecrows of buildings and skeletons of buildings.

"There are also those sections which the Japanese, in their savage fury and bitterness, born of defeat, wantonly burned out, destroyed, and obliterated. It is not like a city wiped out of existence, as Hiroshima and Nagasaki were. It is not like Tokyo, in part destroyed by air bombing. It reflects in even superficial appearance the titanic, desperate struggle of two peoples for inches of ground, for individual houses, for individual rooms and cellars. Stark violence is stamped indelibly on the face of every street, every corner, every building. They look as if they had been literally torn apart by the claws of men, rather than by their machines of destruction."

Agriculture is prostrate

According to Mr. McNutt, the countryside is not much better off than Manila. Most of the prewar roads and highways are ruined beyond repair. Farms and plantations by the mile lie fallow, untended, and uncultivated, monuments to the economic planning of the Japanese, who thought they could turn sugar lands into cotton lands, and tobacco lands into rubber plantations, with the Filipinos as slave partners in the Greater East Asia Coprosperity Sphere.

There is little transportation in the Philippines today except that afforded by Army equipment. The Japanese took trucks, wagons, carts, and even baby carriages to transport their military supplies. They also took the carabaos, the native beasts of burden, out of the fields, those that the Filipinos did not hide or eat to keep the Japanese from getting them.

Rehabilitation steps

In an effort to help rehabilitate the Philippines, Congress appropriated the sum of $625,000,000 in payment of war damages sustained by the people of the islands. Of this sum, $400,000,000 goes to individuals and corporations.

Congress also enacted the Philippine Trade Act, which was approved on April 30, 1946. Under this legislation the Philippines will be entitled to free trade with the United States for a period of 8 years. This will be followed by 2(years of gradually increasing tariffs, or gradually decreasing quotas, smoothing the way for adjustments that must be made in stabilizing the economy of the people of the Philippines.

It was necessary and proper for these concessions to be made so that the United States could withdraw with honor from these islands of the Pacific, 7,000 miles from our shores, for which we paid Spain $20,000,000 under the terms of the Treaty of Paris at the close of the Spanish-American War.

The fact remains, however, that if the people of the Philippines are to make a success of their venture in self-government they will need the help and the continued friendship of the American people for years to come.

Control of Atomic Energy: A Momentous Decision

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Edward Steidle, dean, School of Mineral Industries, the Pennsylvania State College, State College, Pa.:

CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY: A MOMENTOUS DECISION

(By Edward Steidle)

Congress must reach an early decision as to whether civilians or the military will have the deciding voice in the atomic-energy policies of the United States. The McMahon bill now before the House oversimplifies the question. Atomic energy is the result of nuclear physics which can be neither controlled nor monopolized. Our precious secret is only the know-how of processing an explosive bomb.

The fissionable mineral reserves known to date are not sufficient to compete with present sources of energy or to destroy civilization. The danger to civilization lies in man's own unpredictable nature. There is urgent need for a higher moral conduct of national and international affairs. The frightful consequences of a possible World War III must be faced squarely by our Nation and every other nation. War must be eliminated as a political and economic instrument. Hopes depend upon loyal, honest, informed citizens who hold public office.

Mr. Baruch's timely report to the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission is a hopeful sign, but we must heed his judgment in spite of all kinds of pressure groups to the contrary. The question would be largely eliminated if the recommendations of the Lilienthal committee to control uranium raw materials and denature their products could be realized. This will require a degree of international cooperation that would outlaw war in itself.

National well-being and world peace demand that the United States keep up its leading role in nuclear physics whether to develop atomic energy for the benefit of the people of the world in civilian pursuits, or atomic explosives for destructive purposes. On the other hand, Federal subsidy for nuclear research must not cripple the multitude of other vital peacetime researches and developments. Complete civilian control can hazard our national security, and military autocracy can sow seeds of war. Scientists can contribute their best only when free from regimentation and official routine. Regimentation is necessary during emergencies but in times of peace the best minds cannot operate under such a system.

Control of atomic energy policies is too important to be dominated by any single group. It should be vested in a board of civilians and military men trained in the fields of science, sociology and statecraft, with civilians in the majority. The board should sponsor unhampered nuclear physics research. It should be feasible to place power, medicine, and other developments under civilian agenceis, and to leave control of national defense applications in the hands of the military. Some integration would be necessary and some aspects of the civilian development might have to be treated confidentially, for example, new manufacturing techniques. Every citizen need not know the business of the military nor should military aspects be released. Ultimate solution may rest in the United Nations Organization. In the meantime, complete confidence must be reposed in our highest elected public servants. Theirs should be the immediate responsibility.

OPA

OF
HON. WILLIAM C. COLE
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the St. Joseph (Mo.) News-Press:

REQUIESCAT IN PEACE

It was almost too much for 1 day, the bomb dropping over Bikini Lagoon and OPA controls being lifted from the whole of the United States. The results of the first are already being tabulated in official reports, but the results of the latter are yet to be written by the American people.

Every right thinking dealer in goods or services will try to hold the line against inflation. Every right thinking buyer will decline the purchase of goods or services at an exorbitant price and will avoid hoarding.

If predictions by manufacturers are correct, supply will not be too long in leveling up with demand. Gone from our buying then will be the human urge to buy just because an item is or may become scarce. This has been OPA's great gift to retailers. It carried the constant implication that supplies were short and so stimulated the desire to buy.

This newspaper has consistently advocated the retention of OPA, in modified form. But now that CPA has been abandoned because those who hold the reins of our Government can't agree between themselves, it should be let alone, for a time at least, until free enterprise once more has a chance. Modified rent control could be revived without interference with the general economy.

But, from all indications, the die is cast as far as most price controls are concerned. Price control under the theory of the OPA Act was and is sound. Its administration was excellent in some respects and reached the heights of stupidity in others. The failure of the administration of price control and not the idea itself caused Congress to reject its continuation in its old form. The price administration strained at gnats and swallowed camels. It went after the little fellows who made honest mistakes and let the black marketeers slip through its fingers.

President Truman was acting in accordance with his highest convictions in vetoing the act submitted by Congress last week so long as, in his opinion, it led the people to believe that prices would be controlled, whereas, in fact, the act was not sufficiently strong for enforcement. To establish an immediate successor to that bill or to reinstate the old bill would probably be just as bad and continue a confusing form of national regimentation.

It is to be regretted that Chester Bowles stayed on his OPA job as long as he did. His zealousness for control generated too much antagonism for him and for the law he so blunderingly enforced. Not only personalities irritated the public, but the incredible length of delays on decisions. It is to be regretted that a new bill was not devised which would cure the evils of the old, one on which Congress, the President, the manufacturer, and the public could see eye to eye.

But now the public has the chance to do its stuff, to show that a free people can cooperate to retain economic sanity. It will be regretted for the next several generations if every producer, dealer, and landlord gets the idea that his golden age has now arrived. Buyers will sorely regret if they fail to realize that if they buy only according to their real needs will the normal situation of competitive selling be restored.

TIMELY OBSERVATIONS

A generation from now men and women will be arguing pro and con on the merits and demerits of the OPA. And there is a strong possibility that after 25 years people will be as far from universal opinion as people in 1946 are about the League of Nations in the generation that is gone. Or prohibition. Or the Volstead Act. But the OPA and all its works and all its pomps will leave stronger emotions—for and against—than did the national questions of the early 1920's. That is because the OPA enters the very lives of all people more intimately.

We know a landlord who never should have been permitted to own rental property. No, you're wrong. You thought we were going to say because he's a gouger. Nope. He's a sucker. Anybody who would let a tenant run 9 months in arrears and do nothing about it is a sucker. And we know a landlord who let three families—no kin to original renter—move in on the fourth. The property is fast going to pieces. It's a good thing for the landlord. Maybe he'll let his money go into Government bonds. It takes a certain type to be a landlord. He should be honest and fair, yes, but he should not be a composite of the Welfare Board, Red Cross, Memorial Home, and Home for Little Wanderers all rolled into one.

The OPA got it in the neck. All right. Let's tell you something. The OPA got it in the neck because public opinion lost faith in the OPA, and all the Harry Trumans in the universe, riding all the white chargers of knight errantry in all Christendom cannot change the picture. The OPA had many good qualities. It had many bad.

In the early days of OPA our newspapers here printed all suits filed against OPA. Heaven forgive us for the injustices done under the correct and legally permissible fiat of a United States district attorney's information or citation. Time and again we found that the OPA charges were so flimsy they never came to trial. OPA officials appeared too often as snoopers in Government guise. It was the closest to blackmail since the "plants" of volunteer prohibitionists helping the Volstead Act enforcement officers 20 and 25 years ago.

There have been chiselers, of course. There always are chiselers, but we believe a saner enforcement of OPA would have given that Agency enough friends that a Congress would not be hard-boiled as was the Congress last week. It so drastically changed the OPA that the President felt he had to veto it. He evidently hopes the Congress will see such untold terror in our economic set-up in a few days it will revive the OPA.

And that's where we want to talk to you who have cursed and despised the OPA. If we are to have a sane and orderly transformation, a peacetime conversion, there must be no gouging of the public. Public opinion knows that some rents are unfairly low, that some tenants have been and are mean, spiteful, property-destroying people. But public opinion will be quick to sense if grasping landlords punish all tenants, good and bad, by wholesale evictions and wholesale hikes beyond rhyme or reason. Mr. Landlord, you may be the man to bring back OPA. And you, Mr. Merchant, whether you sell sugar or meat, or motor cars or soap, it well may be if OPA returns that you will bring it back. Public opinion will sense the difference between fair increases necessitated by changed conditions since OPA went in and gouging and profiteering. And that public opinion will be quick to make itself felt in Washington.

If the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker, and the jobbers and manufacturers behind them, plus the landlords, and the stock men, and all others who make, produce, process, or distribute commodities if you, we say, are honest, we can reconvert without reviving OPA. America knows there must be a certain increase along certain lines. America knows, too, that the common people, we who buy cars, and Sunday roasts, and soap, and toilet paper, and shoes, and sugar, can take just so much. Go beyond that, and we'll rise up. And Congress will listen, because we've got you outnumbered. Pay heed.

American Veterans' Committee Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY M. JACKSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article that appeared in Time magazine on the recent convention of the American Veterans' Committee—AVC—in Des Moines, Iowa.

The AVC's first national convention was an event which was carefully watched by millions of Americans, veterans and nonveterans alike. Of the 15,000,000 Americans who served in the armed forces during the war perhaps three-quarters have returned to civilian life, and the question of how they will be organized and who will claim the right to speak for them becomes of importance. Every great war in which the United States has participated has led to the formation of a veterans' organization. Will there be a new veterans' organization speaking for the veterans of this war? And if so, will it follow in the footsteps of previous groups or will it adopt a different trend?

Many young American veterans believe they have found the answer to these questions in the American Veterans' Committee—AVC. As the New York Herald Tribune recently stated, this veterans group has forced itself upon the national consciousness by the breadth and vigor of its convictions and the originality with which it has tackled the problem of achieving what is always the American soldier's one greatest ambition—to become a civilian, successfully integrated to a successful civilian community.

Started early in 1943, when an Army corporal and a group of his friends began examining ideas on how to assure the stable world and the democratic America, which they hoped would emerge from the war, the American Veterans' Committee today is the largest and the fastest growing of any World War II veterans' organization.

The recent convention of AVC confirmed its determination to implement its progressive statement of intentions to which all prospective members are required to subscribe. AVC has adopted a concrete, liberal program and has elected a young, energetic leadership. The following article from Time magazine of June 24 should be read by everyone interested in the ideas of World War II veterans, and the spontaneous growth of what promises to be a vital new force for democracy:

VETERANS

CITIZENS FIRST

Nobody dropped water bombs from a hotel window. Nobody set fire to the furniture. There were no fists fights in the lobby, no naked women running through the corridors, no drunks hell-raising in the streets. Delegates to the first convention of the American Veterans Committee, lustiest and loudest of the scores of burgeoning World War II-born veterans' groups, were too busy for horseplay.

Since it was organized in 1944, AVC had tried hard to be different from the stodgy, conservative American Legion and the oligarchic Veterans of Foreign Wars. For 3 days in the muggy Iowa heat, 840 delegates, representing some 60,000 members, shouted, sweated, thumped, and swore as they hammered out their future aims.

When the proceedings began in the Hotel Fort Des Moines, nobody could be sure what the end would bring. Up until then AVC had followed a loose, sweeping statement of intentions with a notable, laudable motto: "Citizens first, veterans second."

WHY DON'T YOU?

AVC accepted as members men and women from all World War II armed services, in and out of uniform, and from the merchant marine. It had plumped noisily for FEPC, OPA, the minimum-wage bill, Federal housing subsidies, other allied issues. From inside and out it had been damned as communistic, boosted as liberal, dismissed as just another fly-by-night collection of hotheads. Even its leaders admitted they didn't know what the rank and file thought.

But the delegates were not hesitant about making their views known. In the tempestuous uproar of policy-drafting committees, political ideologies and regional prejudices clashed in wide-open, no-holds-barred debate. Cried one exasperated woman to her husband: "Oh, why don't you just join the American Legion?"

In the evenings they piled into the big Shriner auditorium to hear Harold Stassen blast United States Communists, Walter Reuther blamed United States labor troubles on insufficient consumer capacity (i. e., too low wages). Most Rev. Bernard J. Sheil, Chicago's famed radical Catholic bishop, brought down the house with a savage attack on racial inequalities and congressional dawdling.

Veteran newsmen wondered how anything could ever come out of the wild confusion. One delegate mistook a two-star admiral for a Yugoslav observer. Reporters themselves caught the fever. One thought he was buttonholing Walter Reuther, embarrassedly found he was talking to a Chicago Tribune staff writer.

THE MODERATES

But when the weary delegates packed up their bags and headed for home they had constructed a determined, deadly serious, left-of-center plan of action. It called for international control of atomic energy, Big Three unity, a guaranteed annual wage, expansion of TVA-style river projects, solid opposition to anti-labor, Jim Crow,[1] and anti-Nisei legislation. True to the motto, it vetoed the idea of a veterans' bonus.

The election of national officers was a smashing victory for AVC moderates, a resounding defeat for Communist-led delegates. Acting National Chairman Charles Bolte, who lost a leg fighting with the British Eighth Army at El Alamein, was reelected to the top spot with only one dissenting vote, AVC Founder Gilbert Harrison as vice chairman. (Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., looming large in behind-the-scenes politicking, did not run for office.)

First hurdle passed, AVC began a drive for a million dollars to solicit a million members.

[1] Translating theory into action, AVC members picketed a tavern which refused to serve two Negro veterans, had the proprietor arrested for violation of the Iowa State civil-rights law on charges backed by one-time Willkie-man Oren Root, Jr. Next day the New Yorker's E. J. Kahn, Jr., drafted a full-page ad complimenting the city of Des Moines on prompt police action.

OPA Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. SAVAGE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of June 30, 1946:

OPA VETO

By ignoring repeated requests to expedite passage of price-control extension legislation, Congress compelled the President to risk complete abolition of all price control by an eleventh-hour veto of a measure that would in effect legalize inflation. Unquestionably responsibility for the painful dilemma in which the President has been placed rests upon Congress. Confronted by "a choice between inflation with a statute and inflation without one," the President has shown both wisdom and courage in electing to veto the extension bill. In our opinion, any unprejudiced reader of the veto message will be convinced that his reasons for rejecting the bill are absolutely sound.

A large part of the message is devoted to an analysis of the Taft amendment which provides that manufacturers and processors must be allowed prices for their major products equivalent to their 1941 prices plus subsequent average increases in industry per unit costs. This shift of base, coupled with other amendments that would increase wholesaler and retailer mark-ups, would compel needless bonanza increases in ceiling prices amounting to many billions of dollars. The President emphasizes this point by citing examples of the disastrous impact of the Taft and related amendments on prices of building materials, steel, automobiles, and houshold appliances.

The most decisive reason of all for objecting to the proposed changes in pricing formulas, however, is the fact that they would prolong indefinitely the prevalent uncertainty regarding future price ceilings that has resulted in the withholding of many articles from market during recent months. Instead of stimulating production, as sponsors of the bill contend, the necessity of recomputing ceiling prices would initiate a continuous series of adjustments that would slow down deliveries and stifle productive activity while the OPA was engaged in the time-consuming process of redetermining ceiling prices. Furthermore, since one man's selling price enters into another man's production costs, every adjustment would bring demands for more adjustments. And, of course, new demands for wage increases would be encouraged by the Taft amendment, since it calls for inclusion of all wage increases in determining allowable price increases.

In short, the bill provides, as the President says, a sure formula for inflation. It would also impose a mass of work on the OPA that the staff could not possibly carry, especially as the required cost data are hard to assemble, often nonexistent. Hence the agency would either have to fall back on rough cost estimates or confess defeat and fold up.

Under the circumstances, a decent official demise is to be preferred, although we still harbor hopes that Congress may consent to a compromise proposal that would permit OPA to function until acute commodity shortages no longer exist. In his message, the President has outlined a program that Congress could accept without loss of face—a program that would meet many warranted criticisms of the existing system. Coupled with the resignation of Chester Bowles, who has unjustly come to be regarded by many Congressmen as a symbol for obstructionism, these concessions should go far toward propitiating congressional enemies of OPA. An opportunity is thus afforded for Congress to reconsider its action and send the President a new bill that he will be able to sign.

Will We Celebrate V-Day?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE J. BATES
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Beverly (Mass.) Evening Times:

WILL WE CELEBRATE V-DAY?

With Congress racing toward adjournment and such major things as possible revival of the OPA monopolizing the attention of the Senators and Representatives, it becomes steadily more probable that there will be no official observance of the first anniversary of the end of World War II—unless the Congress can be awakened to the fact that it is letting the public down on this point.

House Joint Resolution 369, filed by Representative GEORGE J. BATES, Republican, of the local Sixth Massachusetts District, just before he left for the Bikini atomic-bomb test area, now rests with the House Committee on the Judiciary, and indications seem to be that the Congressmen may leave it there as they speed toward home and reelection campaign fence building. It is, indeed, unfortunate that neither President Truman nor anyone on Capitol Hill discovered that an oversight had been made in not providing for an annual legal holiday, commemorating the cessation of hostilities in the world's worst war, before it got so late in the congressional season.

It is not too late, however, for Congress to do something about declaring August 14, next month, as the first annual Victory Day, to be observed appropriately throughout the United States as a full legal holiday. House Joint Resolution 369 is the answer, and the public—especially World War II veterans—will thank the various Representatives and Senators who bring about its enactment before adjournment of Congress within the next three weeks.

Unquestionably, the American people are expecting, with full justification, that the war's end anniversary will be celebrated. President Truman, on the other hand, through his secretary, William D. Hassett, less than 2 weeks ago informed Secretary-Manager Neiland J. Douglas of the Beverly Chamber of Commerce that the President had proclaimed September 2, 1945, only, as VJ-day, the date of formal signing of surrender papers by the Japanese. This letter, sent in reply to an inquiry on behalf of the Beverly Servicemen's Victory Day Fund Committee, further stated:

"In due time, the Congress may take legislative action to determine what day will be given official recognition."

Greatly surprised at the apparent lack of attention yet given by the Federal Government to the matter of an official holiday marking the end of the war, the Beverly Evening Times immediately contacted Congressman BATES, and House Joint Resolution 369 was the result. As this resolution points out, Labor Day, already a legal holiday which merits priority for the first Monday in September, comes this year on September 2, and always will occur near that date. There is no holiday in August, and, just as Armistice Day, November 11, marks the anniversary of the end of hostilities in World War I, August 14 is the natural day for observance of the end of our over-all two-sphere conflict in World War II.

Accordingly, it behooves Congress not to disappoint the American public by allowing the first anniversary to pass without official observance in the form of a full holiday. There's still time to act on House Joint Resolution 369, and its enactment obviously would assure all the Representatives and Senators a much warmer welcome when they return home for the summer and their fall elections.

Letter of Paul Campbell, of Minot, N. Dak.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, on few occasions do I ask permission to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD letters coming to my office from citizens of my State. A letter which has been addressed to me by Attorney Paul Campbell so comprehensively sets forth important questions, and so clearly describes the views of this gentleman and at the same time represents the views of vast numbers of people of the Nation on national questions, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from Mr. Paul Campbell, of Minot, N. Dak.:

MINOT, N. DAK., July 2, 1946.

To the President and My Senators and Congressmen:

This is a letter from one of your citizens, an attorney, and a "common man." It is in my own behalf, and in behalf of my clients, not one of whom can qualify as big business with an income of over $5,000 per year, and who generally cannot and do not care to spend time or money in lobbying by means of letters, telegrams, postcards, etc., to their selected representatives and servants in Congress or the Executive Mansion, or elsewhere. It is in no manner instigated by CIO, AFL, Farmers Union, OPA, or any others of the many indulging in Government by pressure-group practices, including job holders, Government bureaus, agencies, pay rollers, shovel leaners—all motivated by selfish and self-serving interest.

The long-range problem before us is to put an end to the war which plain common sense says is over, but politics and political power, control, and economic advantage delays asserting, if not in fact asserting, the contrary to avoid returning our people to a Government by law instead of a government by men, either bureaucrats, or pay rollers, or otherwise. Restore as rapidly as possible to the American people a free peacetime economy in lieu of a planned manor bureau-controlled economy, monopoly controlled economy. This involves many subordinate and underlying matters; it includes inflation, price fixing, or price control, control of unions of labor, unions of farmers, unions of business, or other types of organizations by government and law, instead of control of government and law by such power-drunk organizations and their irresponsible leaders. We want an economy regulated by the natural laws of supply and demand and competition, unhampered by man-made law and regulations, by a control through OPA's, Bowles, union leaders, whether Bridges, Hillmans, Greens, or Lewises, or any Hitler, or little Hitlers. I limit myself to the one small phase of these involved problems: housing and rent control. This does not mean and does not call for an OPA or any other large or small bureaucratic, inflationary expensive set-up of political governmental agency, with its horde of nonproducing, ward heelers and pay rollers. It means a simple little law of Congress, to be administered by and executed by the courts, State and Federal, and the executive branch and departments of our Government, State and National. The occasion for the law arises from the emergency, temporary, due to a present shortage of building material arising from the war, labor strikes, increased production costs due to Government-inspired wage costs, and improper OPA and other improper price regulation and control, rationing, etc. Not one of these landlords would dare to demand of their tenants increased rents to which the latter did not consent, and which was not fair and proper were it not that they knew that these tenants had no place at present to go. Let us have a simple congressional moritorium to continue during this emergency, to be enforced as between the parties in and through the courts already existing; and prohibiting increase in the rents and evictions when the rents are paid, except in cases where the tenants consent, or the landlord can establish and satisfy the courts that the increase is fair and reasonable, and the tenant has a place to go, or available to him at a rental not in excess of that paid by him and with equal conveniences. Let us stop misleading the public in the representation that inflation and price increase are the same, when price increase is merely the consequence of prior and continued inflation; that control of price and continuance of Chester Bowles' or OPA are the same thing. I, for one, can neither afford or take the time to be writing to you. I selected you as my agent and representative, not to be bulldozed by any CIO, PAC, OPA, or other high-pressure organization, with their chain letters and telegrams, nor by any farm or labor, lawyer, business or other organization; and not to be continually hounding you with my advice, letters, lobbyists, and paid propogandists in press or on radio. I selected you to use and exercise your own honest judgment in behalf of the general welfare of the American people, and not in behalf of any political party or organization, Democrat or Republican, or any special class of American citizens.

Respectfully,

PAUL CAMPBELL.

Governor Dewey Leads in Rent-Control Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, all of us recognize the need for rent controls with the present serious housing shortage in the United States. That subject should be administered by the States and municipalities, unless we want to continue the practice of a bureaucratic form of government at Washington. Until the States and municipalities establish machinery for such rent controls, the Federal Government will have to do the best it can. On July 2, I introduced a rent-control bill, and on July 3, I extended my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in connection with that subject.

It is interesting to note that there was one outstanding man in America who was ready to meet the emergency and who has met it in a fine constructive way. I refer to that progressive, forward-looking Governor of the State of New York, the Honorable Thomas E. Dewey.

Of course, we would expect Governor Dewey to meet the situation because his past record is a monument to his ability, integrity, and courage. He is one of the men in public life who has stood four-squared for the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. In doing this, he has faced the opposition of the most powerful and selfish interests ever gathered together on the American Continent. He has defied these enemies of America by supporting this great improvement in the St. Lawrence River. It would contribute to the wealth of America and promote our domestic economy in the interests of the public welfare.

But, let us return to the subject of rent control. The following article from the Evening Star of Washington, D. C., for July 4, 1946, is of considerable interest at this time, and reads as follows:

DEWEY'S STOCK RISES

(By J. G. Hayden)

While Washington politicians—President Truman and Senator ROBERT TAFT especially—are sparring desperately for political advantage from the OPA muddle, Gov. Tom Dewey, of New York, already has chalked up a score that will be hard for any of his rival Presidential aspirants to match.

In a message to the New York State Legislature last January, Dewey pointed out the danger that there might occur a hiatus in Federal rent control and asked for enactment of a law which would enable the State to take over in such an event.

After a rip-roaring legislative battle, with much attendant publicity, a law providing for State control of residential rents if and when the Federal Government relinquished this function was passed and signed by the Governor on March 31, 1946.

Thus, when President Truman's veto last Saturday wiped out the whole OPA, Dewey was all set. He promptly appointed a Joseph D. McGoldrick, former Democratic controller of New York City, head of a temporary State housing commission and got that agency into actual operation before Sunday midnight.

New York tenants not only have been spared the fear and uncertainty that has afflicted renters in all the rest of the Nation, but the rent stability engendered by Governor Dewey's law has seemed to extend to all other parts of the State's economy. Prices of all sorts have held more firmly in New York than in most other States.

Quick to spot the vote-getting gain for Governor Dewey from this development, the Democrats sought to counter it. Two Democratic legislators from New York City demanded that a special session be called to effect an over-all State price control. Governor Dewey replied that while it was fine to take over rent control, any attempt by a single State to hold down commodity prices would fail for the simple reason that no goods woul dcome to it if they could be sold for more elsewhere.

To Restore OPA Is To Compromise With Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the OPA dictatorial bureaucrats, numbering in the aggregate some 60,000, have been swindling the consumers long enough by fanning the flame of inflation and by restricting production. Black-market crimes have flourished under the encouragement of the OPA until honest consumers have been forced to disregard ceiling prices and become law violators in order to get food, shelter, and clothing. The black-market operators are now clamoring to have the OPA racket continued for their benefit. Why? Because they can make millions out of those who have no recourse other than to yield to the illegal prices demanded by the black-market racketeers. The white-collar and other low-paid workers of necessity suffer most, because their purchasing power is insufficient to enable them to comply with the high prices established by a new set of bootleggers who are suffered and permitted by OPA to take over and run the markets of the country. The masked men who rob banks are bad enough as enemies of society, but the black-market operators created by the OPA are robbers of the sick, the infirm, small children, and even little babies. This unholy alliance between the OPA and the criminal element now in illegal control of the Nation's food supply should be destroyed root and branch. To remove only part of this malignant cancer is to prolong the misery and suffering of the American people and to make the cure of their malady more difficult.

Continued controls mean the establishment of centralized power over individual rights and free enterprise. There is no way to remove controls over prices except to do it at once—suddenly, if you please. As F. A. Harper, professor of marketing, Cornell University, reminds us:

> The controls are there or they are not there; whenever they are removed it must be done suddenly. It is like death, which can only come instantly.

Professor Harper further points out that:

> The line of reasoning which leads to the conclusion that price controls are justified has no logical terminus short of an argument for complete dictatorship.

The Congress, if it is in favor of free enterprise, cannot compromise by extending price controls without preventing a return to a free economy.

A free economy—

Says Professor Harper—

cannot exist without free prices. Any statements or inferences to the contrary are delusive. Actions based on any other assumptions are either pitfalls or baited traps. Free prices—are so much at the heart of a free economy as to be almost another name for the same thing. Prices are the forms of expression of all economic decisions, and free decisions have no other means of expression than through free prices.

I say that the Congress, if it wishes to preserve free enterprise, insure through it the highest standard of living at the lowest possible cost, cannot do so by fostering the OPA with its Gestapo snoopers, kangaroo courts, and the black-market operators who are in league with and who are supporting this un-American dictatorial bureaucracy.

Professor Harper has this so say:

> Government subsidies of all sorts might well be termed "legalized" black markets—legalized when done by the Government. It seems strange for a government to hire a police force to hunt down black marketeers, who are fined when caught, and at the same time pay subsidies itself to accomplish the same ends. Russia—with an element of realism lacking here, is reported to have actually had black markets operated by the Government during the war, which they were able to use as a source of tax revenue while we paid out subsidies and built up our Government debt instead.

Almost immediately following the temporary death of OPA, cattle, hogs, poultry, and grain moved into the legitimate markets of the country and this occurred without an increase in prices other than such increases as were reflected by the removal of the subsidies paid by the taxpayers. The removal of an ulcerated tooth from the jaw may cause temporary pain to a person, but it will be far less painful to the victim to remove the tooth than to permit it to pour its poisonous pus into the system of the person until it is too late to save him. Now is the time to rid this Nation of a despotic bureaucracy which has become an incubator of crime, a breeder of deceit and lawlessness, an enemy of free enterprise and a creator of inflation. The OPA and free enterprise cannot exist together. OPA must go if free enterprise is to survive. I would call to the attention of the critics and defeatists of our traditional American system that under our American system of free government, a free economy and a free society, we have attained the highest living levels, the highest wages, the best working conditions; the greatest degree of religious and political liberty and tolerance, the finest educational system, the greatest mass-production system in the history of the world.

I warn those who love freedom that the OPA with its controls is foreign to every concept of our form of free government. It violates every fundamental principle of freedom. I cannot conceive of the Congress of the United States compromising with the would-be destroyers of the American way of life by extending the OPA.

This Prophet of Doom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune of July 1, 1946:

THIS PROPHET OF DOOM

President Truman did what he could in his radio speech on Saturday evening to fill the American people with fear. He asked them to believe that all that has stood between them and abject misery is the OPA; that they will all land in the poorhouse in a few weeks unless they storm Congress for a reenactment of his price-control mechanism in all its bureaucratic splendor.

No doubt Mr. Truman succeeded in frightening a great many of his listeners. If they can stop trembling long enough to think, they will take heart.

Who is this prophet of doom that has filled them with terror? He is President by accident. Before that, he was the protégé of Boss Pendergast, of Missouri, who went to the penitentiary for corruption. He is the patron of Boss Hannegan, who rose to national prominance through his infamous effort to prevent the seating of the duly elected Governor of Missouri. He is the creature of Sidney Hillman. The nomination to the Vice Presidency was "cleared with Sidney" and Sidney is Moscow's favorite American labor leader.

There is, thus, nothing in Mr. Truman's political origins to warrant confidence in his integrity and there is even less reason to credit him with good judgment in matters of economic policy. He is the Bright Boy of Potsdam whose surrender to Stalin there a year ago has held Europe in economic misery and helplessness. It should not be forgotten that Mr. Truman came home from that conference immensely pleased with himself and the work he had done.

The Truman who spoke on the radio is the same master economist who didn't foresee the world shortage of food and didn't believe it was a fact until Christian men and women forced him to face it. While children and the aged were dying of starvation, Mr. Truman, who now professes to know all about prices, was the advocate of prices for bread grains which resulted in the feeding of hundreds of millions of bushels to hogs.

In truth, Mr. Truman, has been proved wrong in every important economic forecast he has ever made. The listeners he frightened on Saturday night may profitably recall that it isn't so long ago that he told them, in another radio speech, that there was grave danger of depression and unemployment. In fact, in spite of such a wave of strikes as this country has seldom seen, there is no depression, and high-school boys are finding it easy to land summer jobs at $30 a week or more.

This great statistical seer insisted in the same speech that wages could be raised without raising prices. He was wrong again, but he was not found out until he had precipitated the strikes which bedeviled the country for months. The strikes ended, as everybody knows, with an increase in wages accompanied by the increase in prices that Mr. Truman said could be avoided, but which he finally was forced to admit could not be avoided. The Nation is still suffering from shortages resulting from the Truman strikes.

In the light of this record, no one should be disturbed by a forecast from Mr. Truman, whether he promises good times or bad. Common sense tells the American people to take heart. There are no fewer houses this morning than there were on Saturday, and no fewer stores. The landlords and storekeepers can't eat if they don't rent and sell. They can't raise prices all along the line to a point beyond which the goods won't move. Prices may rise, but they can't remain above the point at which the customers can buy. The moment that happens, prices must turn downward.

Mr. Truman talks about the threat of higher automobile prices. This is no threat at all. In fact, the buyers quite generally have been paying secret premiums for the new cars amounting, as a rule, to a larger increase than the President predicts.

He talks, also, about about higher meat prices, as if the OPA's prices had been religiously observed, and as if meat had been generally available at any price in the stores. If due account is taken of the share of the meat bill which was concealed in the form of a subsidy and of the present black-market price which is the prevailing one, the rise will not be overwhelming. The gain from the disappearance of OPA will be found in the ability of customers to get meat once more.

This Nation is about to celebrate the one hundred and seventieth anniversary of its founding. We got along for 166 of those years without OPA, and in that time became the richest nation in the world, with the widest distribution of well-being ever known in human history. Mr. Truman is asking the American people to believe that the pricing mechanism under which all this was achieved cannot be trusted, but that his bureaucratic mechanism which has fostered black markets and persistent shortages is all that stands between the American people and misery. Anybody who believes that is lacking in common sense.

Why Veterans Can't Get New Houses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, we get correspondence from veterans dealing with the housing shortage. We all know that the politically minded administration officials want the Government to go into the business of building homes and their propaganda methods are mighty attractive. When they get done with the razzling and dazzling they make Mr. Average Citizen think that the matter of getting a home built, and especially if he is a veteran, is just simple arithmetic.

This holding out high hopes to the veterans without telling them of the difficulties which must be overcome is unfair to the veterans, unfair to the Government, and unfair to everybody else. Yesterday a statement in the form of a letter to a returned veteran came to my office. This statement was prepared by Frank W. Cortright, executive vice president, National Association of Home Builders. Mr. Cortwright discusses the housing problem in an interesting way and in the form of a letter to Sergeant Brown. He says:

AN OPEN LETTER TO SERGEANT BROWN

DEAR SERGEANT BROWN: Yes, indeed, we certainly remember your letter written from an island in the South Pacific more than a year ago. We recall that you wrote of the heat, malaria, and the Japs. You said that if you survived them you wanted a new home of your own for your wife and the two kids just as soon as you had a job. Now we are glad to learn that you did survive, that you have the job and are ready to purchase the home you dreamed about. Your present bitterness at being unable to find such a house is understandable. As you say, the builders in your town are just as anxious to construct these homes as you boys are to buy them. You and millions of others like you are confused by the things you are told and you are wondering what's wrong with this veterans'-housing program.

TOO MUCH GOVERNMENT

In the first place, Sergeant, you must realize that there are many reasons why homes, like automobiles, shirts, and radios, are not being produced at a rate sufficient to meet the demand. Government under-programed housing during the war and belatedly lifted the restrictions only after giving industrial construction a substantial head start. Thousands of strikes, particularly the major strikes in lumber, steel, and coal have further reduced an already seriously inadequate supply of building materials. The net result is that houses now under construction are requiring at least double the normal period of time to complete and hundreds of thousands of additional units are not being started because there is no assurance that the materials necessary for their construction will be available for many months to come. The fact is that the whole building industry is now in danger of being rapidly regulated to death.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN DECLARES VETERANS' HOUSING AN EMERGENCY NEED

A little more than 6 months ago it was determined by President Truman that a state of emergency should be declared for veterans' housing. He instructed the Civilian Production Administration to set up a system of priorities (HH) designed to channel approximately half of most critical building materials into the housing program for you veterans. The President then appointed a National Housing Expediter (Louisville's ex-mayor, Wilson W. Wyatt) and delegated to him greater authority than has been given to any single administrator in the history of the country. This authority gave Mr. Wyatt the right to direct all other agencies of Government to take those steps necessary to provide an unprecedented number of new homes for you and other veterans. Mr. Wyatt's first step was to announce a private enterprise goal of 2,500,000 homes in 1946 and 1947 and the relocation of 200,000 temporary war units around universities and in highly congested cities. The Nation's home builders entered into a partnership with Government to produce houses for you. We have hoped this partnership would work. We have met with Government daily, weekly, and monthly in an effort to solve the difficult problems involved. That we have kept faith is best evidenced by FHA's approval of more than one-half million priorities for which builders have the land, financing, and ability to construct new homes immediately.

PROGRAM IS BOGGING DOWN

Unfortunately these houses are not being produced on schedule. As you drive about your town today you see hundreds of houses stalled in all stages of construction while only a few are being completed. Beyond this you see an unprecedented amount of commercial and industrial construction. Knowing of the country's immense war production record you undoubtedly wonder why after 6 months of programming and expediting so little new housing is being completed. The fault lies largely in a totally inadequate supply of less than 20 critical building materials and in the fact that veterans' housing is not receiving under the HH priority system a sufficient percentage of the building materials that are produced. The OPA refused to permit manufacturers of building materials a satisfactory profit last year when the price adjustment should have been made. Price increases made during the last few months will eventually assist the program, but unfortunately serious black markets have developed and construction costs have constantly risen. Delayed construction and substitute materials have increased the cost of housing many times the amount price increases would have involved. Excepting for a few materials, the HH priorities are a blank check on an overdrawn account.

COMMERCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL CONSTRUCTION GOES AHEAD

You have expressed surprise at the amount of commercial and industrial construction. Here are the facts. On December 7 the emergency for veterans' housing was declared. On January 2 the Housing Expediter took over. On February 15 the CPA indicated that a limitation order on commercial and industrial construction would be issued. Nearly 6 weeks later, on March 26, the order came out. During the preceding weeks and months hundreds of millions of dollars of war-deferred commercial construction got under the wire by constructing at least part of the foundation. Even after the issuance of the order, approvals ran as high as 90 percent of all projects submitted. Because of belated and ineffectual action you will continue to see large quantities of labor and materials going into nonessential construction, while new housing for veterans limps along.

WHERE ARE THE PREFABRICATED HOUSES?

Since the Wyatt program calls for 850,000 prefabricated houses, you are wondering why some of them are not available. Although more than 200,000 conventionally constructed houses are under way, very few prefabricated homes have as yet been erected. The Government has gone a long way in giving this new type of construction preferential treatment and prefabs should be appearing in some communities in the not distant future. The Government will guarantee up to 200,000 of them at any one time and, if they cannot be sold, will purchase them on the basis of 90 percent of the standard sale price. The home builder, using conventional methods of construction, is confident that he can build houses more economically than the prefabricator. When economies are proven, he will avail himself of the methods and products of prefabrication. In the meantime, conventional housing is being retarded because some of the materials are going to prefabricating plants at the expense of houses now under construction.

WHERE ARE THE HOMES BEING BUILT FOR RENT?

Although we constructed several hundred thousand housing units for rental during the war period, OPA has made it practically impossible to build such units for you veterans. In typical OPA fashion, the formula has been set at rent levels for new housing which must not be more than 20 percent higher than the prewar rentals for comparable accommodations. Since land and construction costs have increased from 50 percent to 100 percent throughout the country it is obviously imposible for anyone to produce good rental housing under this requirement. Chester Bowles has predicted that "the private home building industry will fail" in doing the veterans' housing job, and has suggested to Mr. Wyatt that Government-owned and operated public housing projects might be necessary. Possibly it is this philosophy that is responsible for OPA's delayed and inadequate price increases in building materials and their rent formula which is preventing an adequate volume of privately built urgently needed rental accommodations.

CAN GOVERNMENT LEGISLATE HOUSING?

Of course, if you want a remodeled Army barrack, the Federal Public Housing Authority is moving ahead with their program for 200,000 of such accommodations to be completed by the end of the year. They have been given a preferential position by law and are now demanding a high priority for some of the materials so urgently needed for houses now being built by and for veterans. Furthermore, the administration is eagerly pressing for a public housing bill known as the W-E-T Bill (S. 1592) which, if passed by the House before it recesses in July, will initiate an immense public housing program, starting with 500,000 public housing units. The Reorganization Plan No. 1 now before the House would establish a permanent NHA to program and control the entire building industry for all time. All of these proposals lead to the socialization of the home-building industry following the pattern established in England and other European countries. We are carrying an all-out fight to prevent this and we know that it has no part in the kind of free enterprise economy you and other veterans fought to preserve.

HOW SOON WILL YOU GET A HOME?

Unfortunately we cannot give you a direct and satisfactory answer to this question. Our industry produced nearly a million homes in the year 1925 without Government assistance or regulation. We have come a long way since then and could produce double that quantity provided building materials were available. As it is now each week sees regulations added to regulations. A thoroughly skilled and potentially unlimited construction industry is straining to provide you with the homes you so well deserve. Working always with the lowest priorities during the war period we produced more than a million homes for war workers. Whether or not we can do a better job for you veterans will depend entirely upon the speed and effectiveness of remedial action by Government.

WHAT CAN YOU DO ABOUT IT?

There are a number of things that you as a veteran can and should do to assist in the present housing program if the privately constructed homes you want are to be built.

First. Consult with home builders, dealers, mortgage bankers, realtors, producers of building materials, and others in your community concerned with the production, financing and sale of housing. These are the men who know the facts and who have your interest at heart. The information they give you will be based upon practical knowledge and will be uncolored by political interests or expediency.

Second. Don't buy or rent any property unless you are convinced that it is fair value from the standpoint of reproduction cost. During the last 5 years the cost of housing, like everything else, has moved up very substantially. Experts disagree as to the trend of construction costs during the next decade. Although some economies will be effected when building materials are in ample supply and labor performs a full day's work, it is believed by many that there will be no substantial, permanent recession from the present cost plateau. Speaking generally, however, the properly priced new house is available at a lower cost and is a better value than existing properties at today's price level.

Third. There is a CPA advisory committee in your town set up for the sole purpose of screening applications for commercial and industrial construction. This order should channel building material into the veterans' housing program and away from deferrable and nonessential construction. Learn the conditions of the order and with other veterans demand that it be enforced in your community.

Fourth. Learn what the veterans' apprentice training program will do in attracting labor into the building trades. When and if the housing program really gets under way, a shortage of skilled mechanics will develop. You veterans should know of the substantial benefits paid by Government to veterans while learning their trade and you should discuss with labor groups the problems of increasing the labor supply and the productivity of labor in home construction.

Fifth. Demand that your local and national officials consult regularly with the home building industry in all its branches and give it support in its stand that private enterprise can do the veterans' housing job. There is no voice in the country today as strong as that of the veteran. It is immensely important that you be fully aware of the problems involved in the production of homes. It is you who can most successfully defeat attempts of proponents of public housing to sabotage the private enterprise program. The veteran's need must not be exploited.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE CAN DO THE JOB

To sum it up, Sergeant Brown, your housing program is seriously bogging down. Our industry has the desire, the skill, the land and the financing to provide by private enterprise methods all the housing that is required. What we need is less legislation and less regulation. We will build as many houses as the supply of materials permits. Our present schedule exceeds even the high goal set by Mr. Wyatt. At this time we are badly stalled and do not see improvement for some months ahead. I suggest to you, therefore, that after learning the facts you make your wishes known in vigorous terms to Government officials and to your Congressmen. We seek your support, Sergeant Brown, and that of 10,000,000 other veterans in preserving the free enterprise method in our home building economy. Only by this means can you get the kind of home you dreamed of during those terrible days on that island in the south Pacific.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK W. CORTRIGHT,
Executive Vice President, National Association of Home Builders.

Reaction to OPA Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting at this point, a news item which appeared in the Monroe Daily Times at Monroe, Wis., which sets forth the report's reaction to the attitude of that community regarding the OPA veto by President Truman:

REACTION TO OPA VETO: NOW WE REALLY HAVE REASON TO CELEBRATE FOURTH OF JULY

"This ought to be the greatest Fourth of July since 1776" was the way several put it when they heard the news from the Times today that President Truman had vetoed the revised OPA Act, apparently killing it without hope of revival.

"Oh, sure, it may work few hardships for a time until adjustments are made," it was generally agreed, "but it will bring back competitive markets."

Relief in the dairy business, particularly cheese making, distributing, and selling, was immense, qualified, of course, by the possibility that Congress might yet pass a resolution indefinitely extending the present set-up.

NO RESOLUTION?

Assurance in Associated Press dispatches today was that such a resolution would not be forthcoming, Democratic leaders in both Houses telling President Truman he had been given a better bill than most wanted, anyhow.

Some who heard the news were most relieved that the Nation would be relieved of thousands of snoopers employed by OPA. These observers charged that the supergestapo of the OPA was not out principally for aiding citizens in all walks of life to benefit under the OPA but primarily for the purpose of trapping someone on a technicality.

IMMEDIATE BENEFIT

Immediate benefit to Monroe is that the cheese business will boom, all in the industry who were told of the veto declared. It means return immediately to the Swiss cheese 6-grade, 6-price plan under Wisconsin law. It means prices for cheese based on quality, not lumping all the Swiss cheese together at a single price, as forced by OPA.

It means there will again be cheese in retail markets after a complete stalemate during the past week. Distributors could not afford to turn loose of cheese to retailers because they did not know how much kick-back they might have to pay factories.

SEE FLOOD OF GOODS

Merchants in all lines were confident the erasure of the OPA law—coming tomorrow midnight unless Congress passed that dreaded resolution—would result in a flood of goods.

Certainly prices in some lines will be a little higher until pent-up demand is satisfied. But the fellow who has wanted a white shirt or a new suit and who has been virtually in rags meanwhile is going to benefit. In a short time, consensus puts it, the adjustments will come.

As far as could be learned by the Times, there was no truth in the rumor that there would be a big bonfire of ration books at midnight tomorrow on the courthouse lawn.

Industrial Statesmanship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, American industry is alert to the problem which was created when President Truman vetoed the price-control bill last week. A cry has gone up throughout the country by certain groups that American business, agriculture, and industry would now gouge the public because of the removal of price ceilings. Every day, however, comes word that the line is being held by retailers, wholesalers, and producers. As evidence of that fact—and it is typical of letters which I have received—I am inserting in the RECORD a copy of a letter which Coopers at Kenosha, Wis., who are manufacturers of high-grade wearing apparel, have recently sent to their customers throughout the Nation. This letter, Mr. Speaker, refutes the prediction by the calamity howlers that the public will pay extremely high prices in this period of transition. Cooper's letter to their customers is further evidence of high industrial statesmanship and I believe that this is the rule rather than the exception.

JULY 2, 1946.

DEAR CUSTOMER: For 5 years all of us have been operating under the restrictions of a war economy. We reserved our traditional American right to complain, but while the war was on we realized that those restrictions were necessary in order to achieve victory. Now, the majority of our elected Representatives in Washington have concluded that the time is here to lift some of those restrictions. Enthusiasts for continued control have made dire predictions of the consequences, and the President has told the Nation how much, in dollars, he believes the cessation of OPA controls will cost.

The fight is not over at this writing, but to whatever extent control of the future price picture is in the hands of American businessmen, it is obvious that they should, and will, make every effort to prevent inflation, and to prove that the dire predictions are unsound. It is clear that the mere passing of controls will not bring an abundance of merchandise at once. All of us know that scarcity of goods combined with large demand and plenty of spending money causes inflation. Inflation can be prevented only if all of us, at all times, can convince the public that it should reconcile itself to living with scarcities until the country's manufacturing plants can catch up with demand. The man who wants a new car, and has the money to pay for it, must not want that car so badly that he will pay a premium to get it. He will be doing both himself and his country a great favor by waiting until he can obtain his car in the regular course of events, at regular prices. The man who is desperately anxious to buy jockey underwear might easily be induced to pay a big premium to get them pronto. But to indulge in this kind of business is wrong. It encourages the inflation we all know to be ruinous. It would be a shortsighted opportunistic way for a businessman to make a quick dollar, only to lose tenfold, later on. People must be urged to wait a little longer.

Keeping all these things in mind, we of Coopers have developed a very clear policy. We do not propose to "charge all the traffic will bear." Any price changes in current production will be made simply to regain current costs so that we can insure the continuance of our business. In order to alleviate the country's underwear shortages, we will buy whatever yarns may be, or become available. The prices of any new items which we may thereby add to the line will be determined on the basis of actual costs. No profiteering. No speculating.

We will continue to operate under price maintenance at the retail level as we have been doing for so many years. For the time being, we propose to let the recently established new OPA prices stand. We ask that, during the interim period, you continue to sell Jockey underwear at the OPA prices shown on the new garment tickets and dated June 12, 1946. When we do refigure prices, we will establish new retail prices on Jockey underwear which will give you your traditional margin of profit on sales. Our one desire will remain what it has always been: to bring to the consuming public the best, most comfortable underwear that can be produced, at the fairest possible prices.

We hope that you, as a retailer, will take a similar attitude. During the war years, retail sales in general have increased. A careful analysis would probably show that much of this volume came through the purchase and sale of products made by new manufacturers who sprang up in various fields, and who, because they were new, were allowed to price their goods at current, and therefore higher, prices. This, in itself, has helped cause a hidden inflation because the public quite frequently has been forced to buy inferior products at higher prices instead of established products at lower prices.

Instead of encouraging that type of inflation, we believe the wise retailer will patriotically content himself with the same, or even less, sales volume for a temporary period, until such time as his established, quality resources can get back into full-scale production. The consuming public must be convinced that it is better to go shirtless, pajamaless, or shortless for a little while longer than it is to pay premium prices for merchandise that may not give satisfaction. A great part of the responsibility for doing that job of convincing rests with you.

In brief, we believe that the present period is a good time for all of us in business to keep our shirts on. Here at Coopers, we do not intend to try to regain any of the profits we have lost because of unfavorable ceilings. We realize that with the cessation of Government controls, the job of preventing inflation rests squarely on us, along with all other American businesses. We take that responsibility most seriously. We ask that you join us, so that together we may do everything in our power to bring about the soonest possible return of normal market conditions, with plenty of good merchandise available for all, and wild inflation for none. Let free and open competition return so that each of us may succeed or fail according to the service we render.

Yours sincerely,

COOPERS, INC.

Felicitations to Philippine Republic Upon July 4, 1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 5, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, last night at the Washington Monument Grounds my appreciation and love for our Nation were again augmented and intensified by reason of the fact that on yesterday the common sense, respect, and good faith of the United States of America gave birth to the Philippine Republic; we had kept our promise; we had kept the faith with the brave patriotic people of the Philippines, and as the flag of the Philippine Republic was proudly borne to the platform last night by two distinguished Filipino citizens, and as the United States Army Air Forces Band played the General MacArthur March, which was written by a distinguished Filipino composer, as these 200,000 people rose and cheered, I specifically sensed that the spirit of the people of the United States had permeated the international atmosphere with a force for international comity, good will, and cooperation which will never be destroyed.

In my own home city of Long Beach and the Eighteenth Congressional District which is located in Los Angeles County, Calif., is a good-sized group of citizens of Philippine births or ancestry. In peacetimes, as well as in war, they have proven steadfast, patriotic, and industrious. Their invitation to me to be their guest speaker at Long Beach, Calif., last night on the occasion of a significant banquet in observation of the occasion of their country's independence, had to be declined a few weeks ago by me, but I felicitate them as my fellow citizens on this happy occasion.

To the Resident Commissioner of the Philippine Republic, Hon. Carlos P. Romulo, who is genuinely and universally respected for his sincere ability and friendships, I extend my felicitations. I am confident that the natural aspirations of the 18,000,000 or more Philippine citizens for a prosperous and enduring republic for a free people, where healthy, happy children will be born of free parents and where human liberties will be held paramount, will find complete reciprocity in the ambition, loyalty, and preservation of all the people of America.

Conferring of Degree of Doctor of Laws on President Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD addresses delivered by President Truman, by His Eminence, Francis Cardinal Spellman, by Rev. Robert I. Gannon, S. J., president of Fordham University, and by Hon. William O'Dwyer, mayor of New York City, on the occasion of the conferring of the honorary degree of doctor of laws upon President Truman by Fordham University, on May 11, 1946.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT TRUMAN

It is very gratifying to be here at Fordham University in New York on the one hundredth anniversary of the granting of the charter to this great institution of higher learning. I am very grateful for this degree of doctor of laws from Fordham. I am happy to become a fellow alumnus of the men who have gone out from Fordham and who are making such a substantial contribution to the Government and to their communities.

I should like in these few minutes to talk especially of the veterans who have enrolled in this university. For I think that there is great significance in the very fact of their being here—and of veterans being in thousands of other universities, colleges, and schools throughout the land.

This Nation has a comprehensive program to return its veterans to civil life. That program is being carried out. The Federal Government, with the wholehearted cooperation of the various States, has provided many things for veterans—medical care, rehabilitation, loans for homes and farms and businesses; it has provided life insurance, and soon it will provide adequate housing. All these benefits are given not as a matter of favor but as a matter of right. Veterans must not be penalized for their war service.

Programs of this nature, though less comprehensive, were established for veterans of past wars. But today we find the beginning of a new and important concept—one which is given concrete evidence by the presence of veterans here today. That concept is that the Nation must provide for its veterans something more than pensions, something more than insurance, loans, and rehabilitation. For those who wish it, the Nation must also provide education.

An enormous and tragic deficit was accumulated during the war—a deficit in education—as millions of young men and women left behind them their books and their schools and colleges to go to war. Not only gratitude, but our national self-reservation as well, require that this educational deficit be diminished or wiped out. By providing educational benefits for our veterans, the Congress has started us on the way to our goal.

Some doubt was expressed a few years ago as to whether there would be any interest among the veterans in these educational aids. There were those—I call them skeptics, or call them men without faith in the youth of our Nation—who thought that only a handful of veterans would choose to come back to the quiet halls of learning. These men were wrong. The problem is not in the lack of veterans seeking education. The problem is to provide accommodations for those who seek it. Even some colleges which had been exclusively for women have had to open their doors to men students. The response of the colleges and schools to this thirst for knowledge of our veterans has been magnificent.

This desire for further schooling which has been evidenced by our veterans—men and women who will be our leaders of tomorrow—is full of healthy promise for the future.

The fact that so many veterans have taken advantage of these educational opportunities increases the heavy responsibility which rests upon our schools and colleges. In preparing our veterans and our other young men and women to live in the new atomic age, education faces the greatest challenge of its history.

There is profound truth in the first line of the new Charter of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization. The Charter declares: "Since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defenses of peace must be constructed."

I fear we are too much concerned with material things to remember that our real strength lies in spiritual values. I doubt whether there is in this troubled world today, when nations are divided by jealousy and suspicion, a single problem that could not be solved if approached in the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount.

The new age of atomic energy presses upon us. Mark that well. What may have been sufficient yesterday is not sufficient today. New and terrible urgencies, new and terrible responsibilities, have been placed upon education.

Ignorance and its handmaidens—prejudice, intolerance, suspicion of our fellow men—breed dictators. And they breed wars. Civilization cannot survive an atomic war. Nothing would be left but a world reduced to rubble. Gone would be man's hope for decency. Gone would be our hope for the greatest age in the history of mankind—an age which I know can harness atomic energy for the welfare of man and not for his destruction.

And so we must look to education, in the long run, to wipe out the ignorance which threatens catastrophe. Intelligent men do not hate other men just because their religion may be different, because their habits and language may be different, or because their national origin or color may be different. It is up to education to bring about that deeper international understanding which is so vital to world peace.

Intelligent Americans no longer think that merely because a man is born outside the boundaries of the United States, he is no concern of ours. They know that in such thinking lie the seeds of dictatorship and tyranny. And they know from sad experience that dictatorship and tyranny are too ruthless to stop at the borders of the United States and conveniently leave us alone. They know what World War II and the atomic bomb have taught them—that we must work and live with all our fellow men if we are to work and live at all. They know that those without economic hope and those to whom education has been forcibly denied, willingly turn to dictators. They know that in a nation where teachers are free to teach and young men and women are free to learn, there is a strong bulwark against dictatorship.

That was the last message from President Roosevelt. In a speech which he wrote just before he died, but which he never delivered, he said:

"We are faced with the preeminent fact that if civilization is to survive, we must cultivate the science of human relationships, the ability of all peoples, of all kinds, to live and work together in the same world, at peace."

Until citizens of America and citizens of the other nations of the world learn this "science of human relationships" of which President Roosevelt spoke, the atomic bomb will remain a frightful weapon which threatens to destroy all of us.

But there is at least one defense against this bomb. That defense lies in our mastering this science of human relationships all over the world. It is the defense of tolerance and of understanding, of intelligence and thoughtfulness.

When we have learned these things, we shall be able to prove that Hiroshima was not the end of civilization but the beginning of a new and better world.

That is the task which confronts education. The veterans who attend the colleges and schools today, and the children of the veterans who will go to school tomorrow, have a right to expect that the training offered to them will fulfill that task. It is not an easy task. It is a most difficult one. It is one which places burdens without precedent, both upon those who teach and upon those who come to be taught. There must be new inspiration, new meaning, new energies. There must be a rebirth of education if this new and urgent task is to be met.

I know that education will meet that challenge. If our civilization is to survive, it must. All of our educational resources must be pledged to that end. The road is hard, but the reward is great.

I am confident that this splendid institution, with its educational system founded upon Christian principles, will play a full and noble part in the great adventure ahead of us. We can and we must make the atomic age an age of peace for the glory of God and the welfare of mankind.

ADDRESS OF HIS EMINENCE, FRANCIS CARDINAL SPELLMAN

It is my honor, Mr. President, to extend to you a warm welcome to Fordham University, New York City. I welcome you as a man, as a fellow American citizen, and as our leader, who, as President of the United States, has the frightsome responsibility and the overwhelming burden of guiding our Nation through the terrors of peace. For peace, as well as war, has its terrors and its dangers.

You, Mr. President, in love of country, on many occasions, both by exhortation and example, have inspired the American people to prayer, prayer for our country and prayer for yourself. My own love of country, a love which can end but with my life, prompts me to plead once again that true Americans everywhere guard with pride, patriotism, duty, and devotion the mightiest pillar of America's liberties—her unity. Faithfully must we defend this sacred heritage lest we become like other nations which wrought doom upon themselves, becoming prey to leaders' lust-born sins of bigotries and greeds which destroy any nation divided against itself. We must stand united against the savageries, blind furies, deceits, and infidelities of forces within and without our borders who seek to impair, undermine, and destroy our democracy. Else we are sinning against the millions of stout-hearted men, who, cloaked in courage down through the years of our Nation's life, have fought and died to preserve our unity.

Upon the far-flung fields of the embattled world less than a year ago, I watched our men under the great skied canopy of night as they dreamed of home. Then, even midst the comradeship of their fellow soldiers, each was alone in silent, solitary journeyings as he threaded his way along the avenues of memory: Rivers, mountains, forests, cities, farms, full of the rich, the poor, the old, the young, all reflecting the freedom of the noble character, the sacred soul of America. Of these they dreamed, these men of a million homes forged into one—for this was America and her blessed way, where each man was a freeman in his native right, where standards were formed in family, church and school, on diamond, field, and rink where courage and fair play were taught in the give and take of life.

Therefore, Mr. President, in welcoming you to this university which I proudly call my own, as a graduate, as a New Yorker, and as Archbishop of New York, I have thought to compose a prayer which I have called Prayer for Our Times. It is a prayer for peace; for peace and unity in our homes, in our country, in the world. This prayer I dedicate to all Americans and to you, Mr. President, our leader:

"At night, beneath a canopy of stars,
Through lonely canyons honeycombed with light,
I walk the strangely vacant avenues
Of this great city that I love—New York.
The past and present mingle in my thoughts,
For, having viewed on battlefields abroad
War's fodder in the cemeteries piled Like old coats left discarded by a road,
And having mused the lessons there revealed
Where sleep the trampled glories of man's past—
The broken swords, the tarnished pomp of power,
Abortive dreams of dynasties, and all
The madness that is spawned from human hearts—
I sense with surety that even here,
Within the confines of our mighty State,
Enduring life may not by us be planned
Or plotted, sciencewise, on measured chart,
Or builded from cement or carven stone.
If dust would live, it must with spirit wed,
And man, vested with vital grace, through work
Must, selfless, serve his God and fellow man.

"This is eternal life—to feed the poor,
To suffer little ones to come to Him
Who, for their sake, Himself, became a child.
Would we America immortal make,
Then must we learn to live in unity—
Neighbor with neighbor—State with State—be strong
In charity, and generous with strength
To open wide our hearts in friendly aid
And feed and clothe the hungry and the cold.
Thus may our land achieve enduring life!
Only in God may mankind hope to rise
Above the Stygian levels of his hate,
Only in God may mankind hope to build
A city and a State that shall endure.

"As eagle poised on wing are we, above
The Great Divide: upon the left, revealed
In blood and sweat and tears, are man-made gods,
Ruling a brotherhood of serfs and slaves;
Upon the right, behold a God-made man,
The flowing mercies of His love flung wide
To cloak our nakedness, to heal our wounds,
No weapons in His hands save such as pierce
His innocence redemptive of our guilt,
No malice in His heart toward race or class,
For all are His, and He to all is all.
It is His arms alone that disarm man,
His wounds alone that close the festering sores;
His grace alone saves nations from decay,
His way alone guides men to live in peace.

"Father a thousand tiny lights break through
The great gray darkness of a city night
And are as candles lit before Thy shrine,
Each speaking to Thee of a special need,
And all these needs are one—and Thou that One!

"Father, grant us the blessing of Thy peace.
Good men have sacrificed, brave men have died
That we and other nations might have peace,
Yet now, triumphant over all our foes,
We find ourselves without the peace we willed,
Without the wit to bind up our own wounds,
Without the courage, here at home, to share
The very gifts we carried overseas,
In the one home brothers are strangers now,
Hatreds gnaw deep, idle our workers stand,
And all our genius, power, and resource
Are sabotaged by stubbornness and greed.

"Father, within our time grant us Thy peace,
Not peace conceived in tyranny and lust
Where Thou art not, where men are pawns, and words,
Many as desert sands, are meaningless.
Father, break down the barriers men have built
Against themselves; remove the barnacles
That slow men's moral progress; guide aright
The steersmen at the helm of human fate.

"Father, within our time grant us Thy peace."

ADDRESS BY THE REV. ROBERT I. GANNON, S. J., PRESIDENT OF FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

One hundred years ago, by a two-thirds vote the people of the State of New York, represented in senate and assembly, did enact as follows: "Jacob Harvey, Peter Hargous, John McKeon, James Roosevelt Bayley (a cousin of the late President's father and first bishop of Newark), John McCloskey (afterwards archbishop of New York and first American cardinal), William Starrs, Hugh Kelly, David Bacon, and their successors are hereby constituted a body corporate by the name of St. John's College, Fordham, the said corporation to be in all respects a university and its object the promotion of education." The charter was signed by Gov. Silas Wright on the 10th day of April 1846.

Thereupon a little school of 77 students, begun 5 years before by Archbishop Hughes of New York, became the first Catholic university in the Northeast, with power from the State "to confer diplomas or honorary testimonials in any such form as it might designate." Since that year, a rough estimate would indicate that this power has been exercised more than 25,000 times, and of the names listed in the trustees' book as graduates in arts, sciences, law, philosophy, and medicine, many are today of more than passing interest. Confining one's research to the Empire State and to this interesting little city of ours, modestly referred to as the metropolis of the New World, one will fine recorded here two cardinal archbishops, one governor, and two—I almost said lord mayors. No less dear to Fordham, however, than these graduates who came to her in their youth, are her adopted sons and daughters, many of whom are present this afternoon in cap and gown. Here on this very spot the Holy Father, himself a Fordham doctor of laws, greeted the members of the faculty in 1936. Here the late President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who had received his degree in 1929, came again in 1940, returning with affection, as he said, to his alma mater. At the foot of these very steps he took the review of the Reserve Officers Training Corps, with Governor Lehman, another honorary son, and our beloved Cardinal Spellman of the class of 1911 standing beside him. Since then this terrace has been called the terrace of the presidents, for now the list of those who have been honored here includes not only the late President Roosevelt, but the former president of Peru, the president of Paraguay, the former president of Bolivia, the president of Poland, and again a president of the United States, Harry S. Truman, whom Roosevelt chose as his successor in the White House.

It was gracious of you, Mr. President, to accept our invitation and to forego a crowded day at your desk in the Oval Room, in order to signalize this charter centenary of ours. It was equally gracious of you to waive the restriction of protocol that would normally make the awarding of other degrees today improper and to welcome as your fellow-classmate His Eminence of Westminster.

Cardinal Griffin, the first English cardinal ever to visit our shores, has traveled far by air to reciprocate a gesture of lasting friendship. The precious freight he brought with him—the love of English Catholics for the Catholics of the United States—was fortunately imponderable, as otherwise a fleet of Skymasters and Constellations would hardly have been sufficient.

Great then is the pomp and dignity with which we have surrounded the centenary of our charter, but our purpose has not been a merely sentimental one. We have wished from the beginning to emphasize for all alike that a Catholic university in our country owes a deep debt of gratitude to the state, and that the state, in turn, is served at least as well by a Catholic university as by another. Sometimes a cynic will place quotation marks around the consecrated phrase "The land of the free," and not without occasional justification. We have pressure groups that complicate our economic and political life. We have persecuting groups that disturb our social and religious peace. But by and large, our country can still be said to represent the nearest approach the world has seen to freedom, true freedom, the freedom of law-abiding, God-fearing men who see in license and anarchy just as much slavery as they see in the totalitarian state. The test of this high claim is found in the traditions of American education. Today, as in 1846, a group of Catholics, or Methodists, or Jews can go to the regents of the University of the State of New York and get themselves a charter for a great university, tax exempt, where their own religious and social ideals can be developed and explained to the rising generation. All that the regents require is that the teaching be kept on the high plane of excellence demanded by the State and that the ideals concerned are in conformity with the laws of the land.

From that day forward this private university is accepted into an honored fellowship and aided in innumerable ways by the chancelor, the regents, the commissioner of education, and a most efficient staff. This, of course, could not be true if this religiously controlled institution were not manifestly helping the good order of the State. New York is covered by a network of excellent colleges and universities, most of them nearing the century mark. They represent an investment of more than $550,000,000—which used to seem like a great deal of money and even now represents the price of several atom bombs. It is fairer, however, to say that their replacement value would be staggering; and if they had to be bought, built, or supported by the taxpayer, Governor Dewey would never know the luxury of playing with a surplus. More than that, however, much more than that, is the fact that when these institutions are weaving into the mental and moral fiber of their students not only facts and skills but faith and hope and charity, the State can always rest assured that its voters are trustworthy, its homes are secure, its women are respected, and its children have an even chance of being wise and good.

In this charter centenary, then, we see a symbol of one of the noblest forces in our national life—the freedom of religious education. At this convocation Fordham University bows in gratitude to the regents of the University of the State of New York for the opportunity of serving God in the sovereign people of this State, and the regents, in their turn, bow to Fordham in acknowledgment of a hundred years of faithful, efficient, and fruitful service.

I hope, Mr. President, that this occasion does not seem unworthy of the great honor you have done us.

ADDRESS BY MAYOR WILLIAM O'DWYER, OF NEW YORK

I really do not know in what capacity I should speak this evening. I feel like a dual personality. Should I talk as the mayor? Or should I talk as a Fordham alumnus? I think I'll settle that problem by talking as both.

As mayor, I bring to Fordham the congratulations and good wishes of the city of

New York. Fordham University has been part of the life of our city for a century. And our city has been part of the life of Fordham for a century. Fordham is as distinctly a part of the tradition and state of mind we know as New York City, as the city's most revered son, the late Alfred E. Smith—or as its famous street, Broadway—or as its historic and beautiful city hall.

Fordham was born within the city's present lines. It has grown as the city has grown. It has matured as one of the largest and most influential Catholic universities in the world—just as the city of New York has matured as the largest, and, I believe, the most influential city in the world. That is why I want you to know, Father Gannon, that the congratulations and sentiments of the city of New York are warm and true. They are not the usual formal good wishes delivered by a mayor upon anniversary occasions. For example, during the past week, the presidents of our four city colleges have been in touch with me. They knew that I was to speak here this evening. Each of them expressed his respect and admiration for Fordham. And each was eager to have me extend the congratulations of his college—of City College, Hunter College, Brooklyn College, and Queens College—to their good neighbor, Fordham University. The fine academic and athletic relations which exist between Fordham and the public colleges is a source of real pleasure to me, both as mayor of the city and as a Fordham man. I know that these good relations will continue.

There are two principal reasons, it seems to me, why Fordham has played such an important role in the life of our city. For a century, it has enriched the culture of our city by educating many thousands of our citizens according to the true principle of education—the principle that stands for the full and harmonious development of the intellectual, moral, and physical faculties of man. The second reason is that the university, as a matter of policy, has acknowledged in its literature and in its activities a responsibility to the metropolitan community. To that end it has successfully maintained its professional schools in lower Manhattan. Fordham students are predominantly New Yorkers. Many lawyers, judges, public officials, teachers, and social workers in this city were educated in Fordham. The foresight of the men who established the law school in downtown New York enabled many, who otherwise would have been unable to do so, to follow their chosen profession. I know that I am grateful for the opportunity it afforded me. The school of social service has made its contribution to the city. Many of its graduates are employed in the department of welfare, the probation offices, and in other city agencies. The graduate courses offered by the school of education are attended by hundreds of our city teachers who want to improve themselves in their profession.

There are probably some alumni here who would say that there is a third reason why Fordham and New York City have been so closely identified in the public mind. New York has always offered the best. In baseball it was the Yankees, Giants, and Dodgers. In football it was the Fordham Rams. But after dealing with the UN for the past few weeks, I have become something of a diplomat. So I'll stick to the first two reasons.

But, seriously—up to this time I have been speaking principally in my capacity as mayor. I have talked of Fordham as a part of New York City. But as an alumnus I take pride with all of you in the fact that our alma mater has grown in prestige as a national university. I think this has been in large measure due to the steady development of its graduate school. And it is my belief that the graduate school must play a major part in Fordham's future. It is through scholarship that Fordham has and must continue to make its influence felt.

Today we celebrate the charter centennial—the year 1846 when our alma mater was chartered by the Legislature of the State of New York "to be in all respects a university." That was a significant year in the history of Fordham. For it was in that same year that the college was placed under the direction of the Jesuits. We commemorate the grant from New York State to Fordham to become a university. But actually it was not until many years later, under the steady and tireless efforts of the Jesuits, that Fordham actually did become a university in fact. Its growth through the years surpasses, I am certain, the fondest hopes of its founders and of the Jesuits who nurtured the college and university through the past century.

Fordham has made great progress since the days of old Rose Hill. It will make even greater progress in the future. I join with His Eminence Cardinal Spellman, our most distinguished alumnus, and with you, Father Gannon, and with my fellow alumni in wishing that our alma mater's influence as a university will continue to grow, and that it will make even greater contribution in its second century to our church, to our country, to our city, and to our future generations.

Peace Goals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 8 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of an address delivered by me on June 26, 1946, at a dinner in New York City, marking the anniversary of the signing of the United Nations Charter. The address is entitled "Peace Goals."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This first anniversary of the signing of the Charter of the United Nations is fittingly celebrated by concentrating on peace goals.

They are those objectives which the nations might practically achieve together before some world leader announces them as war goals. The achievement of them through the machinery of the United Nations, developing a habit among free peoples of collaboration on a world program, would give vitality to the Charter and demonstrate that we can peacefully attain the broader objectives.

Working together patiently under God's guidance is the only way to that understanding and confidence which will make the United Nations effective.

The machinery of general international organization cannot run itself. Only men who know what they want to achieve, and who have the united support of their several peoples, can supply the energy that will make the wheels turn.

Therefore, through national organizations of business, labor, agriculture, veterans, women, education, religion, and international relations, we strive to—

Plan a Nation-wide educational program on the United Nations;

Inspire Americans, especially such citizens' organizations as the 150 conferring under the sponsorship of the Foreign Policy Association today, to look ahead and discuss what they hope to see accomplished through United Nations machinery, particularly the goals toward which they want their representatives in the various organs, commissions, and specialized agencies to work;

Relate the main lines of American foreign policy to the task of clarifying our peace goals;

To suggest a few of the specific goals on which to exercise the relatively new function of acting together internationally.

Our deeds will count, not only in the attainment of their beneficent objectives, but also in building up morale to wage peace generally.

Every strategic point gained in collaboration with our allies in the peace struggle will bring the world nearer to the final victory over the impersonal enemies of mankind.

In warfare we have defeated the enemy. In peace we have not consolidated the victory. This will not be achieved unless the purposes and principles of the United Nations are made living motives in the souls of men.

To bring this about, two immediate steps are necessary:

The holding action to prevent threats to peace defined in article 2 of the Charter. Thus, as in the shadow of a great rock, we could enjoy the security in which the other and corresponding step can be taken.

Operation of the machinery in definite, specific, common enterprises.

For example, the International Labor Organization, having more than 50 member states, has the basic purpose of promoting improved labor standards and social security in all countries. It aims to eliminate low labor standards, which cause unrest and disturbance, socially and economically. It is one of the specialized agencies enabled by article 57 of the Charter to be brought into relationship with the United Nations. This must be done by agreement with the Economic and Social Council, subject to approval by the General Assembly.

At the Paris Conference, held last December, the International Labor Organization prepared to sever its loose ties with the League of Nations, and to affiliate with the United Nations.

The necessary steps of severing connections with the League of Nations were initiated at the Paris Conference, subject to ratification by the member states of the International Labor Organization. A draft agreement of relationship between the International Labor Organization and the United Nations was approved by the Economic and Social Council during the Council's present session here in New York.

It is hoped that this agreement will be approved by the General Assembly and by the General Conference of the International Labor Organization next September.

This International Labor Organization is a vigorous, going concern. Its practical effect on international cooperation is indicated by the fact that at Paris it readmitted into membership a former enemy state—Italy. Here is a twentieth century tool of great effectiveness for peace, whose energy could be employed on a constructive program against common impersonal enemies. In developing its process of working, new patterns of thinking and common understanding would be crystallized into custom and habit. If it should become an agency of the United Nations, it would bring to our peace objective vast manpower for production, trade, and reconstruction. It might contribute to industrial peace a mode of relations between employer and employee that would reduce work stoppages which endanger the chances of winning the peace, just as lost man-hours endanger success in the battles of war.

Another illustration of positive operation of United Nations machinery in common enterprises is the Food and Agriculture Organization, consisting of 42 member states. This is a world organization for pooling the best knowledge and experience relating to nutrition, agricultural production, and marketing, and the best use of farm, fishery, and forestry resources. It is strictly a fact-finding and advisory body. It does not put into effect any of its recommendations. This approach, unspectacular though it be, implements one of our specific peace goals.

The work of the Food and Agriculture Organization is designed to be integrated with that of the United Nations Economic and Social Council. It can, without loss of identity, constitute a part of the United Nations.

May I here quote from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, filed in the Senate by me June 11, 1945:

"No lasting peace is possible until the nations of the world work together successfully to reduce the underlying social and economic causes of aggression and war, or, if possible, to remove them entirely. The prosperity of this country, as well as the peace of the world, is at stake. Without economic collaboration and improved levels of living and of production throughout the world, or at least in most of it, the maintenance and improvement of production and levels of living in the United States will be impossible. We cannot hope to have prosperity in this country if the other countries are sunk in depression.

"The proposed Food and Agriculture Organization, by providing the nations of the world a new means of working together to improve the efficiency of food and agriculture production and distribution, the living conditions of food and agriculture producers, and the levels of consumption of users of those products, can make a great contribution to world security in an important economic sphere."

Definitely, one peace goal is to give the power of active public opinion to this common enterprise.

Another good habit-forming exercise should have positive stimulation, namely: The system of consultation consolidated by the Act of Chapultepec. The 21 republics of the Western Hemisphere constituting the Pan American Union are also members of the United Nations.

The final act of the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace at Mexico City, in February and March 1945, comprehended juridical, economic, social, political, and security programs designed to preserve the independence and dignity of each member state, and to provide for determination of controversies which might arise among them. At that time, before the Charter had been formulated, the regional organization could initiate the ultimate sanction of military force in the event of a threat or act of aggression.

The Act of Chapultepec, which provided especially for reciprocal assistance and American solidarity, was so designed that it must conform to the principles and policies of the United Nations Charter subsequently to be adopted. Within the letter and spirit of the Charter which we celebrate, this benevolent organization of American Republics is striving to carry into effect article 52 of the Charter, namely:

"The members of the United Nations entering into such arrangements or constituting such agencies shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council.

"The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies either on the initiative of the states concerned or by reference from the Security Council."

The effect of the ratification of the Charter upon the Act of Chapultepec was principally to take away from the Union of American Republics the right of regional enforcement action without the previous authorization of the Security Council.

Thus, a threat of aggression may not now be met without first obtaining direction of the Security Council.

However, it left to the regional organization two extremely important functions:

First. The right and the duty to consult among themselves in order to agree upon the measures that may be advisable to take;

Second. The inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack should occur against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

The system of consultation has developed in the Western Hemisphere during the past 56 years and has gradually become a substitute for the use of armed force.

During the past year the harmony of the Western Hemisphere has been disturbed, but no war has occurred, and none will occur.

The situation calls for the exercise of great wisdom, poise, patience, and consideration of all the various points of view. Here is an opportunity to strengthen the habit of collaboration and achieve both restoration of harmony in this hemisphere and the strengthening of the machinery of the United Nations.

Other illustrations of goals and of public participation are the high points advanced by speakers today covering eight areas. They avoided generalities and advanced highly significant and realizable objectives. Categorically, they are:

Expansion of trade and employment.

Reconstruction and development.

Human rights—freedom of information and education.

Health and social welfare.

Peaceful settlements.

United military defense.

Atomic energy—control and utilization.

Trusteeship and self-government for dependent areas.

Consideration of your time impels me to omit discussion of these goals now, notwithstanding that these, too, are objectives which the nations might practically achieve together before some world leader announces them as war goals.

Our best hope for preventing war is international collaboration on positive goals:

1. Developing large-scale plans to which each country can contribute in terms of its ability—really investing the peaceful struggles in a cooperative program as we did in the violent struggle. The way to stay united is to get busy on common enterprises that we can agree on.

2. Concentrating the forces and facilities we have on specific objectives that we feel confident we can take within a reasonable time—and then to apply the principles of logistics to make an effective and concerted drive. Resolutions and recommendations on principles and purposes are not enough; we must be very specific on exactly what each country can do in a plan of combined operations, organize task forces, pool resources, bring the experts and organizers of the various countries together for united effort to get things done. People can't act unless they see clearly where we are headed and what is required of them.

3. By doing important things together at a few strategic points we will gain strength and build up morale in the peaceful struggles as we did in the war. Only by taking next steps with precision and determination will people learn to win the final victory over the impersonal enemies of mankind. There is danger in dissipating our forces on too many fronts, trying to lick tough problems with phrases and speeches. Acting together is the purpose of talking things over together. Start with the goals we most universally agree on and thus create a pattern of common action to move forward in the more controversial areas.

4. Behind whatever programs we agree on must be a popular will and determination to risk and sacrifice and persist.

In the war, we were very specific; we said we had to use inland shipping facilities to rush war materials to ports and to bring up troops; and this meant saving fuel, dimouts—getting people to do specific things to help reach the goal. The same kind of specific thinking and planning is needed for peace goals. They have to be the accepted goals of the people—not only our people but the people of the other cooperating nations. And the people have to understand clearly why such goals are given priority attention, what it will take to realize them, what others are prepared to do and are doing.

Now that the United Nations machinery is set up, we and all the other United Nations peoples have to make up our minds what we want to accomplish with it, and in what order—putting first things first. This is a challenge to all the citizen groups that have taken such an active interest in American participation in the United Nations. We're now ready to participate—to do something. What? And how? This is a challenge to the writers and broadcasters and film makers—to make the goals of peace as vivid and as urgent as the goals in the war.

Let's talk about the real things we want to do, and spend less time speculating about whether there'll be another war and what this nation or that politician may be maneuvering for.

We need a vast educational program to make the possibilities of peace goals understood and to help people to understand what they can do to cooperate.

So this is an invitation on the first anniversary of the signing of the Charter for public participation in the setting of peace goals and the task of organizing collaboration of the nations to achieve the goals agreed upon.

Henry James talked about the moral equivalent for war. He thought it involved mobilizing people for common struggle against the common impersonal enemies. If once they could get the exhilaration of planning campaigns against disease and hunger, of collaborating in vast projects of construction and development, they might bring to bear on constructive programs all of the forces they expended in the fury of destructive warfare. In the process of working and planning together they might develop new patterns of thinking and come to understand each other.

For centuries men fought to take things away from each other in a world of low productivity and to collect tribute from the conquered. In the twentieth century the wars are started by organizers who claim they want to introduce new orders. They gain their dynamic force from an appeal to the sense of national superiority. Behind all this is a powerful drive toward applying the science and "know-how" of our times, and breaking down the interfering barriers that frustrate large-scale organization and exchange. Either we do by agreement and free collaboration through the United Nations what we know is possible to give peoples everywhere opportunity to fashion their futures with twentieth-century tools, or we confront the almost inevitable task of resisting in war the attempt of another set of strong men to impose order and to organize the world as a whole.

Peace goals, then, are those objectives which the nations might practically achieve together before some world leader announces them as war goals.

We in the United States assert the belief that we can do cooperatively and by agreement what must somehow be done—that we can peacefully apply what science has taught us—that we can find ways of releasing and organizing the productive and creative powers of people on a world-wide basis through the processes of democracy. To make good on this belief, we must move quickly to collaborate with other free peoples on a program of action through the machinery of the United Nations.

The Conscription Run-Around

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The Conscription Run-Around," published in the Progressive of June 17, 1946.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CONSCRIPTION RUN-AROUND

(By Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.)

It is tragic that so vital an issue as peacetime conscription has been snarled in so much confusion, distortion, and misunderstanding. False and malicious statements have turned up repeatedly in the press and on the radio. Administration spokesmen, too, have added to the confusion. Apparently we are currently being subjected to a campaign to convince those in service and their relatives that many of those now in the armed forces cannot be released until Congress grants the draft extension demanded by the administration.

Last week, when the subject of extending the draft was before the Senate, I worked, fought, and voted against the restoration of provisions to draft 18- and 19-year-olds because I am convinced the facts prove that we can and are building a volunteer Army adequate to our needs and without resorting to so undemocratic a course of action as peacetime conscription. We lost that fight. The vote was 53 to 26.

With Senator EDWIN JOHNSON, of Colorado, I introduced an amendment to make service in the Army more remunerative and worthwhile. This amendment provides for increasing the pay of privates from $50 to $75 a month; privates first class from $54 to $80; corporals from $66 to $90; and sergeants from $78 to $100. I was happy to lead the fight for this amendment and to be able to steer it successfully through the Senate.

I hope that this latter amendment survives in whatever final version of draft extension is passed, for I am convinced that it will help materially to build up an adequate volunteer force as an alternative to peacetime conscription.

It is shocking to me to have it suggested that we must rely indefinitely upon the teenagers as our main source of manpower. A country of the size of the United States, with its enormous capacity for production of wealth, should be willing to make payments commensurate with the service which the men who go into the armed forces are expected to render.

The challenging possibility of building up an Army composed entirely of volunteers has too long been obscured in the vast confusion that has been generated on this issue of military preparedness.

I do not accuse the War Department or anyone else of purposely confusing the facts and issues involved in this legislation, but I do say that the sequence of events has created a serious confusion in the mind of the general public. If someone had deliberately set out to confuse the public and thereby engender a natural fear that draft extension was the only safe course, it could not have been done more effectively. In a situation analogous to the confusion that accompanied the demobilization plans—and the much-revised draft standards—the War Department and other Administration officials have presented so many different stories and so many different sets of figures that a thoroughly confused public does not know what to believe.

Fortunately, the issues involved are indeed simple and straightforward compared with the complex matters of public policy that the Senate has had under consideration during the past weeks. Basically, the Congress has only to make a factual determination of the military needs, balance that off against the best estimates of available manpower by voluntary recruiting, and then make a finding concerning the necessity of extending compulsory military service. It is just that simple. It is a decision that can and should be reached on the basis of facts, but the Congress must have all the facts, not made-to-order arguments.

From my examination of the testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and the House, I have come to the conclusion that the clear-cut opinions of those testifying in behalf of draft extension are not backed up by clear-cut evidence. The most favorable evaluation of the supporting data is to judge them inconclusive. The War Department's own estimates, when carefully analyzed, can be used to present an entirely different case from the one which it has attempted to make before the two committees of the Congress.

What is the basic philosophy behind this bill? Is it intended as a temporary measure to bridge a gap in our military manpower needs? Or is it the opening wedge by the military to establish permanent peacetime conscription in the United States?

I am singularly impressed by the fact that the original request by those who wanted to extend the draft was that the extension be continued for an indefinite period. General Hershey persisted in urging an indefinite extension before the Senate Military Affairs Committee when other spokesmen were willing to take less. Even more damaging and better illustrative of the basic philosophy behind this bill are the data submitted to the committee by General Textor.

General Textor made a special manpower study, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War, but independent of the official estimates. His study made a very convenient situation for administration spokesmen, who could choose the favorable facts from each without trying to reconcile the two.

General Textor did not make the admission that it was War Department thinking that the draft should be extended indefinitely, but his methods of forecasting did that for him. By the general's formulas, we face a steep decline in the size of a volunteer Army that can be maintained. By his formulas, there seems to be no hope whatsoever for a tapering-off of compulsory service.

From the methods employed in the other War Department estimates, it is not possible to make similar analysis, but it is significant that these estimates, too, admit of no temporary crisis that will be met by a temporary extension of selective service.

The point I am trying to make is this: If the War Department is right in its estimates and philosophy concerning the need for selective service, then Congress and the country should know right now that the arguments made for this extension of the draft can be made again for a permanent peacetime draft. If it is not a temporary program, then, one way or the other, Congress should be laying the groundwork now for a peacetime program—not a postponement of the issue for a year, and a postponement of all the uncertainties that hang over those of draft age.

Personally, I am not willing to admit that we cannot have an adequate and successful Army by voluntary enlistments. I do not concur in the pessimistic outlook of the War Department or their proposed easy way to raise and maintain an Army.

If we are ever going to get rid of the military hang-over of war, now is the time to cut loose from conscription and begin to build a volunteer Army for the future security and protection of the United States, as well as for the replacement of those now in the service.

One of the primary arguments made in behalf of this bill is the argument that a strong Army is necessary if we are to assume our proper role in world affairs. Then the immediate assumption is made that a voluntary Army cannot be strong enough or, secondly, that it would be a psychological weakness to begin to prepare for peace while there are any war clouds on the horizon. These are good superficial arguments, but anyone who stops to reflect for a few minutes will agree that our national strength in manpower for any emergency in the near future does not lie in the few additional conscripts, to be made up largely of teen-agers, whom we could train in the next year.

Our national strength and manpower reservoir for any emergency needs in the near future are the trained millions who have just come out of actual combat in this war. If we pass up the opportunity now to make the transition to a peacetime Army while we have this reservoir, we shall be jeopardizing our security sometime in the future.

I take little stock in the argument that we can bluff the other nations of the world by the utilization of the method of extending the draft. We shall not fool anyone by trying to play a psychological international poker game.

Even the military leaders of our Nation will admit that, man for man, a volunteer army is better than a conscript army. How many men can we get by voluntary recruitment, and how far short is that of our needs?

A year ago the Army estimated that no more than 300,000 enlistments could be had by July 1, 1946. Actually, the enlistments will be about 800,000. Missing the mark by 500,000 men is not very close estimating.

Of course, it is true that the 300,000 estimate was made before the liberal Recruiting Act was passed. But if that substantial increase can be attributed to the Recruiting Act, then a policy just slightly more generous can bring us more men than we need. And this figure of 800,000 does not include 150,000 officers, most of whom are serving voluntarily.

What is the magnitude of the predicted gap between enlistments and required strength a year from now, on July 1, 1947? The War Department has two figures: General Paul's shortage figure of 165,000 men, and General Textor's shortage figure of 51,000. To be brought up to date with the stop-gap extension of the draft, both of these estimates would have to be reduced by the number of persons drafted between May 15 and July 1, of this year.

If we compare the size of these figures with the Army's margin of error in their last year's estimates, we have good reason to wonder why anyone can attach any great significance to these anticipated shortages.

All sorts of dire predictions were made about the probable decline in enlistments after the passage of the stop-gap legislation on May 15. Yet if the figures quoted in the press are correct, there has been only a very minor drop in enlistments, and present levels are still substantially above all previous and recent estimates of the War Department.

Those in favor of the draft extension have been citing enlistment figures showing that the rate of enlistment has dropped from 185,000 men last November to 43,000 in May. The plain fact is that the Army could not use and does not want men in the numbers that were enlisting last November as a permanent Army. With the November rate of enlistments we could maintain an Army of three or four million men, depending on the terms of enlistment.

Furthermore, the Army has consistently underestimated enlistments. Even in the recent months, which are alleged to be such a disappointment, look at the Army's estimates and the actual enlistments: For April the Army's estimate was 56,000, the actual figure was 63,000. For May the Army's estimate was 39,000, the actual figure was 43,000.

Even this allegedly low level is substantially above what the Army concedes is necessary to reach its requirements in the next year or more. What are the Army's estimates based on? They are based on a minimum enlistment in 1947 of 12,500 men a month.

The fact is that even back in 1937 we were getting about half that many, with the totally negative approach and emphasis existing at that time in regard to enlistment. There is absolutely no reason, in my judgment, why we cannot maintain the enlistment rate figure somewhere between 12,500, which the Army says is too low, and 43,000, which is more than ample if sustained.

At the present time, our volunteer strength is almost up to the level which the Army seeks to attain 1 year from now. And it is the Army's position that we cannot maintain that volunteer strength, that the situation will steadily deteriorate. In other words, it is not a question of attaining a given goal of voluntary enlistments. We have practically done that already. It is a question of maintaining that size against the effects of attrition and completion of enlistment terms.

If we ever hope to get back to a voluntary army, now is the time to break away from the draft. There is absolutely no reason why we cannot have an army of any reasonable size, provided we are willing to increase the pay of men in the service and increase the respectability and economic opportunities offered by military service so that it may compete in those respects with other lines of work and with the professions.

We should pay for this service what it is worth. Why should we not? Why should we expect to obtain men for police service overseas at a lower rate of pay than we are willing to pay men who are in the police service of the municipalities of this country? Why should we expect to obtain men for overseas police duties at a rate of pay which is less than we are now paying for farm labor on most of our farms? I think the reluctance to pay for service in the armed forces what it is worth is a carry-over from the time when we had a small standing army and when we were not utilizing the highly mechanized and technical devices of war which are now necessary in connection with the maintenance of a modern army.

What is the outlook for the draftees in the Army who are anxious to get out? We now have about 600,000 draftees. I believe that the Army should be required to discharge those who have had 18 months of service, and those who are fathers, if they wish to get out.

From a purely statistical standpoint we could release all of our draftees now, and still have an army approximately the size of the contemplated peacetime army. Of course, from a practical standpoint, there must be a satisfactory transition because an army is an organized unit, not composed merely of numbers that can be shifted freely from job to job. Furthermore, there may be some transitional needs—some war wind-up jobs to be done in the coming year.

According to General Textor's estimates, we can release all those who have had 18 months or more of service and incur an additional deficit of only 170,000 men. In other words, we will be able to release during the year July 1, 1946, to July 1, 1947, 570,000 of the 600,000 inducted men now in service. The other 400,000 men to be released are already included in the estimate, having served more than 24 months.

The remaining 30,000 will not have served 18 months a year from now. These statistics clearly point out that the additional manpower burden of releasing those who have served only 18 months is relatively small compared with the immediate job ahead of releasing the large bulk of draftees who have or will have served longer than that by July 1, 1947.

It is grossly misleading to say that we must have draftees to replace those men. By the Army's own estimates, about 500,000 of those Army jobs must be eliminated in order that the Army may get down to its peacetime size. The only effect whatsoever that the immediate releases can have is to accelerate slightly the demobilization schedule within the next year. It will have no effect on our planned ultimate peacetime strength.

In summary, then, I am convinced from an exhaustive study of the facts that neither extension of the draft nor the enactment of peacetime conscription is necessary to build an Army as large and as strong as the War Department itself demands, but rather that this can be achieved by purely volunteer methods.

This we can do by making military service more attractive, more democratic, more remunerative, and more replete with opportunities for young men embarking on a career. It was for this reason that I led the fight for the pay-increase amendment, and it is for this reason that I, and a number of other Senators opposed to conscription, voted for the temporary extension measure last week—because it was the only way we could vote for this vital incentive proposal for volunteer building, and because it contained a number of other effective checks on indiscriminate drafting.

The fight against peacetime conscription is far from ended. Here, as in every critical field today, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

The Silver Bloc

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 8 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting article entitled "The Silver Bloc," prepared by Mr. Wade V. Lewis, a well-known consulting mining engineer of Boulder, Mont.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ignorance, as demonstrated over the ages, is more dangerous than dishonesty. The latter is usually readily combated, while ignorance frequently wears the cloak of sincerity. A prominent national weekly magazine, under date of June 8, 1946, features an editorial entitled "On the Prowl Again," referring to those particular 12 United States Senators, headed by Senator PAT MCCARRAN (Democrat, Nevada), who sponsor a higher price for silver. The editorial not only impugns the motives of the western Senators, inferring they are selfish motives for the benefit of a minority, but even suggests that higher silver would promote "runaway inflation." We attribute honesty and sincerity to the editorial, but doubt that the writer thereof possessed full knowledge and facts relating to the economics involved.

First, let us be honest with ourselves, and recognize that inflation is already here. Not the runaway inflation that appeared in Germany following World War I, but a degree of inflation, nevertheless.

For several reasons, including unavoidable war expenditures, including perhaps some unwise and excessive administration spending, we have inflation, with our national debt approaching $300,000,000,000. This sum will not be paid off in terms of dollars as we have known them. It must then be paid off in a different kind of dollars. The main object now is to pay it off in a manner such that it will hurt no one class too much. The blow must be cushioned, the operation must be as painless as possible.

Three hundred billion dollars is a lot of money. For example, the entire copper production of the Butte, Mont., mines, operating from the surface to a mile in depth, working 1 to 10,000 men for 80 years in hundreds of miles of underground workings, produced a gross copper value of only about three billions. This sum, representing a part of the real wealth of our country, was spent, during the peak of war expenditures, in just 8 days.

To back our debt and the issuance of billions of dollars in paper money—and our bonds are nothing more than interest bearing paper money—we have in the National Treasury something like twenty billions in gold and a lesser amount of silver.

After the Civil War was over a farmer entered his local hardware store and asked to buy a stove. The price quoted him was "$50 in gold or $150 in greenbacks," the paper money of those times. This situation may not, but can, recur.

Notwithstanding currency legislation and administrative rulings, the people of any country have a way of pegging values to their own liking. In the Western States people prefer silver money to paper. A few already are hoarding silver coins in their dresser drawers. This hedge against inflation may do them little good, because the day may come when silver will be called in, in the same manner as gold was withdrawn from circulation.

Already in Europe people prefer an American silver dollar to an American paper dollar. In some European sections the American silver dollar is at a premium of 100 to 3,000 percent over its paper brother.

The writer happens to be a mining engineer and is now mining silver-lead ore. He did not advocate higher silver because he owned silver property or interests; he became interested in silver mining because he anticipated a logical rise in the price of silver. At the present price of 71.11 cents per ounce of silver, he is operating at a loss. He thinks in terms of going hundreds of feet underground at high cost to secure an ounce of silver with which to buy a pound of butter produced on the surface. He considers the relative amount of electrical power and human energy consumed in acquiring the ounce of silver and the pound of butter. With many others, he is now thinking in terms of hard money as compared to printing-press money and hopes for a reasonable profit in order to maintain or establish basic pay rolls. The writer might be called a speculator, in the sense of "one who thinks and plans for a future event, and acts before it occurs." All persons in the mining business must follow metal prices and be ready to shift from one metal to the other, one property operation to the other, dependent on economic conditions and metal trends. In this sense, the mining business is little different from any other business and requires the same principles.

The 12 western Senators from mining States are not advocating a higher silver price per ounce because their States produce silver; they are not advocating it for selfish or "silver bloc" reasons; they advocate higher silver because the rise of silver, together with other metals, was inevitable, based on machinery prices, wage costs, and other economic factors; they advocate higher silver because the silver producer was not paid the full value for his product, and because a special group has been buying silver at the expense of the United States Treasury and American taxpayers. Our 12 western Senators know mining costs and know that silver is a byproduct in connection with most mining operations. They know that our currency system will eventually need all the hard money backing that it can acquire, and they know that mining in general must be stimulated, that doing so will establish basic taxable pay rolls and aid recovery and reconversion. They recognize fully the economic factors involved and are not ignoring a national problem by burying their heads in the desert sands of Washington.

Inflation, to a degree, is here. An important point is to honestly recognize this as an economic fact. Instead of acknowledging our economic situation and approaching it in a remedial, scientific manner, we attempt to readjust our price structure piecemeal. Prices of manufactured goods and wages are directly allied with metal prices. Instead of scientifically surveying our problem we raise first wages, second, manufactured commodities, ignoring the metals taken from the depths of the earth.

Logic would call for an over-all appraisal of our economics, then if need be, raise first, the price of metals, second, manufactured goods, third, wages. Instead we approach the situation unintelligently and piecemeal, stimulating dissatisfaction and strikes. We operate in reverse, considering first, wages, second, manufactured products, third, metals. The last is a source of the first two. We begin at the wrong end of economics, ignoring the mainspring of industry, metal mining, stumbling along, and do not complete any definite cycle or plan, at least until we are compelled to. Meanwhile our unscientific and ill-advised approach retards industry and hinders reconversion.

Our 12 western Senators indeed represent a silver bloc, but only while other selfish and ill-informed interests are blocking the mining of silver. If we aid silver mining, make the business reasonably profitable, by raising the price of silver, operators may produce it and additional basic pay rolls will be established. In Montana we recognize two kinds of dollars—dollars representing paper money off the presses, hard silver dollars taken out of the ground. Our western Senators appreciate the effort it takes to produce a real dollar.

In 1896 a book entitled "The First Battle" was written by William Jennings Bryan. While we may not agree with him in all matters, some of his ideas are again coming to the foreground and it appears that, in some respects, the Democratic Presidential candidate was just 50 years ahead of his time. The writer has just returned this volume to its shelf and suggests the book as good reading for today.

Our 12 western Senators are merely suggesting a realistic, honest, and rational viewpoint in an endeavor to equalize all factors concerning our present and changing economic situation and in so doing are acidly referred to as the "silver bloc." Our greatest concern in relation to silver is not the silver bloc, but the efforts of certain selfish and ill-informed interests to block silver, an attempt, in consequence, to block the mining of silver, to block pay rolls all along the line, block manufacturing, block recovery and reconversion, and finally block the payment of our national obligations.

Furniture Workers To Clean Out Communists

REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD W. LANDIS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, the United Furniture Workers, Local 496, Indiana, are to be congratulated for taking the stand for Americanism against communism. They are making a splendid effort to clean out the communistic element that has been running their organization. Morris Muster, a New Yorker, who helped organize the CIO furniture workers' union in 1937 and has been its international president ever since, recently resigned because his record as a trade unionist will not permit him to remain head of a Communist-controlled organization. The union has 42,000 members, of which there is an estimate of only 1,000 Communists. But this handful of delegates, who never saw the inside of a furniture factory, recently dominated the Detroit convention.

These Communists are vicious. They are not in the unions to help workers. Their chief purposes are to attack the American Government and insist on prolonged strikes when disputes could be settled quickly by amicable negotiations.

A number of the union's locals have appealed to CIO President Philip Murray to help them get rid of Communist leadership. Local Union 496, of Indiana, supported those who attempted to free the furniture workers' union from Communist control. At a special meeting of 400 members they voted unanimously to support the move to demand the CIO to set up an organization of American furniture workers. They also voted unanimously to amend their constitution so that no Communist can hold membership in local 496. All American labor needs to be cleaned of Communists and local 496 intends to do their part to clean them out. Local 496 says they want the entire Nation to know that they are 100 percent opposed to communism in any form and will do all in their power to fight the Communists in the labor movement.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to include a resolution of the United Furniture Workers, by Joe Archer, president, UFWA-CIO Local No. 496, Bloomington, Ind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

(The resolution follows:)

Whereas the events that transpired at the fourth constitutional convention of the U. F. W. of A., on the week of June 3, 1946, in Detroit, Mich., proved conclusively that the control of our international has been wrested from the rank-and-file members of our international union; and

Whereas the tactics of the Communists and totalitarian factions in the union was glaringly displayed at the convention and they succeeded in blocking any constructive action toward the organization of the unorganized; that control now lies in the hands of these unprincipled people whose philopsophies are inimical to our American ideals, aims, and principles; and

Whereas the events of the past 25 years have conclusively demonstrated that whenever the fortunes of a labor union fall into the hands of a group whose primary loyalty and allegiance is to the Communist Party and a totalitarian form of government, the interests of the American workers are inevitably sacrificed; and

Whereas it will inevitably follow that the organization and strength of the United Furniture Workers of America will be dissipated in directions inimical to the welfare of the members of our union and will hinder the further organization of those workers in our industry not now protected by a contract and membership in a labor organization; and

Whereas the CIO, of which our union is a part, is at this moment embarking on the greatest organization campaign of its career, directed toward raising the standards of living of the workers of the South; and

Whereas we the workers of the furniture industry, have a compelling economic, as well as a social reason, for desiring to participate in this great work of organization and bring the benefits of real American trade unionism to those workers who have so far been denied it; and

Whereas the particular issue before the convention, as before every other convention of our international and the CIO, was the organization of the South, which business was completely neglected because of the drive for power at any cost put on by the Communist faction; and

Whereas this is but a foretaste of what is in store for our union should it remain under the yoke of these people who now control our international: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the authorized representatives of 48 locals of the United Furniture Workers of America, representing 23,400 members thereof, assembled in a meeting at the Sheraton Hotel in Washington, D. C., on the 29th day of June 1946, hereby authorize and empower the following committee: George Bucher, Bus Hiatt, Frank Douthitt, Tom Binall, Fred Bonine, George Odom, and Renard Rollins, to meet with Philip Murray, president of the CIO, to acquaint him with the seriousness of the situation in the furniture workers industry and the necessity, if the organization of furniture workers is to be extended, and the wages, hours, and working conditions of all furniture workers, organized and unorganized, improved; of the formation of a furniture workers organization independent of all totalitarian groups, including the Communist Party and its affiliates; be it further

Resolved, That the aforementioned committee make every effort to impress upon Philip Murray and such other officers of the CIO as are empowered to act, our genuine desire and indeed, demand, to remain in the CIO, but also our firm intention to continue the work of organization of the American Furniture Workers.

Inflation

REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. SAVAGE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, a number of us in Congress have had an opportunity to observe what inflation has done to some of the European countries. For instance, in France inflation is running rampant. In another European country I just read about it takes $2,900 today to buy what $1 would buy in 1940.

The Congress knows that the people of the United States want to control inflation. I wonder why it does not do so and not quibble for weeks and months about it. It would take less than an hour to pass an extension of the OPA act if we would quit trying to write favors in the act for every corporate interest in the United States. We could extend OPA by the changing of less than a dozen words in the old act and yet Congress fiddles while inflation takes root. More profits have been made under OPA than have ever been made in our history before OPA, so it is not going to hurt too much for a little bit longer. Of course, everyone wants to end OPA as soon as it can be done safely.

I include here Leo Wolman's column which shows a comparison between the rapid rise of inflation in World War I and the slower rise now under OPA:

ARE TWENTIES REPEATING?

(By Leo Wolman)

Distant comparisons of prices are, under any circumstances, hard to make. Commodities and services change with the times. The buying habits of consumers likewise change. On purely technical grounds, precise comparisons between the cost of living in the two World Wars are impaired by the use of subsidies in the second war and the impracticability of making allowances for them in the available measures of prices; by the greater importance in World War II of black markets, and by the general quality changes which are deemed to be characteristic of our markets in recent years.

Now that we stand at the parting of the ways in our national price policy, the consequences of what we do are so grave that some estimate, however inadequate, of the course of events in two analogous historical periods is justified. The bare outlines of the behavior of the official measures of the cost of living after 1914 and 1939 are as follows:

June 1914	100.0
May 1919	169.7
June 1920	210.4
August 1939	100.0
May 1946	136.4

In broad terms the increase in living costs by May 1919 was almost twice as great as the increase reached in May 1946. The discrepancy is probably exaggerated because of the factors already mentioned, but it is nevertheless large.

TREND IS DEFINITELY UPWARD

In any case, whether the OPA is retained or not we may anticipate the cost of living to continue to advance because of cost increases which have not yet been absorbed into prices; because of efforts to liquidate or reduce the black market; because of efforts to increase the production of lagging commodities, and because of cost raises still being made.

As the Bureau of Labor Statistics observes in its June report "effects of the recently announced higher ceiling prices for a number of dairy, bakery, and cereal products will not be reflected in the index (of the cost of living) until June and July." The same might be said of other goods.

Prices then will continue to go up. No one knows how much. After the last war they reached their peak in June, 1920, when they were twice their height of June, 1914.

It is clear from what we know of current conditions that price-raising forces are powerful and general. No discernible increase in production is likely to dissipate these forces for some time to come.

RESULTS COUNT, NOT BLAME

The public interest consists in an orderly decontrol in prices. The public is not, or ought not to be, unduly interested in the quarrel over responsibility for the present crisis. The administration must assume a large share of the blame for explosive elements in the present situation, which grew out of its wage policy of last winter. The OPA has sedulously avoided discussing its failures and errors and has kept pointing with pride at those parts of its program which seemed to be working.

We need a way out of the present dilemma. It can be found only by reasonable agreement between the President and Congress. After the last war the cost of living fell steadily from June, 1920, to August 1922, with a total decline of 20 percent. Some liquidation or correction lies ahead of us this time as well. We ought to do what we can to keep it within bounds.

I also include here a very fine editorial from the Arkansas Democrat of July 2, 1946, which shows why Congress should extend an effective price control now.

It looks as though Congress is trying to fool the public and serve profiteers.

LET'S PROVE WE'RE CAPABLE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

Congress should immediately restore a workable measure of price control. Meanwhile, everybody should heed the urging of President Truman, and of prominent businessmen, to hold steady and do everything possible to prevent a zoom of prices.

Until Congress acts, and more grimly if it does nothing, the Nation faces a test of its democracy, of its ability to run its affairs wisely, and not sacrifice future welfare to immediate gains. To give way to greed would be like speeding a car around a perilous turn and an unknown road. We might, by luck, come through with no great harm. But the chances of a smash-up are too strong for a people with any sense to take.

We are not without warning of our danger. After World War I, caution was thrown to the winds, and prices shot up in a buying-speculative spree. And you may recall what happened. George and Mary Consumer were squeezed out of the game. There finally was a "buyers' strike" and a cash of the inflated markets.

Many merchants, caught with high-priced inventories, a lot of industrialists who had stored high-cost materials, were ruined. Thousands on thousands of farmers were sold out. A far greater number were left with a millstone of debt around their necks.

Recovery from the slump of prices came soon. But it didn't help those who had lost their businesses or farms. And the shock to the economic structure was not repaired by the boom of the 1920's. It was only covered up and tided over—to fester along as a major cause of the greater crash in 1929 and 1930.

A price zoom would be more damaging now. There is more money and credit to drive prices up for a crash. The shortages of all kinds of goods are greater than they were after World War I. A much larger percentage of our people live in cities, where they must buy everything they use—and where they will be in deeper distress if a bust comes than was the more rural America of a quarter of a century ago.

Let us think carefully of what we do. A buying-hoarding orgy, speculation, arbitrary shoving up of prices, strikes to keep wages ahead of soaring living costs, could easily enough wreck our prospects for several years of prosperity. It could leave economic wounds from which our free enterprise system might not recover, even with subsequent good times, steering us into Government relief and bringing dictatorial controls we could not throw off.

Now is the time for every American to show that we are what we claim to be—the world's smartest people, needing no socialism to tell us what to do and make us decent to each other. Our imperative need is to buy prudently, work, and produce. Whether we get price control back or not, production is the one thing that can save us from another boom-and-bust.

The British Loan

REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, the terms of the proposed loan to Great Britain leave no room for doubt as to the real underlying reason why distinguished and patriotic Americans and Englishmen have favored it—with open show of reluctance. The brilliant Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the clear-thinking Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] have both made powerful statements to the effect that they favor this proposed loan because it is the only means by which the Socialist government of Britain might be prevented from drifting farther to the left and forming a solid communistic bloc, extending over the continents of Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australia.

The British negotiators for this loan must have believed something near to the Vandenberg-Wiley line of reasoning for they maintained throughout their preliminary negotiations the stand that the loan should actually be a gift, that Britain would probably never be able to pay the interest on the loan, let alone the principal. The American negotiators were also apparently of this point of view for their compromise suggestion, which was adopted, was based on the most favorable terms possible to the borrowing nation. They knew, as we know, that Britain still owes us approximately six-and-one-half billion dollars from the First World War. They knew, as we know, that our national debt is rapidly nearing its legal limit. They knew, as we know, that, with even a temporary truce in the labor-management war, American production would be met by American purchasing power to such an extent that a domestic common denominator of prosperity could be reached that would make it necessary to place only a minimum reliance on foreign markets.

Yet, knowing this, American negotiators agreed, if they did not actually advance the idea, that nearly $4,000,000,000 should be loaned to Britain at 2 percent. They likewise agreed that neither principal nor interest payments would begin until 1951 and that Britain would have 50 years to pay in full, forgetful of interest in lean years. Our representatives did not even ask that any of the money loaned should be spent in this country, or that any British Empire preferential tariffs be lowered so as to give American businessmen equal opportunity in Empire markets. Furthermore, it was decided by the conferees that no security would be put up by Great Britain.

It would cost every man, woman, and child in these United States $28 to build this monetary dam against communism. If, and I emphasize that if, this loan accomplished its purpose, I should concur with its advocates that it would be worth $28 to every American. But, this is where I differ from the proponents of the loan. The strawman argument that the proposed loan would aid the American businessman through the opening of imaginary Empire markets does not amuse, anger, or even interest me. What does effect me is that there is no assurance, no semblance of a guaranty, that the proposed loan will keep Britain from exchanging the red of the Union Jack for the red of the Hammer and Sickle. On the contrary, there is evidence to support the stand that we would be merely paying the moving expenses of Professor Laski's government to a point far to the left. We would, in effect, be footing the bills for the complete nationalization of British industry so that it may send its cheap socialist-produced goods to this country to compete favorably with American goods, produced under our system of free enterprise, on the domestic market.

In this connection, I cannot forget the recent report of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PLOESER] on the Export-Import Bank. This report brought out that in recent months the Bank had made loans to France, Poland, Holland, and Norway—bypassing specific congressional approval. It is worthy of notice that each of these loans involved many millions of the American taxpayers' dollars.

Thus, the administration is in the business of loaning money to foreign governments, with and without the sanction of Congress. Some of these loans have served the purpose of temporarily allowing the governments of the borrowing countries to be set up as the people of those countries want them, arresting for the time being totalitarian outside influences. But they leave the way open for the Soviet Union to come to us with demands for a loan, to be used—as with lend-lease and UNRRA—to speed the spread of communism.

The House has already decided the rules under which the Export-Import Bank is to operate. What President William M. Martin does, keeping within these rules, is not subject to day-by-day House control unless additional legislation should be forthcoming. Nevertheless, when loans are brought before this House for consideration, we do have the opportunity to speak and act upon them.

It is inconceivable that we shall take a most-favored-nation attitude; give Britain her loan and refuse Russia her loan. We must either deny to both nations or give to both nations. There is no logic in giving $28 from every American to Britain to halt communism and then giving $28 from every American to Russia to promote communism. I do not go along with the idea of buying both the poison and the antidote for the American people. I do not go along with saddling an enormous debt on the American people and then deliberately canceling out any possible benefits which might be derived from this sacrifice.

Build up America from within. Bulwark our Constitution. Follow Shakespeare's wise counsel and "neither a borrower nor a lender be." Other nations can and will get along with us if they know where we stand. They will find it to their advantage to meet us with the open hand of friendship, rather than with the extended hand of "stand and deliver."

To paraphrase one of the greatest men of a State whose chief product has been great men—Patrick Henry, Virginian—"If this is isolationism; make the most of it. As for me, give me a free America—which hires no mercenaries and pays no tribute—or give me death."

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit a copy of an editorial which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of date July 3, 1946, as follows:

THE BRITISH LOAN

The House of Representatives sometime this week is expected to begin debate on the proposed United States loan to Great Britain of almost $4,000,000,000—which is 4,000 times $1,000,000. This deal has already been approved by the Senate, but that was before British Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin made various anti-American and anti-Semitic cracks in a Labor Party convention speech.

How the project will fare in the House, we don't know. We should all know, though, just what the House will be discussing.

The plan is to advance Britain the sum of $3,375,000,000. Britain would pay interest at 2 percent, and would have 50 years to clean up the debt. The 50 years would not begin, however, till 1951, as to either principal or interest. In lean years, Britain could forget the interest—wouldn't have to make it up the following year.

There is a pious hope that Britain would spend much of this money for United States goods, but there is no guaranty of it. Nor is there any promise that Britain, if "loaned" this money, will drop any of its empire preference tariffs so as to give United States business a fairer break in British Empire markets.

The money will not come by magic out of nowhere. It will come by painful extraction from American taxpayers' bank accounts, wallets, pay checks, pay envelopes, socks, and piggy banks. We are all taxpayers nowadays, directly or indirectly.

Great Britain as a capitalist nation failed to finish paying its World War I debt to us. Still owing us on that account is about $6,500,000,000. Britain is now a socialist nation. Rightly or wrongly, a debt is not as sacred an obligation in the eyes of Socialists as it is in the eyes of capitalists.

And that's the proposition, folks: Take it away.

One group which we think should take it away is the great mass of our veterans of World War II. They could best perform this feat by joining the American Legion in large numbers and instructing the Legion's expert lobbyists and politicians to campaign for billions in bonuses for our boys, too, if we feel we must put out billions in "loans" to foreign countries.

Discounts Replace OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I am including herewith a letter saying that merchants are now giving a discount in lieu of their cost of OPA.

The letter is included herewith:

NORTH BALTIMORE, OHIO, July 5, 1946.
Hon. ALVIN F. WEICHEL,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WEICHEL: I had a little thing happen to me the other day since OPA went out of office that I think you should know about.

I happen to go into a store over in Lima, Ohio. I bought a small amount of paint amounting to $64, which I gave him a check for. I picked up my merchandise and started out, but he called me back to wait a minute. He told me I had a refund coming of $6.40. I asked him why that was. He said since the OPA is out they are giving 10-percent discount on all their merchandise. I asked him what the reason. He said that it costs more than that to pay his share of the OPA. He also told me that at least half the merchants in Lima would be doing the same thing. Do we want more OPA? No.

Respectfully yours,

A. J. ROTH & SONS,
A. J. ROTH.

Congress and the PAC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. GRANT
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my remarks with the thought-provoking column from the Washington Times-Herald of July 8, which reads as follows:

THESE DAYS
(By George E. Sokolsky)

One of the byproducts of the President's veto of OPA has been a prolonged and vicious attack upon the institution of Congress. The objection seems to be that Congress deliberates too long, talks too much, investigates too slowly.

The real objection is that Congress disobeys the orders of the PAC. Upon the radio particularly this violence to our institutions and the truth has been insidiously vicious.

It is to be noted that the complaints are no longer aimed at HOFFMAN, BILBO, RANKIN and other individuals but at the institution itself, at the deliberative committees of Congress that protect the American people in their constitutional rights by slowing the process of hasty, ill-considered, whimsical, and capricious legislation.

It is to be remembered that even after 12 years of concerted, well-planned, and governmentally financed efforts, the radicals in the New Deal, no matter how highly placed, have not been able to change our form of government.

The faulty administration of the OPA was never as serious as the faulty legislation that brought OPA into existence.

The hearings of the committees concerning this bill show that competent men, like Herbert Hoover and Bernard Baruch, testified in advance to all the faults of the bill which proved themselves in operation.

That legislation was forced through to satisfy radical elements inside and outside the Government who demanded their kind of a bill or nothing.

Similarly, the Wagner bill was forced through Congress by an overpowering President. The Wagner bill was poor legislation because it was, and its act for that matter is, lopsided legislation, creating an interminable war between management and labor that is one cause for our lessening efficiency as a Nation and our insufficient production today.

The totalitarians do not believe in the deliberative process. I was present in 1917–18 in Russia when the last democratic hope of the Russian people, the Constituent Assembly, was killed by the Bolsheviks.

They were a tiny handful in that assembly, so few that it did not pay them to remain in it. There was an interlude from which the Bolsheviks did not return.

At the session which they did attend, Lenin sat upon the dais, one of the presidium, but throughout the session, by gesture and grimace, he showed his contempt for a deliberative body.

He, Lenin, was a prospective dictator—why should be worry about a democratic constitution for Russia, which the Assembly had been convened to bring into being?

I recall the consternation and shame of those who realized that hope for a republican government, for constitutional, democratic processes, for representative government, was rapidly seeping away into the tides of history.

The session reassembled at night; sad, bitter speeches were spoken; then a Communist sailor, walked alone, a single exemplar of Bolshevik power, to the dais and ordered the Constituent Assembly, chosen by the Russian people, disbanded.

"Enough," he spoke quietly. "You have spoken enough. Go home comrades."

And they knew that the Tauride Palace, where the representatives of the Russian people were meeting, was surrounded by Red guards who would have massacred them to a man.

The echoes of ample machine-gun fire were heard in the room to make the threat clear. So they went home, and Russia became a dictatorship.

When the Nazis burned the Reichstag, they were imitating their Russian predecessors. The Reichstag was, in principle, similar to our Congress. To a totalitarian group seeking to establish a dictatorship, it is always necessary to destroy, without pity, every vestige of representative, democratic institutions.

They hit upon single acts, single individuals, and by false logic, generalizing from the particular, they stir the minds and stimulate the fears of the people, using any instruments at hand.

They burn, they kill, they frighten until what was always good becomes, in the eyes of a slogan-drunk mass, bad. By that means they seize and hold power.

For instance, you roar with laughter when you hear Senator Claghorn on the radio; I weep with chagrin that so many find that so amusing at a time like this. Congress is, as the old Fourth of July orator used to say, the palladium of our liberties. Those who would destroy Congress, hate America.

Operations at the Sioux City, Iowa, Livestock Market Without OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following telegram from one of my leading constituents who has had 40 years of successful experience in the livestock business as a farmer, livestock feeder, livestock order buyer and commission merchant. His report as to conditions at the Sioux City stock yards without OPA gives us a very graphic picture as to how the black market is now going out of business:

SIOUX CITY, IOWA., July 5, 1946.
Hon. CHARLES HOEVEN,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.:

Official receipts hogs Sioux City, Friday, July 5, total 14,508 head. Armour & Co. buyers purchased approximately 9,000 head against purchases of 3,000 head all last week and 4,000 head previous week. Today's Armour purchase of 9,000 head exceeds their entire purchase for the last half month of June by 2,000 head. These hogs today were purchased at prices only in fact exactly one-half cent per pound higher than OPA ceilings existing during month of June. It will take from 1 to 3 weeks before this pork can be processed and delivered to retail butcher shops for sale to consumers throughout the country so a little time will be needed to get retail distribution back to normal. More hogs are now moving through regular channels and this condition will continue if price ceilings are not again reinstated. Cattle receipts Sioux City today total 6,785 head. Practically all slaughter cattle. This is largest Friday receipts of killing cattle received here in more than 20 years. This shows black-market operators have either curtailed or quit direct buying from farmers and livestock feeders on farm and at country points. Prices paid for slaughter cattle today are on an average slightly more than 2 cents per pound higher than those prevailing under OPA regulations last month. Choice to prime long fed steers and yearlings up more, common to medium grades show less than 2 cents per pound upturn. Slaughter lambs sold at $17 per hundred last month Sioux City plus $2.65 Government subsidy to feeder. Extreme top price paid here this week was $16.50 per hundred with no Government subsidy. General conditions other public competitive livestock markets about same as Sioux City. Black-market operations in grain, especially corn were enormous last few months, thousands of bushels corn being moved daily at prices much higher than OPA ceilings. More corn has been sold by farmers and delivered to country grain elevators this week than all last month and if present conditions continue 99 percent of all grain will again move through regular channels. It may take a month or two for conditions in livestock industry to get back to normal but if left as of today the law of supply and demand will eventually correct black-market operations and livestock will again move through regular and normal channels. Furthermore, farmers, livestock feeders, producers and ranchers will get a portion of the profits now being made by black-market operators and will again be able to produce meat which can be sold at a fair price to the consumer and at prices considerably less than those now existing in black markets. My 40 years of successful experience in the livestock business as a farmer, livestock feeder, livestock order buyer, and commission merchant, I believe, qualifies me as competent to make these statements. You can rest assured figures are official and cannot be contradicted. I thought you might like to have this information.

JOHN J. DONOHUE.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include herewith a clipping from the East St. Louis Journal, which contains, I think, a clear picture of what is happening in communities with the lifting of price and rent controls. I am thoroughly convinced that for the welfare of the Nation, as a whole, prices must be kept in line:

RATES GOING UP THROUGHOUT EAST ST. LOUIS

Scores of East St. Louis residents who retired Sunday night thinking that maybe after all, removal of rent and price ceilings was a good thing for the country, were jolted Monday when they received another letter along with the usual grist of first-of-the-month bills. The extra letter invariably contained a notice that their rent was being raised, effective in 30 days.

A survey of justices of the peace conducted by the Journal revealed that 44 eviction notices have been issued by five justices and served by local constables since Monday. The total does not include scores of others which were due to be served today.

POORER TENANTS HIT

A large percentage of the eviction notices was against tenants in poorer class homes—those least able to stand an added $10 to $15 monthly rental expense. "Homes" is hardly the word for many such places. They are hovels.

Of the total eviction notices, 34 were obtained by one prominent real estate firm.

One irate housewife, who came to the Journal office in person, showed a notice from her landlord boosting her rent from $40 a month to $75—an increase of $35 or about 87.5 percent. Some even reported having their rent doubled.

Another housewife wrote ironically calling attention to a statement made several days ago by D. Leroy Morgan, of the East St. Louis Real Estate Exchange, in which she quoted Morgan as saying there would be no general rent increases here—at least not until the fate of OPA is definitely decided. She also claimed Morgan said that even after OPA was declared legally dead that increases would probably not exceed 15 to 20 percent.

WROTE PRESIDENT

This woman said she is mad and has written to President Truman of conditions for tenants in East St. Louis in the few days since rent controls were removed. She has paid $14 a month rent for a place for 6 years. The roof leaked, plaster is off the walls, and a high wind caved in the porch, she said. It has not been papered in 8 years and is rat-infested. The housewife once was bitten by a rat.

"I expected a rent hike of 15 to 20 percent," she wrote, "but on July 1 was notified our rent would be raised 43 percent to $20 a month."

The woman whose rent was boosted from $40 to $75 lives in the 400 block in North Eighteenth Street. It is a duplex house, the landlord living in the other half. The couple has resided in the four-room unfurnished half of the house for 6 years. They have no children and have no knowledge of why they no longer should be regarded as desirable tenants.

RECEIVE NOTICE

Came the dawn Monday, the couple received the following billet-doux from their landlord:

"You are hereby notified that I have elected to terminate your tenancy by virtue of which you now occupy as my tenant, the premises known and described as follows * * *

"And you are further notified to quit and deliver up the possession of said premises to me at the end of the present term, provided 30 days intervene, otherwise at the end of the 30-day term, which commences next after the service of this notice, and if you remain after said date your rent will be $75 per month."

The housewife went on to say that the cost of occupying the four rooms in winter when the tenant also has to furnish heat, would approximate $100 with the new rental fee.

PAID RENT REGULARLY

"We were suckers," she said. "My husband has always mowed the lawn all around the duplex and otherwise worked to keep up the appearance of the property. We have paid our rent regularly all those 6 years and were never notified that our rent would be raised."

Another tenant in State Street, in a business area, has been paying $20 a month for five unfurnished and unheated rooms. On Tuesday a constable served an eviction notice, effective unless the tenant hereafter pays $35 a month rent—an increase of 75 percent. The tenant describes the place as a "dump" but said he and his family were content to have a roof over their heads until now.

1944 Audit Report of the United States Maritime Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission granted me to revise and extend my remarks, there is set forth below a copy of a report made by the Comptroller General of the United States on his audit report of the United States Maritime Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, and certain correspondence between Admiral Smith, the new Chairman of the Commission, and the Comptroller General indicating the efforts being made to correct alleged inadequacies in the accounting system of the Maritime Commission. As soon as it is received, I also intend to place in the RECORD the Comptroller General's report on the accounting practices of the War Shipping Administration for the fiscal year 1944.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries is making an investigation of the accounting practices of the Commission and the War Shipping Administration to determine whether any losses were suffered by the Government because of failures to use thoroughly sound accounting procedures, and, if so, who was to blame, what corrections may be made to prevent future recurrences, and what monetary recoveries may be made. A full report on our findings will be submitted to the Congress during the coming months.

The matter referred to follows:

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, June 25, 1946.

To: United States Maritime Commission.
From: The Chairman.
Subject: Reconstruction of accounting system (Maritime Commission—War Shipping Administration).

It has been brought to my attention that the accounting system of the Maritime Commission is inadequate to meet the requirements of the Office of the Comptroller General of the United States. I am convinced that the Commission should take immediate steps to reconstruct or revise our system of accounting along lines of best practice in order that the Commission as a whole, as well as the individuals members of this body, will be above criticism in all accounting matters.

To achieve this end, I recommend that a committee be authorized to construct a system of accounting for the United States Maritime Commission which will be acceptable to all concerned and adequate for all accounting purposes. This committee should be made up of the accounting head of the Maritime Commission, of the War Shipping Administration, a representative of the Office of the Comptroller General, a representative of the Treasury Department, and two independent certified public accountants, members of the American Institute of Accountants.

I request that you authorize the transmittal of the attached letters to the Comptroller General of the United States and to the Treasury Department and that you authorize me to proceed to employ two independent accountants so that work on the new accounting system may proceed immediately.

W. W. SMITH, Chairman.

Approved by Commission June 26, 1946.

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., June 25, 1946.

The Honorable the COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On November 9, 1937, your office addressed a communication to the United States Maritime Commission advocating certain accounting procedures which you advocated being "installed without delay".

It is our understanding that action was not taken to comply with your request of November 9, 1937, because the commercial-type transactions the United States Maritime Commission must handle do not readily subject themselves to Government-type accounting.

On June 20, 1946, your office again called attention to a situation which indicates the advisability of reshaping the accounting system of the United States Maritime Commission.

The Commission feels that a system acceptable to the Comptroller General of the United States should be adopted and necessary steps should be taken immediately to effect its early installation; furthermore, that such accounts be set up which will enable the Commission's accountants to handle satisfactorily all commercial transactions in a manner conforming with good accounting practice. To this end, the Commission has authorized the appointment of an Accounting Committee composed of one member from the United States Maritime Commission, one from the War Shipping Administration, one from the Office of the Comptroller General of the United States, one from the Treasury Department, and two independent certified public accountants.

In order to get this matter under way at the earliest possible moment, we request that you appoint a representative from your office who is qualified to work as a member of the Accounting Committee in the construction of a mutually acceptable system of accounts for this Commission.

Very sincerely,

W. W. SMITH,
Chairman.

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., June 26, 1946.

The Honorable SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The United States Maritime Commission has authorized the appointment of an accounting committee to construct for it a system of accounting acceptable to all concerned and adequate for all accounting purposes. It has been recommended that this committee be made up of the following members: A representative from the office of the Comptroller General of the United States; a representative from the Treasury Department; a representative from the War Shipping Administration; a representative from the United States Maritime Commission; two independent certified public accountants, members of the American Institute of Accountants.

In order to get this matter under way at the earliest possible moment, we request that a representative be appointed from your office who is qualified to work as a member of the accounting committee in the construction of a mutually acceptable system of accounts for this Commission.

Very sincerely,

W. W. SMITH,
Chairman.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, June 12, 1946.

The CHAIRMAN, UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION.

MY DEAR ADMIRAL SMITH: I have your letter of June 6, 1946, regarding our conversation of June 4, and you may be assured that the General Accounting Office will cooperate to the fullest extent to assist in the improvement of the financial, accounting, and control practices of the Maritime Commission. Your understanding is correct that the audit of the accounts of the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, will be completed shortly and that the audit for the fiscal year 1945 will proceed expeditiously.

I deeply appreciate the spirit of cooperation which you have shown.

Respectfully,

LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States.

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1946.

The Honorable LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COMPTROLLER GENERAL: Allow me to express my appreciation of the helpful attitude toward the problems of the Maritime Commission that you displayed during our conversation on June 4 and to assure you that I personally, and the Commission as a whole, wish to cooperate wholeheartedly with your office.

As I understand it, your audits of the accounts of the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, will soon be finished and that your office will then proceed as expeditiously as possible with the audits for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1945. If in connection with these audits, it appears to you that claims should be made on behalf of the Government against anyone, I shall appreciate your advice to that effect.

I shall also greatly appreciate any advice you may be willing to give me as to how, in your opinion, the financial, accounting, and control practices of the Maritime Commission can and should be improved.

Faithfully yours,

W. W. SMITH,
Chairman.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, July 1, 1946.

CHAIRMAN, UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR ADMIRAL SMITH: There is presented herewith report on the audit of United States Maritime Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, made pursuant to and in accordance with the requirements of section 207 of the act of June 29, 1936, 49 Stat. 1988, as amended. Copies of this report have been transmitted to the Congress.

Respectfully,

LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States.

AUDIT REPORT, UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDED JUNE 30, 1944

GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
Washington, June 25, 1946.

The COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES:

Pursuant to section 207 of the act of June 29, 1936, 49 Stat. 1988, as amended, an audit has been made of the financial transactions of the United States Maritime Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944.

During the fiscal year 1943 Admiral Land, Chairman of the Maritime Commission, requested that the Comptroller General proceed with the audit of the transactions of the United States Maritime Commission as expeditiously as possible as he believed such action most desirable.

Difficulties were encountered in tracing the complicated year-end adjustments and accruals as well as locating the many inaccuracies in both the books and financial statements.

The results of the audit are herein submitted including the following financial statements:

Exhibit I. Balance sheet.

Exhibit II. Statement of income and expenses.

EXHIBIT III. Statement of capital and deficit.

Exhibit IV. Statement of impairment of capital.

The audit was made of the books and records of the United States Maritime Commission in Washington, D. C., and at 23 shipyards and 9 warehouses. Its scope included such review and test checking of the Commission's accounting methods, records, and system of internal control as approved commercial auditing standards require.

This audit was in addition to the regular audit of receipts and expenditures which was made pursuant to the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, for the purpose of settling the accounts of the Commission's disbursing officer.

The errors and conditions set forth in this report that have been corrected are so indicated; other proposed corrections not yet effective will be reported in the audit report for 1945.

FINDINGS

1. The audit disclosed that the accounting methods and procedures employed were not of the kind or type to result in accurate recording of the financial transactions to the extent necessary to properly and completely disclose the results of its operations or financial condition.

2. When issued the financial statements were qualified by the inclusion of the following statement:

"As a result of the insufficiency of experienced accounting personnel, the accounts of the Maritime Commission were in need of considerable analysis and adjustment for financial statement purposes. It was not possible to augment the staff sufficiently to permit of comprehensive analysis and adjustment of the accounts within the extended time limit for the submission of the statements and it, therefore, was necessary that this be done on a selective basis. In the continuing analysis of the accounts, subsequent to their closing for financial statement purposes, a number of necessary adjustments affecting the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, have developed. Since it would be impracticable to delay the submission of the financial statements for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, pending the completion of the analysis and adjustment of the accounts and since it is not believed that, in relation to the totals involved, such adjustments will be of sufficient magnitude to change substantially the financial position reflected by the statements, such adjustments are being made in the current accounts and will be reflected in the report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1945."

The character of the adjustments is clearly indicated by this report:

3. It can be definitely stated that at no time during the fiscal year 1944 could the management of the Commission have been furnished current financial information from the accounting records.

4. The audit further disclosed that the internal audit is incomplete.

5. The audit disclosed that the financial interests of the Government were not adequately protected due to the failure to recover currently moneys due the United States.

6. The Commission has been delinquent in collecting moneys due the Government. Based on testings and samplings in the course of the audit, it is estimated that the Commission should collect an amount in excess of $23,000,000, summarized as follows:

1. Unbilled and unprocessed property removal notices	$12,128,383
2. Unrecorded claims against vendors	7,710,382
3. Material repair claims against vendors	1,823,972
4. Domestic freight claims against transportation companies	1,000,000
5. Unliquidated deposits made on returnable reels	893,666
6. Credit memoranda received from vendors and not billed	355,285
Total	23,916,688

As a result of the audit the Commission has taken steps to effect prompt recovery of the above items.

7. Also, as a result of the audit, a transfer was made from special deposit account in the hands of the disbursing officer into the general fund of the United States Treasury in the amount of $7,365,000.

COMMENTS

The following comments have been divided into four general classes:

A. Those involving incompleteness or inadequacies of the accounting procedures and practices.

B. Major errors of omission or commission.

1. Errors affecting operations or financial position facts.

2. Errors affecting classification or presentation of financial information.

C. Failure to collect promptly moneys due the United States Maritime Commission from commercial interests.

D. Failure to bill promptly for moneys due the United States Maritime Commission from the other Government agencies.

A. Incomplete or inadequate accounting procedures and practices

1. The Commission's book balances of more than $10,800,000,000 required corrections and changes of more than $5,500,000,000 before a presentation of actual facts could be made in the issued financial statements.

2. There was incomplete control over adjustments for closing the gap between recorded fact and actual fact because of complicated procedures.

3. It is believed that past deficiencies in the Commission's accounting and auditing accomplishments have been due in some measure to lack of clearly defined goals of auditing, accounting, and reporting objectives.

4. The actual accounting and auditing work was not sufficiently coordinated with the operating divisions of the United States Maritime Commission.

5. The property accountability of the Commission was unsatisfactory.

6. The receiving reports and property removal and transfer notices did not receive sufficient attention.

7. The set-off collection procedure, providing that amounts due from creditors be collected by deduction from vouchers payable, was not followed. * This condition has now been corrected.

8. Advances to contractors were erroneously charged direct to expense or construction and were not shown as accounts receivable.

9. Employees handling cash and revenues were not bonded.

10. The receipt of partial shipments was not recorded as accounts payable, nor were property-removal notices prepared until final shipment was made.

11. The actual construction or acquisition costs were not used.

12. Machinery and equipment actually installed in a vessel were not charged to the cost of the vessel.

13. Applicable portions of United States Maritime Commission overhead were not applied as cost of ship and facility construction.

14. Depreciation on facilities was not applied as cost of ship construction.

15. Costs paid direct to contractors were not segregated from those covering materials furnished by the United States Maritime Commission.

B-1. Major errors of omission or commission affecting operational or financial position facts

1. Assets and liabilities overstated by the erroneous inclusion of an amount involving Navy working funds, $130,490,451.53.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

2. Assets understated by unrecorded amounts due from War Shipping Administration defense-aid program for vessels transferred to a foreign government, $21,249,223.71.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

3. Liabilities overstated due to erroneous recording of accounts payable, $9,990,000.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

4. Assets understated by unrecorded amounts due from War Shipping Administration for ship repairs and charter hire, $5,164,584.56.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

5. Assets and liabilities overstated by erroneously recording commitments, $4,220,892.49.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

6. Assets overstated by erroneous charge against War Shipping Administration included in accounts receivable, $2,610,164.80.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

7. Assets understated by erroneous reduction of Navy Department accounts receivable, $2,324,285.

8. Cash in transit shown as deferred charges, $1,563,635.88.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

9. Assets overstated by erroneous accounts receivable in connection with renegotiation of United States Maritime Commission contracts, $788,020.24.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

B–2. Major errors of omission or commission affecting classification or presentation of financial information

1. Facility costs erroneously classified as deferred charges, $94,601,120.44.

2. Additional amounts erroneously classified as deferred charges, $114,317,270.36.

This item has now been corrected on the books.

3. The Commission neglected to control its material, supplies, and equipment by failure to process approximately 60,000 property removal notices relating to transfers of such property. Warehouse inventories, ship costs, and facility costs were substantially affected. This is now in process but is still incomplete.

C. Failure to collect promptly moneys due the United States Maritime Commission from commercial interests

The Maritime Commission was delinquent in failing to promptly collect approximately $23,000,000 due from various commercial interests. This is now in process but is still incomplete.

D. Failure to bill promptly for moneys due the United States Maritime Commission from the other Government agencies

The Maritime Commission failed to bill for expenses paid for the War Shipping Administration.

RECOMMENDATIONS

There are submitted the following specific recommendations which have been divided into two general classes:

A. Procedures for protection against overpayment of Government moneys and for recovery of moneys due the United States.

B. Improvement in accounting control, determination of accountability, and presentment of financial facts.

A. Procedures for protection against overpayment of Government moneys and for recovery of moneys due the United States

1. That advances be recorded as accounts receivable.

2. That those employees handling cash and revenues be bonded.

3. The practice of disregarding partial shipments until the final shipment is made be discontinued. Partial shipments should be recorded currently.

4. That all property removals and transfers be reflected in the accounts currently.

5. That receiving reports be fully utilized.

6. That the internal audit functions be increased to guard against erroneous payments.

7. That amounts due the Maritime Commission from various contractors for scrap sales, insurance premium refunds, and unpaid wages be currently collected.

B. Improvement in accounting control, determination of accountability, and presentment of financial facts

1. That the accrual method of accounting be fully utilized.

2. That the Commission devise and adopt an accounting policy determining and setting forth the financial information that is required.

3. That whenever possible actual cost of construction or acquisition of each vessel be used in accounting statements and records instead of estimated costs.

4. That proper application of cost of machinery and equipment be made to the vessels in which the machinery and equipment were actually installed.

5. That applicable portions of the Commission's overhead be distributed to the cost of each vessel.

6. That depreciation be computed on facilities, thereby providing for the proper inclusion of the amount of the periodic depreciation in the costs of ships.

7. That the costs paid direct to contractors for ship and facilities construction be segregated from those covering materials furnished by the United States Maritime Commission.

8. That a permanent file of all Commission-owned machinery, equipment, shipways, and other property be established and maintained under control of the accounting system.

9. That the balances in the working fund reserve accounts, reflected as amounts on deposit to the credit of the Navy and War Departments be fully reconciled with corresponding balances of available working funds on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States.

RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION

During the course of the 1944 audit certain recommendations made to the Commission's officials were adopted and are reported here for information purposes:

(a) During the fiscal year 1944 approximately $7,000,000 was collected from various sources and deposited in the disbursing officer's special deposit account. As late as May 1946 these funds had not been deposited into the Treasury. As a result of our recommendations, these funds have now been deposited in the general fund of the Treasury.

(b) During the audit no visible evidence was found to indicate that the Commission followed the policy of making offsets on vendor's vouchers for amounts due the Commission. As a result of our recommendation, the Finance Division has advised that this policy has now been officially reestablished. Real efforts are now being made to collect disputed and delinquent accounts by offset.

(c) During the audit it was discovered that there was a large backlog of unprocessed Government bills of lading for amounts due transportation companies not recorded on the books or in the statements. This condition involved both 1944 and 1945. The unrecorded liability as at June 30, 1945, was determined to be $43,664,340.80 and in April 1946 the amount was recorded on the books.

(d) During the audit a large number of undeposited checks were found. The finance division was advised that all cash should be deposited daily and that the backlog should be cleared before representatives of the General Accounting Office counted the cash. About 6 months later the cash count revealed that 1,600 checks, totaling $18,296,905.11 were on hand, undeposited. As a result of recommendations, practically all of these checks have since been deposited.

(e) It was found that the Commission followed the practice of making audits of vendors' accounts before processing credit memoranda and billing the vendor, with the result that a large backlog was accumulating. It was recommended that statements be rendered all vendors for credit memoranda on hand, and as a result statements were immediately mailed to effect recovery.

Subject to the comments and qualifications contained in this report the attached statements present fairly the financial position as at June 30, 1944, and the operating results for the fiscal year ended that date.

E. W. BELL,
Chief, Audit Division.

Rural Mail Delivery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the rural free delivery branch of the United States postal service this year observes its golden jubilee.

No service of the Government comes closer to the lives of millions of our citizens than rural-mail delivery. We have been so accustomed to it in the recent years that we give little thought to the fact that, although a half century old, it is a comparatively new service. Many are the early settlers in areas throughout our Nation who can recall the days when they were without this important service.

The rural mail carrier is possibly the most popular of all Government employees. He knows everyone on his route by their first name. It is a pleasant job and one in which the carrier feels with great satisfaction the important work he is performing.

Former Congressman Edwin M. Schaefer, of the Twenty-second Illinois District, was always greatly interested in extending the benefits of rural-mail delivery to more and more families in his district. As his secretary, it was my pleasure to assist Congressman Schaefer in this work. As a result there have been several thousand families added to the rural delivery service in St. Clair, Bond, Madison, Washington, and Monroe Counties in the past 10 years.

Since I began my service as Congressman last year I have had the opportunity to resume my interest in the rural-mail service. In the past 2 years I have worked to further extend this service to more families and have been successful in adding considerable coverage throughout the five counties in our district. At the present time I have petitioned for several extensions of routes and I am hopeful that within a reasonable time my recommendations will be approved.

I believe the people living in the rural areas of our country are entitled to this service and I, as a Member of Congress, will exert every effort to foster continued improvement in the operations of rural-mail delivery. In my own district I will not cease my efforts until I am assured that every family in the rural areas have adequate mail service.

Under leave to do so, Mr. Speaker, I include with my remarks a very fine editorial which appeared in the Belleville Ill., News-Democrat, Friday, July 5, 1946, in commemoration of the Rural Free Delivery Jubilee. It follows:

R. F. D. JUBILEE

"Neither snow, nor rain, nor heat, nor gloom of night stays these couriers from the swift completion of their appointed rounds." Herodotus, 484–424 B. C.

Modern couriers, making their rounds by automobiles, are a particularly welcome sight to more than one-fifth of the Nation's population, mostly rural residents, who depend upon these men and their cars for delivery of letters, newspapers, and packages.

United States rural mail carriers covering one and one-half million miles daily by cars and trucks live up to the Herodotus creed winter and summer on more than 32,000 rural mail routes.

Every working day they provide service to about 30,000,000 people.

This year the rural free delivery branch of the United States postal service is observing its golden jubilee.

This great contribution to the culture and domestic economy of this Nation was authored and sponsored by the late Thomas E. Watson, Representative in Congress from Georgia, elected as a Populist.

It is somewhat astonishing, now that rural free delivery has proven itself such a boon, to recall that Congressman Watson encountered the fiercest kind of opposition when he proposed that $10,000 be appropriated for an experimental free delivery of mail in rural communities other than towns and villages.

The idea was termed "a craze" by President Cleveland, who said the estimated cost of delivering mail to persons off the rail routes would be prohibitive.

The Georgian finally got his measure through, and the Postmaster General in 1896 tried the system first in Maryland.

It proved such a success that appropriations were steadily increased from year to year until rural free delivery became universal throughout the country.

Some day a historian will write a history of country living in terms of the RFD boxes that stand along hundreds of thousands of miles of roads.

No one who lives in cities and towns where the gray uniformed men trudge up to the door to hand out the mail can fully appreciate the meaning of the RFD box on a country road miles away from town.

It is a cosmopolitan sort of a box. It has a range of style as comprehensive as the fashions that adorn the feminine form.

There are some RFD receptacles that will hold a half bushel of newspapers, magazines, and mail-order catalogs.

On these capacious boxes that sit on posts before big prosperous-looking farms, one often sees the name of the farm in big red letters.

In the last few years art with a capital A has come to the rural-free-delivery containers.

There are cute little bungalows and birdhouse styles; some like to use copies of old-time stage coaches; a favorite is a replica of Uncle Sam in his star-spangled claw-hammer coat and red and white striped trousers invitingly holding out a box for the reception of mail.

But the real, genuine, honest-to-goodness RFD box is a humble, everyday sort of affair.

It is just plain galvanized iron with a red metal flag attached which is put up to notify the carrier there is mail to collect.

Through that plebeian gray box has passed part of the heartbeats of a nation.

Farm boys and girls write for the things that interest them.

The family far from urban centers may use the mail-order firms for the things needed by humans and the farms.

Boys and girls who have left home for jobs in the big cities write letters that come through it.

And when the country boys are away fighting freedom's battles in foreign lands, fathers watch from the fields and mothers from the kitchen windows for the RFD man.

In many of these boxes in late years has been left that fateful communication from the Adjutant General beginning with "I regret to state—."

The mail box sitting alongside the country road is a link of the chain that binds this Nation into one people.

The history, traditions, and esprit d'corps of the rural mail carriers are worthy of the Nation which boasts the most efficient postal service in the world.

The effect of their work in terms of education and enlightenment, not to mention the improvement of rural media of communication, is beyond estimate.

Faith and a Free People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include an inspiring article by Clifford B. Ward, editor of the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel, which appeared in the July 4 issue of that newspaper. The article follows:

GOOD EVENING

(By Clifford B. Ward)

When the American people lose the intelligence to run their own business, they are lost. Certainly, no small group of men at Washington can run this country as well as the country can run itself. Right now, for sinister reasons, every agency of Washington propaganda is trying to scare the public of this country into believing that if they permit Washington to drop its controls over them, they will flounder and fail. I don't believe so, because I still retain faith in this country, which means faith in its people.

I believe that the United States Steel can run its own business better than anyone in Washington can run it, both for the benefit of the United States Steel and the public it serves. I believe that the Ford Motor Co., the General Motors Co., and every other automobile company can also run its business better than anyone in Washington can run it. I think that the packers, the millers, the bakers, the producers, the wholesalers and the distributors of the country can run their business better than anyone else can run it. And I also believe that God can run His business better than any human being can run it. Persons, of course, who have no trust in God have no trust in other people. But this country was founded on faith—faith in God and faith in human beings.

We talk a lot about private enterprise. Faith in other human beings is all that private enterprise amounts to. Whether we like it or not, all of us are born into this world dependent upon God and other human beings. That is why I think a lot of our current methods of thinking are nonsensical. We have driven ourselves crazy trying to establish, by planning, complete security against the hazards of being dependent upon God and other people. It can't be done. We have even gone in for the nonproduction of human beings on the theory that we can plan our lives much better than God can plan them for us. There isn't a human being alive today who isn't by virtue of the mercy of God and the mercy of other human beings who took him through the tender early years of life when without their help he would have been dead. When any conceited human being says that he owes no one anything, he is both a liar and an ingrate. There isn't any such thing as a human being who owes nothing to anyone. He owes his life to God and he owes the preservation of it to parents, to guardians and to the human race in general.

When the New Deal decided that it would tell God how He should parcel out His bounty by artificially restricting the growth of farm produce and the animals that men eat, it was in a sense a blasphemous thing.

As a result of that blasphemous idea that the bounty of God and the needs of men should be geared to a system of controlled prices, it is surprising that we were not punished more than we have been. If God were not more merciful than He is just, more millions might have starved.

The issue in this country right now is not whether OPA is continued or permanently dropped, but whether the American people have enough faith in God and themselves to throw off all the controls that are not absolutely necessary and start running their own business as free men, whether that business be running a farm, a factory or continuing life as a civilian, free from the involuntary servitude of compulsory peacetime military service. I contend that the mistakes we will make running ourselves will be infinitely fewer than the mistakes that will be made if Washington runs us. There isn't enough intelligence in Washington to run a single lathe as well as some operator in Fort Wayne can run it.

Either we are returning once more of our own volition to Egypt because we don't trust ourselves to be free men or we are going to give the world again an example of how free men can climb the heights.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHASE GOING WOODHOUSE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1946

Mrs. WOODHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial in the New York Times of July 2, 1946:

THE BRITISH LOAN

Although the future of OPA and price control is today the question of dominant interest before Congress, the House of Representatives is scheduled this week to debate another issue which is also of great importance. This is the proposed loan to Britain, which was approved by the Senate nearly 2 months ago and which since then has been the subject of extensive hearings by a committee of the House.

The arguments on both sides of this question have been thoroughly explored, first in the Senate and then in the House committee. The House itself will hear little that is new. At bottom, those who favor the loan, as this newspaper does strongly, must agree that their case rests essentially on faith.

Faith, first, in the British people; faith that their vitality and resourcefulness and capacity for hard work will enable them to repay the loan, at the moderate rate of interest charged, under the safeguards which have been provided, and on the assumption that we make it possible for them to pay us through the sale to us of British goods.

Faith, next, in the superiority of the free-enterprise system over any system of government-directed economy which has been or can be devised: it is the chief immediate purpose of the loan to provide Britain with sufficient dollar exchange to enable that country to remove as rapidly as possible existing emergency controls over foreign exchange, abandon discriminatory import restrictions and reestablish for the most important trading areas in the world conditions under which free enterprise can function.

Faith, finally, in democracy itself. With the end of the war we have entered an era of peaceful but nonetheless genuine and decisive competition between two great rival systems, the one democratic, the other totalitarian. In this competition the British people stand stanchly at our side. It is logical and proper and essential that we should help them face the future with assurance and new strength. An overwhelming vote in the House of Representatives in favor of the British loan will be regarded in all parts of the world as a vote of confidence in the future of the democratic system.

And the following editorial from the Stamford (Conn.) Advocate of July 5, 1946:

THE LOAN IN JEOPARDY

There is danger that the bill providing for a loan to Great Britain will be defeated. After prolonged deliberations it was passed by the Senate, and it has been recommended by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. Only a few weeks ago, its enactment into law seemed assured. But a highly offensive statement of Mr. Bevin has exercised a profound effect on sentiment in the House; and many Members whose support had been counted on have shifted to the opposition. So fearful is the administration of the present outlook that a pretext was found to postpone until next week the debate previously set for today.

It would be little short of a calamity should the British loan fail of approval. In a very real sense it is the cornerstone of our policy of international economic reconstruction. Unless the credit is granted, the enormous effort we have devoted to laying the foundations for flourishing multilateral trade would prove wasted. The fund and the bank provided for in the Bretton Woods Agreements Act would labor under an insuperable handicap. Great Britain would be forced to seek shelter in a new economic nationalism within the framework of the sterling area and the Empire. Our objective of full employment at home in the midst of a world of expanding trade would remain unrealized.

The economic arguments for the British loan have been frequently stated At the end of a prolonged negotiation, President Truman summed the matter up as follows: "Both sides have been fully conscious of the significance to other countries, as well as their own, of the outcome of these discussions, and they have from the beginning had continuously in view the common interest of their Governments in establishing a world trading and monetary system from which the trade of all countries can benefit and within which the trade of all countries can be conducted on a multilateral, nondiscriminatory basis." And Secretary Byrnes, shortly thereafter, argued: "If we fail to make this loan, Britain will be forced to do business by barter with a bloc of nations. Those nations, in turn, will be forced to do business with Britain in preference to other nations. That means dividing the world into economic blocs. If the world is divided into economic blocs the peace of the world will be in danger. Wars frequently stem from trade conflict."

But beyond this there are urgent political considerations which every citizen should have in mind, even though for obvious reasons no administration spokesman could prudently allude to them. In spite of all our efforts, we find ourselves living more and more in a world divided. In the long run the security of our institutions, if not of our frontiers, may depend upon a healthy economic revival in the friendly democracies.

Great Britain and France are the eastern bastions of human liberty. We have recognized almost instinctively that there are impelling reasons why we should strive to make these bastions secure. We have granted a loan to the French Republic. It is a matter of immediate national concern that we follow this by granting a loan to Great Britain. If we allow anything to prevent us from doing so, only the Soviet Union will rejoice. For the Kremlin would inevitably see in this a blow to those fraternal ties which today offer the only effective resistance to its further encroachments.

Mr. Bevin's false and provocative charges evoked an emotional reaction which was fully justified. But this reaction should not be permitted to block the passage by Congress of a measure so essential to our own welfare. We understand and share the indignation aroused by the remarks of the British Foreign Minister. Yet it would be a tragic follow should it lead us to take reprisals against our recent ally and, in this manner, to sacrifice our own national interest.

This is no time to allow our decisions to be governed by the heat of the moment. The consequence of doing so can only be disastrous. We know how difficult is the position of a Representative subjected to a rising volume of protest from his constituents. But this is one occasion when it is peculiarly incumbent upon the Members of Congress to resist the immediate pressure from back home. The national interest is at stake; the national interest is in their charge. If their best judgment tells them that the British loan deserves their support, they should support it. The bitterness and tension engendered by Mr. Bevin will in time disappear. The nature of the relations—whether good or bad—that we now establish with our sister democracy will long endure. Every Congressman voting for the loan will be fully able to defend his action.

OPA

OF

HON. NED R. HEALY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. HEALY. Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that we vote this 20-day extension of OPA. The President has vetoed a bill which completely crippled OPA in order to give Congress another opportunity to consider its rash action. I cannot believe that any thinking Member of the House will deny the need for extension of price control.

Unless Congress takes immediate action we will be faced with uncontrolled inflation. Any "doubting Thomases" will soon have ample opportunity to observe the skyrocketing of prices. I have already had telegrams from my district advising me of doubled rents. The Washington papers have reported butter selling at 94 cents a pound. An increase of 3 cents per quart on milk has been announced. And this is but the first day that we are without price control. You may be sure that this trend will grow like a snowball rolling down a mountainside unless we take immediate action.

Experience has already demonstrated that we cannot abandon price and rent controls at this time. Last fall the building industry insisted on the removal of controls from building materials. Ironically it was this same building industry which found it necessary to come back and request the reinstatement of governmental controls.

If Congress permits OPA to die now, it is highly probable that runaway inflation will force the President to call a special session of Congress early this fall to bring price control again into effect.

I would like to remind the Members who oppose this measure now that they will be in the midst of their campaigns for reelection at that time. Though the National Association of Manufacturers wields considerable influence in some circles here in Washington, it is the American people who have the final say on who shall represent them in Congress.

It will be extremely difficult to satisfy American citizens with assurances that "prices will soon find their normal level" while their savings are drawn down the drain of inflation.

This 20-day extension of OPA will give us another opportunity to draft a workable price-control act. The President has made recommendations on the provisions of this act. The welfare of the Nation will be served by the adoption of these recommendations.

We are the elected representatives of the American people. The people of my district have sent me hundreds and hundreds of letters and telegrams urging the continuation of price and rent controls. I think it high time that we end this bickering and vote as they demand for continuation of an effective OPA.

Why Not Nominate Mr. Farley?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYLE H. BOREN
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Yonkers Herald Statesman of June 14, 1946:

WHY NOT NOMINATE MR. FARLEY?

Although United States Senator JAMES MEAD has been most prominently mentioned for the Democratic nomination for Governor of the State, it is no secret that Senator MEAD is personally wholly disinclined to oppose Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, Republican incumbent. For one thing, Mr. MEAD likes his job in the Senate; and for another, he is not sure by any means that he can defeat Dewey. In the event of his defeat for Governor, he would find himself off the pay roll, which would be greatly to his inconvenience and dislike.

There is talk of Navy Secretary James V. Forrestal, who is shortly to retire from that position. But who in the State of New York knows Mr. Forrestal or what are his qualifications for Governor?

There has also been mention of some gentleman whose name escapes our memory but who was campaign manager last fall for Mayor O'Dwyer. Practical politicians say his name will also escape the attention of several million voters.

And, lastly, there appears to be a subterranean movement to popularize Associate Justice Robert H. Jackson of the United States Supreme Court, who recently blasted a fellow jurist, Hugo L. Black, the former Ku Kluxer from Alabama. A darling of the New Dealers, Jackson might possibly carry two of the five boroughs of New York City—and that would be all.

Why, in this dilemma, does not the Democratic Party turn to its strongest and best liked and most experienced member of the entire State, James Aloysius Farley of Rockland County, across the river from Westchester?

Jim Farley knows politics and its language. He is sturdy in his honesty and reliable in his negotiations. He bears the reputation of never going back on his word, which is a great deal more than can be said of others whom he pushed to prominence. He knows government of the State, as well as of the Nation intimately. Few have wider acquaintance in this State within and without his party. He has proved himself a good business man since he left active politics.

We do not believe Jim Farley would make as good a Governor as has Tom Dewey. But we do believe he is the best bet in the Democratic ranks of this State and the only possible candidate who would give Mr. Dewey a stiff battle.

Why look elsewhere, then?

Stop, Look, and Think

REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand copies of four telegrams which are self-explanatory.

The Phoenix Glass Co. is a corporation located at Monaca, Beaver County, Pa., and has been in continuous operation for many years. It employs 550 men.

On June 11 I received telegram No. 1. On the same day, after having made inquiry, I replied as follows. You will note that in the first telegram the company requested 200 tons. In the second telegram it was shown that there had been available on April 15, 1,797,000 tons.

On June 12 the second telegram from the company revealed that there was three-quarters of 1 ton in Cheyenne, Wyo.

On receipt of the second telegram our office took up this matter direct with the War Assets Administration and was informed by that Bureau that the Interior Department was buying soda ash for shipment to Puerto Rico. We then called Mr. Mason Barr, Chief of the Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands Branch of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions of the Interior Department, and we were informed by him that that Department had been buying soda ash and would purchase all they could get for the Puerto Rico Glass Co. for the shipment of rum which is the main source of income for the people of that island. Our complaint that our own industries needed protection met with no response.

The last telegram of June 21 tells the story. As a consequence 550 men have been thrown out of employment and the plant of the Phoenix Glass Co. is still idle.

Hon. LOUIS E. GRAHAM,
House of Representatives:

We are facing shutdown because of soda ash shortage. Can you tell us if any is quickly available from Government war surplus stocks. Will pay full price on 200 tons bulk carload shipments from any destination. Type we use is 58 percent dense granular soda ash.

A. H. STEWART,
Vice President, Phoenix Glass Co.

JUNE 11, 1946.
A. H. STEWART,
Vice President, Phoenix Glass Co.,
Monaca, Pa.:

Re tel. no exact inventory here soda ash surplus stock. On April 15 Boston had 36,000 tons, Kansas City 29,000, Los Angeles 190,000, Louisville 50,000, Nashville 500,000, New Orleans 63,000, Oklahoma City 300,000, Richmond 500,000, St. Louis 73,000, Spokane 56,000. War Assets Administration suggest you contact Stanley G. Backman, Regional Director, WSA, 1746 East Twelfth Street, Cleveland. If none available his region have his inner office section ascertain stocks in other regions and arrange purchase.

LOUIS E. GRAHAM,
Member of Congress.

MONACA, PA., June 12, 1946.
The Honorable LOUIS E. GRAHAM,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.:

Thank you for your wire on soda ash. None available in Cleveland region and all regional contacts by the Cleveland office made today revealed three-quarters of 1 ton in Cheyenne, Wyo. On locating any if all this material has already been purchased, can we locate present owner through your office.

ANDREW STEWART,
Vice President, Phoenix Glass Co.

JUNE 14, 1946.
A. H. STEWART,
Vice President, Phoenix Glass Co.,
Monaca, Pa.:

Re tel. have again contacted WAA, they advise Interior Department buying all soda ash they can get for shipment Puerto Rico. Other records of purchasers would be in regional office. Declaration of 150 tons in Salt Lake City, dated April 16, just received Washington yesterday. Suggest might be worth while your contacting Joseph S. Willes, regional director, 222 SW. Temple Street, Salt Lake City, telephone 5-7503. Have also contacted Civilian Production Administration regarding urgency certificate but they advise soda ash in such short supply throughout country none will be issued. Will forward any additional information secured.

LOUIS E. GRAHAM,
Member of Congress.

MONACA, PA., June 21, 1946.
The Honorable LOUIS E. GRAHAM,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

We have ordered 150 tons soda ash Salt Lake WAA listing S. U. list No. E42 through Cleveland regional WAA office as you suggested, but have been unable to get urgency certificate from CPA because soda ash is not listed in their office as critical. CPA office states it would take 4 months' processing to put soda ash on critical list. Columbia Chemical strike not yet settled and we are closing down. Thanks for your past and continued efforts in our behalf. Much of our products is for veteran housing.

Vice President, Phoenix Glass Co.

REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, though the press, some editors, columnists, and radio commentators, who can be always depended upon to come up with rumors reflecting upon the integrity of Members of Congress, have had not a little to say about the Erie Basin Metal Products Co., they have no doubt inadvertently overlooked Quentin Reynolds' connection with the activities of that company. Quentin, who gets some of his "sugar" from Pepsi-Cola, which had a pipe line to the real supply of sugar to produce its sweetened water, not long ago viciously and falsely attacked Members of Congress. He, like Winchell, has a convenient memory, and he has never called upon his paymaster to explain where and how during the war it received its large supply of sugar while as to so many others sugar was nonexistent. But Quentin, according to the press, got his little "take," though undoubtedly legitimate, though some would think his speech was overvalued, from this same company now involved in the Senate hearings.

A Member of Congress is called upon almost daily by constituents who are harrassed, intimidated, and sometimes financially embarrassed by senseless New Deal regulations, to aid them in escaping, if possible, some of thc disastrous results which the bureaucrats ever seek to impose upon a once free people.

Like the overwhelming majority of the Members of Congress, I have no knowledge of the current investigation into the affairs of the Erie Basin Metal Products Co., but until I get the explanation of our colleague, I intend to abide by the old principle, never given consideration by the New Dealers when commenting on the activities of their opponents, that a man is presumed to be innocent until shown to be guilty. Hence, no opinion is expressed as to whether Quentin earned or did not earn or whether he ever received the $2,000 which the press says was given him for his address when the E was awarded the Erie Basin Metal Products Co.

But here is the substance of the story from the Washington Times-Herald of July 7:

Quentin Reynolds, the left-wing writer and radio commentator, who was one of the distinguished speakers at the Democratic National Convention at Chicago in 1944, has been revealed as the recipient of $2,000 for his remarks at the E award dinner of the Erie Basin Metal Products Co. that cost an estimated $16,-264.

The only larger single expenditures than the fee of Mr. Reynolds, who is better known to his intimates by his nickname of "Red", are $2,375.85 for 370 dinners and 86 bottles of bourbon mix and $6,146.90 for 610 miniatures of 8-inch shells.

The press carries the story that an effort was made to induce the Government to foot the bill for the dinner, including, of course, the cost of bourbon mix, though that was one of the attempts to milk the Federal Government which was not successful. No doubt the company will attempt to deduct the amount as one of its legitimate expenses when making its income-tax report.

In view of the startling revelations being made of the war production exploits of the Erie Basin Metal Products Co., it would be interesting to know what Mr. Reynolds had to say in the $2,000 worth of oratorical extravagance. No doubt he pulled out all of the stops in lauding the company for extraordinary achievements.

Under the New Deal, Mr. Reynolds rose to the heights as a war correspondent after a carreer as a sports writer covering the Brooklyn Dodgers. He also became an authority on international politics, and in 1944 predicted on the radio that the Republicans planned to stage a phoney Communist plot to assassinate Thomas E. Dewey, the great Governor of New York State. Mr. Reynolds' phoney broadcast was perfectly timed with release from the Moscow press.

There seems to be no limit to what a mediocrity will say or write when willing to peddle New Deal "hooey."

For years, through his writings and over the radio, Quentin Reynolds has been disseminating biased views on governmental policy and no doubt he, with Winchell, will be in full cry on the trail of every anti-New Dealer, anti-Communist candidate for Congress between now and the November election.

The Missouri Valley Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, two very able editorials dealing with the proposed Missouri Valley Authority, written by Mr. Jonathan Marshall, and recently appearing in the newspaper, the Silver and Gold, an official publication of the University of Colorado.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Silver and Gold, Boulder, Colo., of September 25, 1945]

PASSING SENTENCE

(By Jonathan Marshall)

The postwar era presents many problems, and not the least of these for the West is the problem of bringing in new industries. Many public officials would like to dodge the issue, but it must be faced.

Among the plans brought forth for creating prosperity in this region is the proposed Missouri Valley Authority. The MVA is being bitterly opposed, but let us examine the facts.

In 1941 Senator ED JOHNSON said, "Whenever you hear a politician * * * raving about State's rights, look under the proverbial woodpile." Now Johnson, Ralph Carr, and Governor Vivian are all saying that Colorado will lose her rights if we have an MVA.

The bill's opponents also claim that private industry should be allowed to develop water resources. Colorado would be deprived of water for irrigation by this socialistic measure modeled on the already successful TVA.

The purposes of the MVA are: (1) To control and prevent floods; (2) to reclaim public lands; (3) to use water for irrigation purposes on public and private lands; (4) to increase and safeguard navigable rivers; (5) to encourage industrial development; (6) to foster fuller utilization of the region's resources. Naturally, the opponents deny that MVA would do these things.

Why do the utility companies oppose the bill? It is obvious. Instead of private companies manufacturing power and taking profit, the Government would perform this important function, and in the Tennessee Valley the Government showed that it could produce power at a lower cost than could private companies.

Let us look at the figures. From 1930 to 1940 there was a 42-percent gain in the production of electricity in the Missouri Valley. During this same time in the TVA region the gain was 90 percent.

During the same period of time wages rose by some $42,000,000 in the TVA and fell by about $125,000,000 in this region. Figures answer the question of prosperity. The MVA is vital to the welfare of the people of Colorado.

As for the bogeyman (State's rights), what do they say in the Tennessee Valley? The TVA is run from the valley, not from Washington. Even the power companies give wholehearted support to the TVA. Men who fought the TVA when it begar are now its most ardent defenders.

Many people fall for the propaganda being spread against the MVA. Many people do not care what happens, for the prosperity of the valley is not a thing we can visualize.

As college students, we can an must make ourselves heard. The MVA will give us cheaper power, more irrigation water, more industries, and flood control. It is a people's bill, a chance for prosperity; let us not get taken in by the wind from reactionary groups, for, after all, it is our future, too.

[From the Silver and Gold, Boulder, Colo., October 10, 1945]

PASSING SENTENCE

(By Jonathan Marshall)

We have now heard both sides of the question of whether we should have an MVA. It is up to us to evaluate the two arguments.

I should like to say two things before beginning. First, it was rather interesting to notice the feeling of doubt and opposition that followed Mr. Carr's speech last week. The other point is that in all honesty I shall have to admit to being prejudiced, and not neutral on the subject.

Benton J. Strong told us that the TVA has paid the States and National Government more in lieu of taxes than they ever received before in taxes. Ex-Governor Carr replied that the project was wasteful and extravagant.

Mr. Carr again brought up the overworked phrase of State's rights. This vague phrase has become a vehicle for any attack on the Federal Government—but the former governor fails to remember that in a democracy the people are supposedly the government.

The words of the governors of the TVA region, that the authority program has not harmed their State's rights, have made no impression on the MVA's opponent.

In speaking for the MVA, Mr. Stong cited many facts to show that the TVA was a success. He also gave us facts in telling us about the opposition's plan. I did not feel that ex-Governor Carr gave facts.

It is hard to get away from the facts about the TVA, on which the proposed MVA is patterned. While business receded in this region, it increased in the Tennessee Valley. The standard of living improved in the TVA area, and it did not improve here. Again, Mr. Carr did not answer the facts to my satisfaction.

Although he claimed that State's rights would be taken away by an MVA and bureaucracy the bill's opponent denied that the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation would do any such thing. Why?

It is hard to know what to believe; however, in my opinion, Mr. Carr spoke in platitudes and not with facts. If the dying cries of State's rights, free enterprise, bureaucracy, and no planning are the arguments against the MVA, I am for it.

Planning, prosperity, jobs, use of resources, and cooperation seem to be important if this region is to maintain itself in the future. Business, labor, farm groups, local government, and civic groups have almost unanimously gone on record in saying that the TVA is a success.

Are we to believe this group who has lived with the TVA, or those who are fighting the MVA? Let us not get lost in the flag waving or deafened by the platitudes. As for me, the choice is obvious.

An MVA and prosperity. Or, do we want State's rights and depression?

No Secret Bomb Deals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. H. MOORE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 8 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "No Secret Bomb Deals," published in the Washington Times-Herald of July 8, 1946. It relates to Senate resolution 297, introduced by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], now pending in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which states that it is the sense of the Senate that any atomic energy agreement must be considered as a treaty, and must therefore be ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO SECRET BOMB DEALS

At the Tehran and Yalta Conferences during the war, President Roosevelt made a number of secret concessions to Joseph Stalin. These things have been turning up at intervals ever since. Each time, Roosevelt has looked a bit more foolish than before, and our present leaders have been a bit more embarrassed and confused.

Roosevelt alibied to confidential friends of his that he was making all these secret concessions to Stalin because of what he called his great design for the postwar world.

It was a design for a world in which Russia would drop all its suspicions of other nations and be as gentle and cooperative as a friendly dog. Enough bribes to Stalin, Roosevelt thought, would do the trick.

We all know now how mistaken Roosevelt was—though President Truman didn't find that out till after he had made some concessions of his own to Stalin at Potsdam.

Russia is not friendly and cooperative, to put it conservatively, and Stalin would seem to be taking much quiet pleasure over having played the grinning "Americanski" for the sucker he gave every evidence of being and wanting to be.

All of which is leading up to a highly important resolution introduced in the Senate this week by Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin.

Senator WILEY's resolution has to do with the current argument about international control of atomic energy.

We blew off history's fourth atom-bomb explosion at Bikini atoll, June 30. While the results were not more than semispectacular, the bomb remains the most deadly weapon yet invented so far as the general public knows.

WILEY wants the Senate, before this session of Congress recesses, to put a flat and formal ban on any United States atom-bomb agreements with other nations except by consent of a two-thirds Senate majority.

That would mean that Truman could not lawfully make any such agreement on his own; nor could Secretary of State Byrnes, or any of the Russia lovers in high Government circles, or any private citizen. The consent of 64 of the 96 Senators would be necessary in advance of any agreement to part with any of this Government's secrets of the technique of making atom bombs.

It is extremely important, it seems to us, that the Senate take this or similar action before Congress goes home.

The reason why it is so important is that Russia obviously is trying to play our leaders for suckers again.

It is most regrettable that our leaders ever let themselves be kidded into consenting to talk about sharing the bomb; but they did. Bernard M. Baruch has figured out a sharing plan which will put our interests first and safeguard them as thoroughly as may be.

BARUCH PLAN—RUSSIAN PLAN

The gist of the Baruch plan is that we would give the bomb secrets to an international atomic energy control body only after we were satisfied that this group could and would control atomic energy development all over the world, and that all nations would let international inspectors look into any of their laboratories, mines, factories, and so forth.

Russia has come up with a counter proposal. It is that the nations piously outlaw the atom bomb; that within 3 months after this gesture we destroy all our atom bombs; and that then the nations go to work rigging up some vague system of world atomic control.

Up to now, the Baruch plan has not been modified. Ferdinand Eberstadt, Mr. Baruch's adviser, restated it in full a few days ago.

But there is many a slip, and so forth—especially when we have so many public officials and propagandists who like Russia better than they like their own country. You can't tell what one or more of such persons might do while Congress was on vacation.

We can't afford to take chances on being sold secretly down the river into an atomic war a few years hence. The people have at least a right to know what is cooking with regard to a weapon for which they paid $2,000,000,000 and probably more. It is up to the Senate to see that the people get that information, and go on getting it.

OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

MISSOURI BAG CO.,
St. Louis, Mo., July 3, 1946.

Hon. A. S. J. CARNAHAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Referring to the OPA situation.

This firm has been in business for 50 years, and the writer remembers very clearly the debacle which occurred after the boom-and-bust period following the First World War and repeated in 1929.

With these shining examples before us, we cannot understand how or why the OPA principle should be opposed by any businessman. And, naturally, it goes without saying that the prosperity of our country is dependent upon the farmers and businessmen.

May we urge you to bear in mind the views of this 50-year-old company, and will you kindly exert your efforts toward enactment of legislation favorable to the OPA bill?

Respectfully yours,
MISSOURI BAG CO.,
SAM E. GRODSKY, Treasurer.

Russia Gets $100,000,000

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of July 6, 1946:

RUSSIA GETS $100,000,000

Whenever we sit down at the table with the Russians we give something away. When we trade, we get a toothpick for a load of cordwood.

We started giving away things at Tehran in November 1943. We continued giving at Yalta and at Potsdam. Now at Paris we vote Russia $100,000,000 in reparations from Italy in return for Russia's agreement to call a 21-nation peace conference.

To be more exact, we pay Russia $100,000,000 to keep an agreement she made at Moscow last Christmas.

Russia agreed at that time to a general peace conference May 1. Then she stalled her way out. Now, we pay off again and Russia consents to hold the conference July 29, nearly 3 months late.

We say we will pay Russia the $100,000,000 because any money Italy is able to send to Russia will come indirectly out of American pockets. We are putting up the cash to feed Italy and to rehabilitate Italian industry. The reparations to Russia will be paid out of the products of Italian industry.

If the conference July 29 promised to settle anything of major importance the pay-off might be defended on the grounds of expediency. But the deal has a Munich smell.

Simultaneously with the calling of the conference comes a warning that settlement of the German and Austrian questions is not in sight. A general peace conference which cannot dispose of those questions will be of negligible value to the world, and of no value to the United States.

The rehabilitation of Europe cannot proceed so long as Germany and Austria remain a political no-man's land, walled off from the rest of Europe by military roadblocks—and with Germany divided against itself into four airtight compartments.

Europe is a highly integrated economic unit and until it is treated as such millions of Europeans will stay in the breadline, with Uncle Sam paying for the bread.

A general conference which cannot approach this situation realistically, with the wraps off, cannot be considered a peace conference by any stretch of imagination. Such a meeting can only ratify Russia's ill-gotten gains, leaving the vital problems of Europe unsolved.

The continuing appeasement of Russia creates new problems, and settles nothing.

The idea of giving Russia reparations from Italy is as fantastic as dignifying by the same term the loot Russia carried away in the rape of Manchuria.

We will never buy peace by paying blackmail.

Can We Meet the Challenge of Inflation?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Alvin H. Hansen, from the New York Times magazine of last Sunday:

CAN WE MEET THE CHALLENGE OF INFLATION?

(By Alvin H. Hansen, Littauer professor of political economy, Harvard University)

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—Eighteen months after the end of the First World War, wholesale prices stood 148 percent above prewar, cost of living 108 percent, but the most rapid rise came in the last 9-month lap.

We have now completed the first 9 months after the Second World War and we stand at 45 percent above prewar for wholesale prices and 35 percent for cost of living. The record so far is good compared with the First World War. But will we outdo World War I in the second 9-month lap?

I do not pretend to know what will be the full effects of the termination of OPA last Sunday. Those who have clamored for a free market have got themselves into a corner. If there are substantial increases in food and clothing prices new wage demands will be upon us. Nothing could be more unrealistic than the plea for all-around decontrol, at the same time urging wage stability.

The experience after the First World War is proof enough of that. Under free market forces, hourly wage rates rose from an index of 162 in 1918 (July 1914 being taken as 100) to 234 in 1920.

After the First World War the inflationary pressure came largely from inventory accumulations, expansion of plan and equipment, and exports. Today the pressure stems largely from the consumers—food and clothing and housing. Housing will take some time, but the current shortages of food and clothing are surely temporary.

Yet if these short-run pressures are allowed to develop into a sharp upward surge in clothing and food prices, we shall be in trouble on the labor front. Thus, after the current excess demand has subsided we shall be left with a new high level of labor cost. Once labor costs have been pushed to a new plateau the whole structure of prices will be formed around this central axis.

This has happened before and it will happen again if we yield in the next year or so to the temporary inflationary pressure and permit a cycle of price and wage increases.

If instead we hold the line on food, clothing, and rent, only then can we hope to tackle the problem of stability of labor costs. This means that wages should rise no more rapidly than productivity.

There are those who argue that the battle is already lost, and for two reasons: (1) Because labor costs have already been allowed to rise to a point that requires a sharp advance in prices; and (2) because war financing has left us with an excess money supply. Thus it is argued we might as well give up. Why worry more about the OPA?

But it is not at all evident that labor costs have advanced to a point that requires a new high price plateau. With larger output volume, fixed costs per unit of output are much lower than in 1936–40. The repeal of the excess-profits tax permits higher wages without necessarily encroaching upon net profits after taxes. Recent basic wage rate increases were mainly an offset to the elimination of wartime premiums, leaving average hourly earnings substantially stable.

Corporate profits since the war are in general such as to support the thesis that the economy can stand the recent wage rate increases without any substantial price increases. The current inflationary pressures do not come mainly from the cost side; they come from the side of demand.

Nor is inflation inevitable because of the current money supply. The money supply is no longer increasing. The Treasury has been reducing its general fund balance largely by retiring securities held by the commercial banks. We are rapidly moving into a budgetary surplus.

Large continued purchases of Government securities are in prospect by insurance companies, savings banks, and Government trust funds. These are likely to exceed any net liquidation by individuals or business; and thus we may see some further reduction of the securities held by commercial banks. Commercial loans are not likely to be large in view of the high liquidity of business concerns. In general, the control of the money supply appears by now to be pretty well in hand.

The money supply has increased since 1940 relatively little in relation to the national income. Moreover, throughout the last century, with growing wealth and income, business and individuals have wished to hold an ever-increasing amount of money in relation to income. Thus in 1840 the money supply was 10 percent of the national income; 20 percent in 1870; 55 percent in 1900; 65 percent in 1925; 85 percent in 1940, and 95 percent today.

The money supply has increased far more rapidly than income without producing inflationary consequences. The notion that recent increases in our money supply inevitably mean inflation is a hangover of the crude quantity theory of money. Yet we need to watch our step. We can and should, by means of a budgetary surplus, reduce our money supply.

The record of price control to date is far from perfect, but it is a creditable one, and the game is not lost unless we deliberately throw it away. Our tax record during and after the war represents by and large a responsible fiscal program. The American public displayed during the war a vast capacity to save. We have gone about the difficult business of reconversion, not indeed without serious labor-management battles, but nevertheless with sufficient dispatch to lift output to a level two-thirds higher than in the prewar years.

From the long-run standpoint, the United States, with its increased capacity to produce goods and commodities of almost every description (food, clothing, consumers' durables, machinery), is not an inflation-sensitive country.

Considering our vast productive power, together with our high propensity to save out of current income, we stand in far greater danger over the long run of inadequate markets than of runaway inflation. But the testing period is upon us. Are we as a nation sufficiently mature and responsible to prevent first the disaster of a serious monetary and price upheaval and later a recurrence of mass unemployment? Now is the time to begin to show what stuff we as Americans are made of.

To meet the present crisis, to preserve the integrity of our money and protect our accumulated savings, the line must be held until the temporary scarcities are overcome. We must moreover: (1) resist the temptation to reduce taxes further as long as the inflationary pressure lasts, (2) promote the continued purchase of savings bonds, and (3) achieve as rapidly as possible a budgetary surplus.

But we have also the long-run program to consider. Fiscal flexibility is of paramount importance. The dogma of balanced budget rarely fits. So long as the present inflationary pressures persist, an over-balanced budget is needed. But prosperity will not last forever. The Government should now develop a long-range and carefully planned program for sustained employment and economic stability, including a compensatory fiscal program.

Paternalism by Uncle Sam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the editor of the Evansville Review on July 4, 1946, in an editorial entitled "Asking For It," points out with considerable force just what we can expect when the Federal Government is asked to solve our problems for us. Congressional grants of power to the executive department always results in arbitrary and unreasonable regulations. OPA is the perfect example. When the regulations hurt the public complains, but in each instance we asked for it. Under leave granted to extend my remarks I include the timely editorial referred to:

ASKING FOR IT

President Truman's address to a special session of Congress requesting drastic emergency powers to meet the strike crises, hit the public consciousness with the crushing force of a blockbuster. The pernicious habit of looking to government for the answers to all problems has finally reached the logical conclusion—a crisis that the President feels only ruthless dictatorial authority can cope with.

Few noted the significant request that was included in the President's appeal for authority to seize industries and draft workers into the Army—he asked immediate renewal of price control without qualification or amendment. He could do nothing else. If the Government has complete power over the working people, it must also have complete power over all else. And by the same token if it has complete power over the industries and businesses of the country under the authority of the OPA, it must have complete power over the workers. In this case it makes no difference whether the egg or the hen comes first, liberty as we have known it will be lost.

It is grimly amusing to hear some fanatical supporters of OPA profess shocked concern over the idea of drafting American citizens in peacetime and forcing them to work at the point of bayonets. This, they say, is servitude. So it is. But why be shocked? It is the inevitable end in any country whose people impose upon their government responsibility for their economic welfare.

Countless times in recent years the threat has been heard that our people will never tolerate another depression. In response to this defiant mood, powerful Government agencies have been created—such as the OPA—to prevent any natural adjustments in prices, wages, living standards, and nebulous things like purchasing power and national income. The primary function of the American form of government—the protection of certain rights of the individual, including the right to work, seems to have been forgotten.

The only wonder is that government by bayonet did not appear before this. The whole country has been asking for it. We are now at the point where we must decide whether we want dictatorship with its spurious security, or liberty with the inevitable risks as well as opportunities it entails.

What You Really Pay for Your Meat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of July 6, 1946:

WHAT YOU REALLY PAY FOR YOUR MEAT

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

The OPA's case must be a lot weaker than most people realized, considering the way its propagandists have been magnifying price rises and exaggerating calamities.

Take the case of meat, for instance. You hear a lot of hollering about how the price is shooting up all over the place as profiteers fasten their hooks into you. But is that the real story?

The American Meat Institute, which represents most legitimate meat selling in this country, bought space in a lot of newspapers yesterday to tell you something about the other side. We've never read a better or clearer statement of the facts, so herewith is a repetition of the ad's text:

"You have been paying an additional 5 cents per pound over and above 'ceiling prices' in the form of income taxes to support subsidies, which ended June 30.

"In addition to that, many of you have been paying high overcharges to the black market. Reliable surveys in typical cities throughout the United States show that 83 percent of meat sales were over ceiling. Prices of meat have varied from city to city and in some cases have exceeded ceiling prices by as much as 262 percent.

"From now on (without OPA price controls) the cost of your meat will be what you actually pay over the counter. There will be no hidden taxes or tribute to the black market.

"It is time American people realize that:

"The so-called OPA 'ceiling' prices of meat for the most part are fictional prices—nothing more than some figures on a piece of paper referring to cuts of meat, many of which you have not been able to buy at 'ceiling' prices.

"Painful experience has proved that under OPA regulations:

"A. Livestock does not come to market in sufficient quantities.

"B. A large proportion of the meat animals which do reach the market are gobbled up by buyers who divert meat from the average consumer—to dishonest channels with which the meat industry cannot and will not compete.

"It's the consumer who gets hurt.

"During the past week of open competition—the first since 1942—there was improvement in marketings of livestock. Such increases in the prices of livestock as have occurred have gone back to the livestock grower as an incentive to production."

"Your meat dealer soon will be able to serve you at honest prices."

Now tell yourself the truth: Did you ever realize you were getting the OPA's supposedly "low" prices on things only because the Government was making up the difference to the boys up the line by subsidy checks?

Your tax money was paying those subsidy checks, and how do you like that?

On the one hand you paid taxes to a lot of Chester Bowles' muscle boys to keep prices down, and on the other hand, you paid taxes so the farmer would get enough subsidy money to satisfy his demand for higher prices.

But don't get mad at the farmer. You paid subsidies all up and down the line to make up the shortage between consumer's prices for goods and actual cost to the producer.

You are not fool enough—are you now—to think wages could keep on rising indefinitely, taxes keep on rising indefinitely, and prices stay down? Surely nobody in his right mind ever really believed that.

What was the Government's object in working such a skin game as it has of late with OPA? Well, it all began on a reasonable basis. During the war, American producers of farm and factory goods were not working on their own as they should.

They were—like everybody else—just Government agents hired out for war work of their special kind.

Their production was committed first and always to war orders, and the remainder had to be distributed to the population at large on a shortage basis.

Result: Inevitably prices were bound to go crazy without controls. That was the reason for price control, as a war operation.

But now the war is over. Producers are producing—where strikes and Government permit. The only shortages today are artificial shortages. And even these are breaking down at a rapid rate.

America's greatest pride is in our capacity to produce and it is a well-placed pride. We not only can produce. We do. Like rabbits.

The OPA on the national scale and pattern sought by Chester Bowles is just an interference between buyer and seller who each have money and goods and want to trade. It has no real value.

Why then do some people keep insisting that it stay on?

Simply this: There are some people in the world vain enough and cocky enough and power-hungry enough to think that they know how a nation should be run from top to bottom.

This idea took political form in Russia as communism. In Italy it was called fascism. In Germany, nazism.

All of these had one fact in common: That the government would set production quotas for farm and factory, and fix prices for consumers, wherever found.

We never had that sort of thing around here until 1933, when it arrived under the New Deal as the NRA for industry and the AAA for agriculture. The country took one look and said, "No," and the Supreme Court heaved NRA out by a 9–0 verdict.

We were more or less free of the quota system of living from there on, until the war.

Then it all came back as "emergency legislation," the whole bag of tricks, only more so: Production quotas, consumers' rations, price controls and subsidies, which not only cost billions in tax money, but cut the American standard of living to tatters.

Our standard of living will remain a government-made thing, and a poor one, as long as those controls hang on.

Incidentally, if you support the OPA idea today while it appears to hold prices down where will you stand when the next NRA undertakes to hold prices up?

For as sure as the factories and farms of the United States of America get going, prices will fall. Will you be liberal with your tax dough again to support them? Huh?

Reorganization of the Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES W. WADSWORTH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials:

[From the Wilmington (Del.) News of June 18, 1946]

NO TIME TO RELAX

The easy victory which the bill to reorganize the machinery of Congress scored in the Senate is creating some false and dangerous optimism about its prospects in the House. After the Senate confounded the pessimists by approving the streamlining by a vote of 49 to 16 it has been generally assumed that the lower chamber also would give its assent. But there is, in fact, a real danger that this sound and badly needed legislation will not get through the House.

This is not because the Representatives as a whole, are opposed to congressional reorganization. In fact, we believe that a large majority is heartily in favor of the provisions of the bill. Nor is it due to lack of able leadership. Representative MONRONEY, of Oklahoma, who has charge of the measure, can be counted on to do a skillful job of pushing the proposals. The trouble lies in the House Rules Committee, which has the power to bottle up and kill any legislation to which its members object.

Some of the influential members of the Rules Committee are extremely cool to the bill. They are resistant to change and especially to any change which would threaten to lessen their almost dictatorial authority over what legislation the House may or may not consider. Left to themselves they can, and doubtless will, shelve the measure and prevent any action from being taken at this session.

There is one way to prevent this and it is for citizens and Congressmen who feel that modernization of congressional procedure is urgently needed and long overdue to urge action on the measure. One thing certain is that this is no time to relax in the confident belief that victory will be easy. Even though the majority of the public and the majority of Congress are in favor of the reform, it will take hard fighting to get it enacted into law.

MODERNIZING CONGRESS

(By Raymond Moley)

A start, and only a start, has at last been made to bring the efficiency of Congress into line with its great responsibilities. The Senate has passed, with some modifications, the La Follette proposals for parliamentary reform. Action in the House may or may not follow.

The most outstanding feature of these changes, upon which Senator La Follette has labored for years, is a reform in the committee system. Committees, as everyone knows, are the eyes, ears, arms, and hands by which the two Houses do their work. But the existing committees do not correspond with the real kinds of business which the Houses must perform.

The La Follette reorganization of the committee system is based on the sound proposition that Congress is, after all, the policy-making part of the Government. Therefore, in organizing themselves into committees, the two Houses ought to recognize the broad policy fields into which the interests of government are divided. The committee systems of the two Houses have grown up with little regard for appropriate divisions of the policy-making business of Congress. They are, in general, the inheritances of long tradition and of past emergencies.

Responsibility in the Senate is now scattered among 33 standing committees of all sorts of importance. Some are practically without any business at all. Others, like the Appropriations and Finance Committees, have responsibilities of the highest order. Moreover, there is little or no coordination among the committees. The 33 standing committees and 10 special committees have a membership of 568. This means that each Senator is, on average, a member of six committees.

Under the circumstances Senators simply cannot function properly in the committees to which they are appointed. They cannot attend meetings regularly. As Senator LA FOLLETTE told the Senate: "Hardly a day goes by in any week that I do not find on my desk two or three or sometimes four notices of committee meetings, all being held at the same time on the same day."

The bill passed by the Senate reduces the number of committees to 15, each of which has as its field a broad aspect of policy making. The burden on individual Senators is relieved because Senators would have fewer committee assignments. There would, under the new plan, be joint committee meetings.

Other features of the bill would provide not only the committees but the members with more adequate research assistance and increased salaries and would provide a pension plan for the retirement of Congressmen.

There is also provision for policy committees of the two parties in Congress and for a point legislative-executive council to provide proper liaison between Congress and the Executive.

This critically necessary reform is now before the House. It remains to be seen if action can be taken before adjournment on July 15. There will be opposition, much of which will be based on most unworthy reasons. Congressmen are reluctant to give up the larger patronage provided by a multiplicity of committees. There will also be the fear of criticism because of the salary-raising features of the bill. These short-sighted objections have prevented action before. But with every passing year the necessity grows greater that Congress bring itself into harmony with the times. In the long run an understaffed, underpaid, and badly organized Congress is a luxury which even a rich country cannot afford.

[From the Wilkes-Barre (Pa.) Times-Leader News of June 18, 1946]

STREAMLINING CONGRESS

The Senate, which has been trying rather desperately to cope with most of the Nation's pressing ills all at once, took time out the other day for a little self-improvement. The result was a bill reorganizing and streamlining congressional procedure which is excellent as far as it goes. And it goes quite a long way.

The Senators discarded one or two mossy, cherished traditions, and it must have wrung some of the older, more conservative hearts to do so. But they voted themselves and their colleagues in the House a $5,000-a-year salary increase by way of heart balm.

They also provided some generous social security which will permit them to retire with dignity and a pension after 62 years upon this earth, provided that 6 of those years were spent in Congress. To enlarge upon the wisdom of that move might lead to some unflattering examples. So perhaps it is enough to say that the pension appears to be a wise investment.

Among the reorganizations bill's chief virtues are a reduction in the number of committees, expert assistance for appropriations committees, enough money to hire capable help for other administrative and research duties, and the registering of lobbyists.

A lot of Senators have enjoyed the power, prestige, and importance of many committee memberships. But they really pay for their enjoyment in hard work. Besides answering their mail, having their ears bent by constituents, understanding all current legislation, being on the floor for debate and voting, they are also at present supposed to be experts on all the various, complex, specialized subjects which they have to wrestle with in a half-dozen committees to which they may belong.

It is just too much to do efficiently. Besides, the same general legislative subject may slop over into two or three different committees, all of which adds to the confusion, delay, and red tape.

As for appropriations, Congress has generally had to take an executive department's word for what it needed, and why. The Members have been busy enough without endeavoring to fathom the inner working of outside agencies. Consequently, they have approved or slashed budgets through ignorance, caprice, benevolence, and sheer cussedness. Provision for expert assistants will give the committees some boys on their side whom they can trust, and who presumably will know what they're talking about.

The new bill should ease group pressures not only through registration and financial accountability of lobbies, but by the establishment of majority and minority policy committees which would put major issues on a party basis. This last is something that Commerce Secretary Wallace suggested awhile back, except that the Senate bill stipulates no reprisals if some rugged individualist refuses to hew to the party policy line.

In short, there is promise of better government in the Senate bill. If the House concurs, the result ought to win Congress a unanimous cheer. And that's a sweet sound that the legislators haven't heard in a long time.

[From the Buffalo (N. Y.) News of June 17, 1946]

PARTY POLICY COMMITTEES

One of the innovations called for in the La Follette congressional reorganization bill is the creation of official party policy committees by the majority and minority in each House. The proposal has stirred little discussion, either pro or con. But if the optimism of Republicans in this year's congressional elections is warranted, this provision will take on a peculiar significance next January.

Republicans feel they have an excellent chance to win control of the House this year, and at least fighting chance to control the Senate. If they do, theirs will be the responsibility for congressional leadership and policy making. In such a situation, the loose organization they have maintained as a minority party would be inadequate, and they could wish for nothing better than the creation of a formal policy committee, with the improved discipline that this implies and with the help of a full-time staff, as contemplated in the bill, "to assist in study, analysis and research on problems involved in policy determinations."

With a Republican House and Democratic Senate, or a Republican Congress and Democratic administration, moreover, better liaison obviously would be needed than the present machinery affords on matters of nonpartisan concern. The La Follette bill provides that the majority policy committees would serve on a formal legislative-executive council with the President and various Cabinet members. On "broad questions of foreign and domestic policy," the minority policy committees also would be brought into these sessions. If we are to have either a mixed Congress, after this year, or a Congress of one party and an administration of another, it is clear that any procedural improvements to smooth the relationship between the parties on matters of essential national concern should be welcomed by all. This timely reform could be the means to a modus vivendi in a period that might otherwise produce needless and costly deadlocks. The bill already has passed the Senate by a large majority. It merits approval by the House.

[From the Charleston (W. Va.) Mail of June 18, 1946]

A BARGAIN IN REFORM

The Senate, as the headlines have noted with some misplacement of emphasis, has voted itself an increase in salary. What is important about the action and what makes it well worth the price is that the Senate, in doing so, has accepted the major propositions of the La Follette bill for reform and reorganization of the Senate, designed to streamline its action and make it both a more responsive and more responsible agency of the national government.

Senator LA FOLLETTE'S bill, based on a joint Senate-House study of congressional organization, sought to reduce the Senate's 33 committees to a workable 15, to curb deficit financing by strengthening Senate supervision of appropriations, to register lobbyists and improve the liaison between Congress and the White House. It also provides for administrative assistants to Members of Congress, expert consultants for the standing committees, policy committees for both the major and minority parties and a score of other provisions set up to strengthen and simplify the legislative process.

Of Senator LA FOLLETTE'S major proposals, only one, apparently, has been seriously compromised. That was his provision for a personnel manager to supervise the selection and listing of committee personnel. A small group of Senators, largely from the South, blocked this measure as an infringement upon their patronage, and the sponsor of the bill wisely dropped it in a successful effort to insure support of its many other sound features.

A similar bill, with amendments appropriate to the Lower House, will now be introduced to the House of Representatives. There the acceptance of reform is not so certain as in the Senate, but there is at least a good chance for passage. It should be urged upon all Members.

Even with the salary increase, a pension fund, and the employments of experts and assistants, it is estimated that the cost of the measure will not be more than $12,000,000 a year, or less than the 1947 budget allows the Office of the Administrator of Civil Aeronautics. The proposed reforms would be a bargain at a much higher price.

Peace for Whom?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, recently a group of self-styled liberals held a conference in the city of Milwaukee which it called the Wisconsin Win the Peace Conference. This is the identical group that has a long record in support of every proposition advocated by Communist Russia. It has an enviable record of pulling Stalin's chestnuts out of the fire. It is safe to say that this group is concerned solely with the advancement of Communism and totalitarism in this country.

Mr. Speaker, the Milwaukee Journal on July 5, 1946, carried a timely editorial which calls the turn on this group. I insert it at this point:

"WIN THE PEACE" FOR WHOM?

It is noteworthy that when the Wisconsin Win the Peace Conference was held in Milwaukee recently, this particular group found itself, on almost every issue, opposed to the course the United States is taking in this postwar world. And it is just as significant that on practically every issue the group was in accord with the Russian policy, the American Communist policy, and the policy that is set forth daily in the Daily Worker, which is the Communist organ in this country.

Here is what some of the resolutions adopted propose: Defeat of the "free press" requirements in UNRRA appropriations; removal of Herbert Hoover as head of the emergency famine relief committee; placing of atomic energy under international control and destruction of the present stock pile of bombs; severance of relations with Franco Spain and recognition of the Spanish Government in exile; replacement of General MacArthur's present regime in Japan with "genuine Allied control under the Far East Commission of the United Nations"; opposition to military assistance for the Philippines; opposition to President Truman's program to create a system of military cooperation with South American countries; opposition to the proposed conscription and armament programs before Congress; condemnation of "the brutal British imperialist policy and Bevin's (British foreign minister) anti-Semitic remarks as a disgrace to the United Nations"; and, lastly, support of Yugoslavia's request for the return of Trieste to Marshal Tito.

Anyone who has followed international affairs will realize that these resolutions cover the range of foreign problems before the great nations today; and they will recognize immediately that on almost all of these issues the stand taken is that favored by the Russian Government and by the American Communists. They will also recognize that in most cases the stand is not that of the American Government.

Who has led the cry for the removal of Herbert Hoover but the American Reds? Who uses such phrases as "brutal British imperialist policy" but these same Communists? They have been in the forefront to demand that America destroy its stock pile of atomic bombs, that General MacArthur's powers in Japan be restricted, that Yugoslavia get Trieste.

All Americans want to win the peace, not just these few. All want an everlasting peace. But most Americans are not willing to surrender to Russia to get it. Even if they were inclined to give in, they could hardly believe that a surrender peace would be permanent.

Washington Errors Cut the Food Supply

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the crying need throughout the entire world is for food. The prevention of mass starvation is absolutely essential to the establishment of peace. After our fighting forces brought us victory, our greatest weapon for good was food. Every policy and act of government should have been directed toward the maximum production of food.

It is an established fact that the application of ammonium nitrate to the cornfields, particularly with irrigated corn, will increase the yield from 15 to 25 bushels per acre. Nitrate is being manufactured in this country, but our farmers are not getting it. It is being exported, much of it through UNRRA. Ultimately we ought to assist war-torn countries in rebuilding their soil, but that will not prevent people from starving this summer, this fall, and in the coming winter. The use in this country of this nitrate fertilizer will add to the total world food supplies and will prevent starving this fall and in the coming winter.

For some time an effort has been made to secure this fertilizer for the farmers of our State. Little results have been obtained. The following telegram from the chairman of the Nebraska Production and Marketing Administration Committee of the Department of Agriculture, located at Lincoln, Nebr., indicates the need as follows:

Twenty-two cars ammonium nitrate fertilizer allocated to distributors, who in turn allocate to individual dealers. To date, have been unable to secure additional fertilizer. Eighty additional 40-ton cars needed for irrigated sections of Nebraska.

In reference to one particular irrigated section in the counties of Gosper, Phelps, and Kearney the production and marketing administration advises me that they should have fifteen 40-ton cars of ammonium nitrate fertilizer. Although contacts have been made with countless Government agencies, to our knowledge, only four carloads have been allocated to this area. This will cut down the yield of corn materially. It means less food for a hungry world. The fertilizer that this area and other areas should have had has been exported by direction of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my remarks by including an editorial that appeared in the Nebraska Farmer of July 6, 1946:

FERTILIZER FOR EUROPE, NONE FOR US

One of the wholly inexcusable blunders at the expense of farmers and the starving peoples of foreign countries is the shut-down of many Government ammunition plants since last August. Through their huge capacity to make ammonium nitrate, a commercial fertilizer essential for maximum crop production, these plants when converted for nitrogen manufacture comprise an agency as powerful for peace as for war, now that food is so urgently needed throughout the world.

Corn growers of Nebraska and other Corn Belt States could use thousands of tons of ammonium nitrate this summer with the last cultivation of the crop, if it were available, to increase corn yields on overworked soils as much as 15 to 25 bushels per acre. Good June rains over the State's principal corn-growing territory have improved prospects for a bumper crop, if fertilizer is available for July use.

With most of the Government plants idle since the end of the war and no one very much concerned until recently about their conversion for commercial fertilizer manufacture, the supply of ammonium nitrate is limited, and 40 percent of the operating plants' production has been set aside for export to war-ravaged soils of Europe and Japan. A few weeks ago when the situation was discovered, farm organizations and other interested groups raised a furor and demanded an immediate reopening of the plants, including the Mead and Grand Island ordnance plants in Nebraska, but it was too late to produce the needed tonnage for this year's crops.

The Nebraska Farm Bureau Federation has urged the Department of Agriculture to assist in obtaining immediate release of seventy-five 40-ton cars of ammonium nitrate for the State's corn growers, pointing out that without it corn yields on thin ground and under irrigation will be cut 20 to 50 percent. While the War Department says the Grand Island plant will be in full production by July 1, all the nitrate will be exported. There seems to be a good deal of needless red tape in connection with the conversion of these plants for fertilizer manufacture and distribution of the product. It develops that the War Department has shown a sympathetic interest in the farmers' need for fertilizer, but that there has been a slip-up elsewhere in Washington, probably in the Department of Agriculture.

The use of nitrogen fertilizer on Iowa and Nebraska farms has resulted in amazing increases in yields, as much as 33 pounds of increase in grains for one pound of nitrogen applied in Iowa, and almost one bushel per acre increase in corn for every pound of nitrogen applied in Nebraska tests. The nitrogen costs about 10 cents a pound. Translated into a potential plant capacity of 500,000 tons of nitrogen fertilizer, or 1,500,000 tons of ammonium nitrate which is 33 percent nitrogen, this amount, under favorable moisture conditions, would produce as much as 16,500,000 tons of additional grain. In terms of wheat that additional grain would have provided bread for some 80,000,000 people and might have left more wheat or corn or other grain available for livestock, poultry, and dairy feeds.

We have been told repeatedly and forcefully that "food will write the peace," but food hasn't had a fair chance to fulfill that prophecy. The negligence that has kept the nitrate plants from providing the essential material for boosting food production is a bad blunder.

Test Period

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press of July 4, 1946:

TEST PERIOD

The Bureau of Labor Statistics' price index on 28 basic commodities rose 0.7 percent Tuesday, as compared with a rise of 3.6 percent Monday, the day OPA price controls became inoperative. Some prices, however, notably those on hogs and steers, declined appreciably from Monday highs.

According to the Bureau, hog price increases Monday averaged $2.80, while prices on steers rose $2.50. Tuesday the average drop on hogs was $1.30 and that on steers, 50 cents. To some extent, the net price gains represent the loss of Government subsidies which went out with price controls. In other words, costs which consumers had been paying through Government subsidies are now directly reflected in the prices on livestock.

As was to be expected, the removal of price ceilings encouraged a greatly increased movement of livestock to market. This has been true particularly of hogs—and as the result of a plentiful supply, prices already have begun to seek lower levels. There is a distinct possibility that before Congress acts finally on price control, prices on such abundant commodities as pork will have dropped to OPA price levels, if not actually below them.

For the majority of persons, however, the important thing is that meat again is rapidly finding its way to the butchers' shelves. What happened when price controls on meat were lifted was that a death blow was dealt the Nation's worst black market. There is not now, nor has there been, a meat shortage and livestock holdings are the highest in history. But a large proportion of the meat which has been reaching the dinner tables has been handled by black markets—at black market prices. We have experienced a tremendous inflation of meat prices, but it has been a hidden inflation and has been almost completely uncontrollable. Now, for the first time in months, meat and meat prices are out in the open, where they are subject to the normal controls exercised by the great mass of consumers.

In reality we presently are going through a test period in which Congress will have an unparalleled opportunity to study price trends on all the items which go to make up the cost-of-living index. At least 2 months before OPA expired, its staff was saying that if the measures it had taken to increase the available supply of meat in open markets proved unsuccessful, it would eliminate price ceilings. It is now apparent that such action should have been taken a long time ago. Similar evidence to justify the permanent abandonment of ceilings on other commodities doubtless is in the making.

All the ballyhoo to the contrary, there is no great need for haste in writing another OPA bill. Congress can reinstate controls any time it wants to—and it can make price ceilings retroactive to any date. Something undoubtedly is to be gained by using the present opportunity to test the scores of theories on price control prevalent in Washington and around every cracker barrel. Some in Congress, in fact, are inclined to take that view. Ultimately we may get new price legislation that will apply only to those items still in short supply and on which prices have soared unreasonably. That possibility, by the way, should prove a strong incentive to keep prices at moderate levels. The smart producer who would like to remain free of price restraints will avoid inviting new controls by maintaining his prices at sane levels.

What has happened and is happening in the meat situation may well be duplicated in other cases. Increased supplies of other commodities may be somewhat slower than meat in reaching the market; but as the quantity increases, initial price advances will be pared. "Hold your fire" is therefore good advice both for Congress and the consumer.

Rumania Betrayed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to comment in regard to the Rumanian newspaper which I received recently, dated March 1, 1946. It is published by the Rumanian Liberal Party, an opposition party to the present Government in Rumania. It consists of four pages.

The type on the first page has apparently been so badly mutilated after it was set that it is unreadable. Pages 3 and 4 are blank.

My recollection is that when the foreign ministers met in Moscow, Russia, it was agreed that the Rumanian people would have free speech, a free press, and free elections. My information is that our American Ambassador, Mr. Harriman, conferred with the Rumanian Premier and obtained a guaranty to that effect. On the strength of that guaranty, Great Britain and the United States recognized the present Rumanian Government.

Now it appears that such guaranty has not been fulfilled nor any attempt made to carry it out. The result is that both the Rumanian people and our Government have been deceived and misled and another scrap of paper has been added to an ever-increasing list of national duplicity and fraud.

Domination and force will be recognized as the factors compelling a freedom-loving small nation to carry out, not its own will, but the power of an imposed ideology now on the march in Europe.

A Russian army of occupation consisting of three-quarters of a million men in a country of 20,000,000 people, already devoid of essential food, is a heavy burden and prevents rehabilitation of that country and its inhabitants.

The announcement of the Atlantic Charter as a policy on the part of our Government toward small nations, that their territorial rights would be respected and that they should have a right to live under whatever form of government the people themselves should choose, met with overwhelming approval on the part of the people of the United States. Our failure to defend that policy has lowered our prestige in the world and destroyed the respect of small nations toward us.

Let other governments which seek our recognition demonstrate good faith in their commitments before we extend official recognition, in order to prevent another Rumanian spectacle.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, efforts are being made to hold prices of consumer goods in line. The necessity for the continuation of price control on many lines could and should be eliminated. Competition will take care of the increases on the price of articles in full and sufficient production.

I enclose as part of my remarks, news items from the Rocky Mountain News of Thursday, July 4, 1946, and the Denver Post of the same date:

[From the Rocky Mountain News of July 4, 1946]

DENVER FIRMS TRY HARDEST TO STOP RISE

(By Jack Foster)

The Denver merchants—the long-established wholesale and retail firms in our town—were worried.

They were worried for fear that their customers might get the idea that with the sudden end of OPA they were going to take advantage of the possibility of hiking prices.

So these heads of our food and clothing, our dry goods and appliances stores asked us newspapermen to sit in with them yesterday afternoon at a special meeting in the Chamber of Commerce Building to hear what they had to say.

WILL PLAY SQUARE WITH CUSTOMERS

And what they had to say, in effect, was this:

"We are going to do everything within our power to keep prices strictly in line. We realize that the customers are the men and women who make our businesses possible. If we took advantage of them at this critical moment, they would not be our friends any more; they would not be our customers, and our business would suffer. We are going to play squarely down the price line with them."

White-haired J. Nevin Carson of the Carson Crockery Co., was presiding. Arcund him sat the men who do 90 percent of the business in Denver in the food, retail, and variety lines.

These men ranged from the chiefs of the great department stores, to large retailers of food, to the national chain stores, to the wholesalers of food.

Came the subject of bread. R. S. McIlvaine, chief of Rainbo Bread, spoke.

PRICE OF FLOUR MAY GO DOWN

"Under the OPA, the Government paid a subsidy of $1.04 per 100 pounds on flour," he said. "That subsidy now has been removed. This means, of course, that $1.04 has been added per 100 pounds to the price of flour. But the information I get from the baking industry is that all of us are going to make every effort to pass none of this on to the consumer. As a matter of fact, I have a notion that when everything adjusts itself the price of flour actually may go down."

Came the question of meat. Everybody spoke on that, for this is the most critical item in food. It was pointed out that on finished meat there was a subsidy of 6 cents per pound, which was ended with the death of OPA.

This, it was admitted, has been passed on in a large number of cases to the consumer, and the customer has paid increased prices for fine grades of meat.

MEAT QUESTION TO LEVEL OFF

But if the public will steer clear for a while from the fine grades it was the feeling of this group that the whole meat picture will level itself off.

Then the subject of fruits—oranges, in particular. Oscar Olson, president of the Denver Retail and Growers Association, told a story.

"Under OPA price of oranges was frozen," he said. "But with the end of OPA grading has begun again. Now large oranges have gone up in price. But small oranges, which represent 90 percent of the market, have decreased $3 a box."

Then butter, and eloquently Charles Coleman, of the Red and White Stores, decried the idea that butter had sold in Denver for 95 cents a pound.

EIGHTY-FIVE-CENT BUTTER STORY UNTRUE

"I heard that story and I checked every place I knew to see whether it was true—and it just isn't true at all," he said. "Butter is not going to skyrocket."

Well, the feeling of these men was that they have a tremendous responsibility to keep the price line even to the end that they can prove their oft-repeated faith that business can operate far more successfully—to businessmen and consumer alike—if Government is completely out of the realm of private enterprise.

They passed a resolution which said:

1. We will make merchandise of honest quality available to the public as rapidly and in as large volume as the circumstances will permit.

PRICE EXPLOITATION TO BE PROHIBITED

2. We will prohibit within our own establishments any and all disposition to exploit current conditions by increasing prices beyond our cost plus over normal necessary mark-ups.

3. So long as scarcity of any line of merchandise may continue we will endeavor to distribute goods equitably among our customers.

Those who attended the meeting in addition to those mentioned were: C. A. Shinn, Denver Dry Goods Co.; Alfred Triefus, May Co.; A. R. Sonneman, Daniel's & Fisher; C. F. Beaglehole, Joslin Dry Goods Co.; William L. Hillyard, Gano-Downs; T. W. Henritze, Safeway Stores; Meyer Neusteter, of Neusteter's; W. E. Glass, Cottrell Clothing Co.; Harry Fontius, Fontius Shoe Co.; O. H. Hage, Woolworth Co.; C. J. Williams, S. H. Kress Co.; Ralph DeGidio and Joe Leyden, Miller Groceteria; E. H. Lambott, Piggly-Wiggly; Russell McNeill, South Denver Civic Association; Paul MacDowell, W. T. Grant; Homer Torrey, J. C. Penney Co.; Thomas Haugen, Montgomery Ward & Co.; Wade Hampton, Sears & Roebuck; William Reeves, Red & White; Wesley Taylor, Home Owned Stores; George Porkorny, American Furniture Co.

[From the Denver Post of July 4, 1946]

DENVER MERCHANTS TO HOLD PRICE LINE

Businessmen, representing 90 percent of the retail business in Denver, yesterday pledged themselves to "hold the line" on prices to consumers as far as it is possible to do it.

The retail businessmen, at a meeting in the Denver Chamber of Commerce auditorium, adopted a resolution setting forth their purpose and point of view.

"Because the interest of the public and business which serves that public alike demand the maintenance of a stabilized price level," the resolution read, "we freely and sincerely pledge ourselves to observe the following in the conduct of our business:

"1. We will make merchandise of honest quality available to the public as rapidly and in as large volume as the circumstances will permit.

"2. We will prohibit within our own establishment any and all disposition to exploit current conditions by increasing prices beyond our cost-plus or normal necessary mark-ups.

"3. So long as scarcity of any line of merchandise may continue, we will endeavor to distribute goods equitably among our customers."

The businessmen present at the meeting are top figures in the retail food, clothing, and consumer-goods trade in Denver. They were unanimous in their determination to make an individual and collective effort to abide by the plan outlined in the resolution.

They said some price increases on certain items were inevitable, notably on meat products, which before the President's veto of the OPA bill had been covered by Government subsidies.

Platform of American Veterans' Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER B. HUBER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I insert in the RECORD the veterans' affairs platform of the American Veterans' Committee—AVC—adopted at their recent convention at Des Moines, Iowa, June 14–16, 1946.

I have followed with interest the development of the American Veterans' Committee—AVC—which I am told is one of the largest and the fastest growing of any exclusively World War II veterans' organization. After every major war, veterans have banded together in a new organization of their own generation and their own creation. We must look to these World War II veterans for guidance as to the wants and needs of the new generation which in a few years will be assuming national leadership.

I have before me the veterans' affairs platform of the AVC. Although AVC is not asking special favors for veterans, it is conscious, as we all are, that veterans need certain assistance in the readjustment period. AVC asks for strict enforcement of veterans' seniority rights in employment without attempt to create superseniority; for extension of on-the-job training program with added vigilance against existing abuses; more adequate provision for veterans' education and training; a more liberal loan policy to veterans; and vigorous implementation of the existing housing program.

Knowing AVC's record I am sure that the membership means to carry on an honest and determined fight for this platform. AVC has already distinguished itself by speaking up for a real housing program and I am sure that it will continue this drive until the veterans who fought this war have adequate and decent housing. I am told that AVC is now working on an extensive plan to insure jobs for all veterans. It is likewise fighting to protect the veteran against inflation. I can think of no better foundation upon which a veterans' organization can found its efforts to protect and assist the veteran than this three-point program for jobs, housing, and protection of the veterans' income. I am sure that the World War II veterans as well as the people of this country appreciate AVC's dynamic program to assist the men who fought and won the last great war to preserve our opportunity to work for a better America.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

I. THE ARMED SERVICES ORGANIZATIONS

1. We favor a unified armed force sufficient for national defense and to fulfill our international commitments and responsibilities.

2. We favor extension of selective service to fulfill these military commitments until such a time as sufficient volunteers are obtained.

3. We are opposed to universal compulsory military training in time of peace.

4. The existing social and economic organization of our armed forces is inconsistent with the military needs of a democracy. We therefore urge the immediate adoption of the Doolittle report for all branches of the armed services with particular emphasis upon:

(1) Drastic revision of the court-martial system.

(2) Elimination of the "caste" system.

(3) Complete elimination of racial and religious segregation and discrimination.

(4) Increased off-duty educational opportunities.

(5) A free armed-forces press.

II. THE CITIZEN-VETERAN

1. We deem the task of rehabilitating our war casualties a sacred duty and inviolate trust. To this end:

(1) We endorse the conduct of the Veterans' Administration under Gen. Omar N. Bradley.

(2) We support outright grant of specially equipped automotive vehicles for amputees.

2. We maintain that it is both the veteran's basic need and right that he be promptly restored to the economic and social status which he would have normally reached as a civilian had he not been in the armed services. The achievement of economic security through sound economic planning as citizens rather than special grant or favor as veterans is basic AVC philosophy. To expedite the achievement of this goal and this philosophy we urge:

(1) Strict enforcement of veteran's seniority rights in employment granted by law without attempt to create superseniority.

(2) Extension of the on-the-job training program with added vigilance against existing abuses.

(3) Immediate grant of retroactive terminal leave pay for enlisted men.

(4) Abolition of the distinction between officers and enlisted men in the grant of retirement pay for service-connected disabilities.

(5) More adequate provision for veterans' education and training.

(6) Modification of existing pension policies to emphasize retraining and reeducation as the most vital force in rehabilitation.

(7) Liberalization of procedures and terms for loans to veterans for the purchase of homes and the establishment of businesses.

(8) Federalization of the USES with effective job placement.

(9) Vigorous implementation of existing housing programs and an investigation of surplus property disposal operations with particular respect to veterans' priorities.

The British Loan and the Welfare of the American People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, it is good to have views of a real American and a war veteran on American ideals and the things affecting the welfare of our country. It is my privilege to insert here a letter received from the little town of Sagle, located in the rugged mountain section of the Idaho Panhandle—a timbered country where, in recent years, the pioneers have gone in and cleared away the forest and hewed farms and homes out of the stumps and cut-over lands of north Idaho. Hardy pioneers and real Americans everyone, I commend this record of the experiences and the ideals expressed by this veteran who fought in the south Pacific for the thoughtful consideration of my colleagues.

In passing, I may add that from my studies of money and the past history of British money and trade manipulation to their advantage and our disadvantage over the years, I cannot see how anyone with the best interest of this country at heart can vote for the British loan. The letter follows:

SAGLE, IDAHO, July 4, 1946.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE.

DEAR MR. WHITE: On this day, the 4th of July, I can't help but think and so I am going to try and express to you the way I feel.

You may think from my letter that I am a little bitter, and I may be at that. When I look back on the 2 years of my life I spent in the jungles of the south Pacific, and all the boys (American boys) that are staying over there for good, never to return home. At this time to see our Government in Washington worry so much more about all the rest of the world than it does about its people here at home.

If it isn't food for the Germans, Italians, and Japs, who today seem so greatly to deserve everything their heart desires, now that they are beaten and have quit killing off our boys, it is to grant billions of its people's money to the peoples of the world, while our many troubles at home get so little attention.

It may be possible for England's diplomats to make our Government believe they are democratic, but if our officials had spent time as I did in British-dominated islands, they could not be fooled.

Mr. WHITE, in this country of ours, if one of its people borrow money from the Government it takes a mortgage on everything you own, and if you default, well, your credit is ruined. The British as you recall, borrowed a lot of money from us after the other war and, as I remember, Congress passed a law against making further loans to countries that refused to pay us back. But, oh, how easy the people's representatives in Washington forget such things as long as it is not their own money.

I believe that if you talked to most of the veterans, you would find they feel just as I do. I cannot help but feel that Congress is more concerned with Europe's troubles than with America's.

Mr. WHITE, I do hope you vote against the loan to Britain as I think a lot of you both as a man and a Representative. But I will never again be able to vote for or support anyone who thinks that we must give our money as well as food and materials so that the world can call us damn fools and crooks as they have done in the past. From now on, I am 100 percent for Americans in America.

My motto would keep America strong by keeping our money and materials at home so we will be able to defend ourselves if and when the next great conflict comes.

May we all hope on this 4th of July 1946 that our people and Government may remember that our men died in this war to keep America strong and free; not to shackle us to England or any other country, as I believe that would bring us only further grief.

Yours truly,

HARVEY SIMON.

The Livestock Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SID SIMPSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following summary of the livestock situation for the week ending July 6, 1946, as reported by the St. Louis Livestock Exchange, National Stockyards, Ill.:

Combined receipts (in round numbers) at 12 markets, compiled by U. S. Department of Agriculture

Cattle and calves:
This week	179,000
Last week	177,000
Year ago	184,000
Hogs:
This week	284,000
Last week	67,000
Year ago	140,000
Sheep:
This week	36,000
Last week	248,000
Year ago	133,000

The markets covered are: East St. Louis, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Paul, Sioux City, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Denver, Oklahoma City, and Fort Worth.

The first peacetime Independence Day since 1941 also saw the United States free of Government price control for the first time since early in 1942. Due to shortage of supplies, livestock prices had been glued to OPA ceilings for many months and the natural reaction was toward higher prices on the markets. During the week, record prices were paid for choice steers and, at National Stockyards, a load averaging 1,210 pounds brought $22. Of particular interest to the trade was the restraint practiced by most big packers, whose bids were at or close to OPA levels.

Along with OPA's demise went the controversial compliance program; thus, Government grading is no longer compulsory, but by choice, as originally planned. Slaughter controls, with the exception of regulation of noninspected slaughterers, are also off. Another dead issue is the payment of all subsidies. Under OPA, slaughterers could claim as much as $3.40 per hundredweight on choice steers; at the $17.90 ceiling, the actual price of such kinds was $21.30. Adding to this figure the 50 cents per hundredweight feeder subsidy brings the price up to $21.80, and comparing this total to the $22.00 top paid here, it would seem that the charge of skyrocket prices is hardly justified.

In discussing consumer prices, most uninformed sources mention only over-the-counter prices and if reference is made to subsidies, it is said that "Government pays the subsidy." As Government of itself originates no money, everything paid out by Government must, in turn, be paid to Government by the taxpayer-consumer. In the final analysis, it is the consumer who pays the over-the-counter price and the subsidies, although not reflected in the retail prices, do show up in tax bills paid by practically every consumer. It would seem, therefore, that with the exception of wage earners whose exemptions permit them freedom from withholding tax, the average consumer has no relief from repayment to Government of the subsidies.

The following table may be of use in comparing prices paid for livestock during this OPA-less week with the totals of the week immediately preceding, under OPA controls:

Subsidies paid by the Government (taxpayers):

TO PACKERS (LIVE WEIGHT BASIS)

On cattle grading AA (choice beef), $3 per hundredweight.

On cattle grading A (good beef), $2.95 per hundredweight.

On cattle grading B (commercial beef), $1.90 per hundredweight.

All other cattle (canners, cutters, utility, and culls), $1.25 per hundredweight.

(Nonprocessing packers, in addition to the above subsidies, received a 40-cent per hundred-weight extra payment. If a packer fed his own cattle and could qualify, he also was entitled to the 50-cent per hundredweight feeder subsidy.)

On hogs, Federal inspection, $1.70 per hundredweight.

On calves, $1.10 per hundredweight.

(In addition to subsidies paid direct to packers, feeders also received 50 cents per hundredweight on qualified cattle; $2 to $2.65 on lambs, and $1 per hundredweight on sheep.)

Hogs, therefore, under OPA, cost $16.50, National Stockyards basis ($14.80 ceiling, plus $1.70 subsidy). Practical hog top on Friday of this week, $16.50. Lamb top here on June 28, with OPA controls, $15.50. Adding the $2.65 feeder subsidy brings the total up to $18.15. The top of $18 paid this week for lambs is therefore 15 cents per hundredweight lower than the previous week.

Under OPA, the situation in the sheep market differed from that in the cattle and hog departments. No ceilings or floors had been imposed on the live animals but ceilings on the meat from sheep and lambs had been in effect since 1942. Ceiling on lamb and mutton was imposed in August 1942, when the top for live lambs here was $14.75. Along with other meats, the ceiling was rolled back 10 percent in June 1943, and a compensating subsidy of 95 cents per hundredweight was given to slaughterers, which was withdrawn August 5, 1945, when the subsidy was granted to feeders of sheep and lambs.

In spite of Federal controls on meat, the price of live lambs by February 1943 had advanced to a $17 top, the highest since 1929. Simultaneously with the feeder subsidy announcement in July last year, our lamb top dropped to under $15 and after 4 weeks of operation, the trade reported that the drop in lamb prices had entirely offset the Government subsidy. By April of this year the market had recovered to the 1945 peak of $17 and adding the $3.15 subsidy gave the feeder a net return of $20.15 for his lambs over 90 pounds.

Chester Bowles Squawks on Terminal Leave as Inflationary, but Favors Inflationary British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, discussing inflation, Mr. Bowles, in the New York Times, on July 7 declares:

Handle veterans' terminal leave pay with care. * * * I believe that the estimated amount of $6,000,000,000 which would be dumped into the economy by the legislation now before Congress would have grave repercussions at this time.

As a practical alternative, terminal-leave pay could be issued in the form of script which the veteran could cash at some later time when inflationary pressures have subsided. The delay in payment might create hardship for some veterans. But I think we would find that most would favor payment in an orderly fashion which would help insure that a dollar of terminal-leave pay would still be worth a dollar.

Mr. Bowles thinks a hand-out now to veterans would be inflationary.

But is he worried about the inflationary consequences of the proposed $4,000,000,000 hand-out to Great Britain?

No! That hand-out will be all right, wrote Mr. Bowles to Mr. Clayton, back on March 8.

Said Mr. Bowles about the hand-out to Britain:

It is of course clear that our foreign lending program will result in increased demand for certain American commodities. I do not see, however, any reason why this should have any significant effect upon prices. It may have the effect of placing some additional strain upon enforcement of ceilings in cases where there is a compliance problem.

What has Mr. Bowles said in the foregoing sentences? Although he has used the language that conceals instead of reveals, the meaning is not hard to discover.

It is this: The British loan and other hand-outs will make the shortages in America worse. Because of that, more ruthless regimentation will be needed to force the American consumer to go without the things he wants and needs.

The answer—the compliance problem—created by the British loan demand—is a stronger and more ruthless OPA gestapo. That is the plain meaning of Mr. Bowles' letter on the British loan.

But when a similar gigantic addition to domestic purchasing pressures—a sly way of dismissing the existing inflation—is contemplated for a group of veterans, Mr. Bowles says, in effect, "wait awhile."

Mr. Bowles says further:

There is no doubt that the foreign lending program will add somewhat to these inflationary pressures, but the addition will be small relative to the inflationary pressures already created by domestic forces.

But when Mr. Bowles applies the foregoing yardstick to terminal leave, he is afraid of "grave repercussions."

In other words, Mr. Bowles thinks it not dangerous to give Britain four billion inflationary dollars, but very dangerous to give them to our veterans.

He fails to mention that the veterans' hand-out would be much less inflationary than the British loan, because the dollars in the hands of veterans would not result in an export drain of our resources in a time of disturbing shortage.

Another sentence from Bowles' letter on the British hand-out demonstrates the questionable nature of his claim that OPA desires to end its regimentation. He says:

An action which would increase excess demand for a commodity subject to price ceilings need not have any effect upon its actual price at all.

The meaning of this assertion needs to be clearly understood. Bowles indicates that it is perfectly okay for Government to deliberately create shortages by foreign commitments—and then to ruthlessly regiment the American people to carry out those promises abroad.

Members who, like Mr. Bowles, desire to see the American people burdened and shackled indefinitely should follow Mr. Bowles and vote for the British gift.

Economic Benefits of River Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article by Mrs. Marcella Allen, secretary-treasurer, Nebraska Reclamation Association, which was published in a recent issue of the Irrigation Farmer at Holdrege, Nebr.:

ECONOMIC BENEFITS OF RIVER DEVELOPMENT—WITH UNITED STATES ECONOMY GEARED TO PROPOSITION OF PLENTY, RIVER VALLEYS MUST BE DEVELOPED IF NATION IS TO SURVIVE

(By Marcella Allen, secretary-treasurer, Nebraska Reclamation Association)

Recent press releases disclose that House Appropriations Committee has recommended an unprecedented slash of nearly 50 percent in the budget for the Interior Department. The Reclamation Bureau asked for an appropriation of $23,783,000 for the initial stages of the Missouri River Basin development. The committee recommended only $10,312,685.

The hearings in the Senate Committee on Appropriations began May 16, and lasted several days. At this writing we do not know what they may be able to salvage from that wreckage of the plans for the West.

When the debate was being held in the House Appropriations Committee, some Congressmen attempted to show that the Bureau was given all of the money that it asked for. What actually happened was that they submitted a second budget, under duress, and which was submitted with the following statement:

"The effect of any such drastic reduction, which would be contrary to the recommendations of the Executive agencies, would be disastrous to the program for this development of the West, disruptive to the President's fiscal program, and to the Bureau of Reclamation's programs, and would jeopardize the Bureau's plans for compliance with the repayment requirements of the reclamation law, inasmuch as all of these projects would be left to some smaller degree in a non-income-producing category until further congressional action repaired the damage. Such action would also wreck the integrated program of veterans' employment in reclamation construction and veterans' settlement upon the newly irrigated lands that the construction program as it was presented to you by the President would provide."

The action of this committee makes us wonder if these men know what is at stake. In the hope that some of this information is unknown to them and will reach them, this month our association will devote the space so kindly furnished to us by the irrigation farmer to setting down a few benefits to be gained by the development of this Missouri River Valley.

There are a number of plans offered for the development of this often-styled "Golden River." There have been plans for many years. The ones which are most frequently now mentioned are the Pick plan, the Sloan plan, Missouri Valley Authority, a Missouri Valley Cooperative, and the Ickes plan.

Of the recent plans to be offered, the first to be presented to Congress was that of Brig. Gen. Lewis A. Pick, then Colonel Pick, division engineer of Missouri River division. His report was offered and approved by Congress in August of 1943. Since the time of George Washington the Army engineers have been entrusted with flood control and navigation.

Although the Pick plan proposed multiple-purpose projects, the Bureau of Reclamation, entrusted with irrigation and reclamation, promptly proposed a substitute plan. This plan was called the Sloan plan, after the Bureau of Reclamation engineer, W. G. Sloan. This plan also was for multiple-purpose projects, with emphasis on irrigation, however, and less on navigation. This was submitted in April 1944, and is known as Senate Document No. 191.

Ultimately, the two Departments, War and Interior, got together, and the combination of the plans, called the Pick-Sloan plan, was authorized in the Flood Control Act of December 22, 1944. These plans deal mainly with the construction of the projects, although planning to use some Federal agency already in existence for the operation.

The Missouri Valley Authority (bill S. 555), introduced by Senator MURRAY of Montana, proposed both construction and operation by a new Federal agency. This bill is in retirement at present at the request of its introduced, although there is another "authority" bill before the House now, for the Columbia River.

The Missouri Valley Cooperative plan was offered by State Senator C. Petrus Peterson, now president of the Nebraska Reclamation Association, before the first annual meeting of that organization, January 20, 1945. This plan deals with the operation of the projects after they are completed and offers a system for area home rule. This idea seems to have found some favor with the present Secretary of the Interior, J. A. Krug, judging from some of his recent statements as reported in the press.

The Ickes plan, presented by the Department of Interior by the former Secretary, Harold Ickes, is almost an exact replica of the Missouri Valley Authority bill, except that all operational authority would rest in the Department of Interior.

It is the opinion of many of us that too much attention has been given to the strife between departments and personalities and not enough to the benefits that will accrue from the development of the Missouri Valley. So obscure is the thinking of most people on this latter item, that they play with the idea that we can take the development or leave it alone, that it will simply boost the prosperity of the area but that we could get along without it.

Let us get this one straight: We must develop the Missouri Valley and a number of the other valleys, if we are to survive as a nation. Our Nation, our economy, is geared to the proposition of plenty. Even our freight rates are geared to the same tune, that of plenty. That is why, when food is short, the industrial East is the first to suffer. If when food is short, and it will soon be so nationally, as well as internationally, we residents of the valley will not be the ones who will suffer. It will be the industrial East, as they are doing right now. They have had no butter for months, canned goods are short, and there is a certain cosmic justice in this situation. When our eastern Representatives realize this, they will urge appropriations for the West.

The largest valley area to be developed is the Missouri. It is one-sixth the area of the continental United States. It contains but 7,000,000 people, or about one-twentieth of the population. The river runs through 10 States, with Nebraska alone lying entirely within the Missouri Basin. The river is 2,475 miles long and extends from Three Forks, Mont., to St. Louis, Mo., and takes in every problem known to man and rivers. It is the second longest river in the United States and almost four times as long as the Tennessee River. This area is part of the Louisiana Purchase of 1803, which originally cost $15,000,000.

The area to be watered is 5,000,000 acres, a greater acreage than New Jersey. Of this, 1,000,000 are in Nebraska alone. This is by surface irrigation, and our geologists say, if this is done, we can irrigate another 1,000,000 acres by underground water here in Nebraska. This one item alone shows how the benefits pyramid.

Estimates vary as to the amount of water to be stored, from 63,000,000 acre-feet to 110,000,000, depending on who is giving the figures. We have to remember that these plans are very new and subject to a lot of change. By way of comparison we can think of the Kingsley Reservoir, with a maximum capacity of 2,000,000 acre-feet, which so far has never held more than one and one-third million acre-feet.

At present the plan is to build 20 power plants with an annual capacity of from two to ten billion kilowatts, also depending on who is giving the figure. The latter figure is that of General Pick, who says that will be secondary power to a great extent. Even so, there will be an enormous amount of primary power. It will be used, make no mistake.

Here in Nebraska, the hydro managers anticipated a 15-percent drop in the use of power after the war was over. Instead of that we used 5 percent more than ever, and the REA can't begin to satisfy the number on the waiting lists. Slashing of the funds from the transmisison lines isn't going to help the situation much.

Nineteen more communities will be provided with safe water supplies, and the integrated projects themselves will insure the preservation of sanitation of our streams more than hit-and-miss development. Add to this the factor that we are conscious that it should be preserved.

Included in the plans now in operation on the Missouri is the preservation of fish and wildlife by the maintenance of constant water levels in spawning areas. Here in Nebraska we have nearly lost our fish from a number of factors and our fur business is not to be laughed off, a tidy $1,000,000 per year.

On the other side of the page, the Missouri River averages $18,500,000 of damage annually, and in 1934–44 did over $50,000,000 worth. It inundated 4,500,000 acres of land in that last spree. Ironically, in the same valley we dry out regularly and at some season of each crop year we lose portions of our potential yields from drought. We also lose population, one of our greatest assets, all the time. Local businesses and municipalities spend $20,000,000 annually to control these waters. That does not include Federal spending.

The cost of this development is estimated to be $1,400,000,000, of which three-fifths will be by the Bureau of Reclamation. At least that was what the original plans called for. As it now stands, the Army asked and received their full budget requirements of $40,000,000 and the Bureau got their budget slashed more than half. What the Senate may be able to salvage is open to speculation.

I mentioned that we are losing population. More than 200,000 left the valley area between 1930–40, the drought years. But that is not all, for 9.7 percent left from 1940–43, in spite of the war industries in a few cities. Moreover, the Veterans' Administration say that only about half of the soldiers from the farm are going back to the farm, and why should they, until we as a Nation make it profitable and livable on those farms. Here in Nebraska, Scottsbluff County gained 405 percent in population between 1910–40, and the tricounty area is showing the first gain since 1900. These are the only irrigated areas.

This is another factor that should interest the industrial areas. If life is not made tenable in agriculture, these areas are going without food.

Every acre of land irrigated supplements from 3 to 4 acres of grazing land. In the Missouri Valley alone this means at least 20,000,000 acres. If and when we have another drought, this means the salvation of our herds. More food for industry. And we shall certainly have another drought. The records arrived at for over 400 years prove this conclusively. I shudder to think what would happen to our own Nation and to the world if we were so unfortunate as to have one this year, or next.

Every family on the farm needs one family in the local town and another in industry. Every dollar of farm income becomes $7 in trade, and every dollar spent on irrigation alone returns $30. This brings commercial benefits, schools, roads, medical services, churches, civic improvements, and public utilities, such as light and electric energy to lighten the back-breaking tasks of the farm. The fertilizer plants that are possible will help in regaining and maintaining the soil under irrigation.

Three-fourths of the farmer's income goes into trade channels, and the total benefits average about 2½ to 1 for every dollar spent on the projects as a whole. Yet when appropriations are mentioned one would think the West was asking for charity.

As a matter of fact, $1,246,000,000 was spent on relief alone in the valley during the drought and depression years. This was almost enough to build these projects. Just another case of poor planning. If we have our valleys developed we will not be the financial drain on the eastern economy for relief, roads, schools, health, and the numerous other Federal aids that we in the West receive.

In considering trimming of these appropriations, our committees should consider that this valley raises one-half of the bread for the Nation, one-1 .th of the butter, one-sixth of the pork, one-fifth of the beef, one-fourth of the mutton, and one-third of the wool. Nebraska alone makes twice as much butter as New York and New Jersey, and twice as much as all six of the New England States. This might explain wh we have butter, meat, wheat, and canned food while they do not. These items are short now, so why should shippers pay the freight to those areas, when they can sell it close to home?

These are world prob.ems. One-third of the earth's land surface has less than 10 inches of rain. Another third has between 10 and 20 inches of rain. Another third has more than 20. Nebraska averages from 10 to 27 inches of rain from one State border to the other.

It is perfectly obvious if we are to expand our food-production capacity, we must irrigate, and save what land we can. This expansion is urgent because our own population (while better fed than other nations, has never been well fed on the whole) is expanding so rapidly we shall need this added production by the time the European and Asiatic food crises are somewhat alleviated.

It is true that gold mines pan out, oil wells go dry, but land and water can last forever. Power is practically inexhaustible, except where siltage is a too-great problem. But our individual increase of wealth is not the way to attack this problem. We must show the industrial Representatives who are in the Congress that it is to their benefit to vote these appropriations, and to do it at once, before somebody, namely, their constituents, gets hurt.

Land O' Lakes Creameries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the June 1946 issue of the magazine Country Gentleman contains a very interesting and informative article entitled "They Sell a Billion Pounds of Milk a Year," by Arnold Nicholson. The article describes the operation of the Land O' Lakes Creameries, the world's largest dairy cooperative. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THEY SELL A BILLION POUNDS OF MILK A YEAR—FARMER CONTROL AND PROMOTION OF QUALITY FROM COW TO CONSUMER IS THE WAY LAND O' LAKES BECAME THE WORLD'S LARGEST DAIRY COOPERATIVE

(By Arnold Nicholson)

Land O' Lakes Creameries, Inc., began with a college professor's idea, and the courage of a few farmers who were willing to band together to try it out. This month, on its twenty-fifth birthday, Land O' Lakes is the largest dairy marketing co-op in the world, the joint enterprise of 110,000 farmer patrons, working through 408 member creameries, selling $81,000,000 worth of products a year.

The co-op is truly big business—pouring trainloads of milk, cream, butter, cheese, eggs, and poultry into the national market place through channels it has created and maintains. It has performed one of the outstanding selling jobs of recent years, improving the quality of dairy products for the benefit of producer and consumer alike. It is a shining example of the workings of free enterprise cooperatively owned.

The accomplishments of Land O' Lakes—the list of "firsts" and "biggests"—could go on for the balance of this story. A more realistic picture of the organization, however, can be had by looking at the co-op through the eyes of those it supports and serves.

Take, for instance, the Ness family, pictured on this page. To Charles Ness, who has been a patron of Land O' Lakes from the first and who is today an officer of one of the member creameries, the co-op has been the principal source of income from his farm for a generation. The Litchfield Creamery Co., of which he is secretary, was in on the birth of Land O' Lakes as the Minnesota Cooperative Creamery Association, on June 7, 1921. More than 300 local creameries got together that day at the call of the newly created Minnesota Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Ness, who has farmed 240 acres a few miles south of Litchfield since 1910, had joined his neighbors in cooperative marketing long before Land O' Lakes was formed, following the philosophy that far-seeing T. L. Haecker, head of the University of Minnesota's dairy school, had spread through the State in the 1890's. Litchfield and other local creameries confined their activities to butter making, selling on distant markets through commission men in small lots and often at a disadvantage. In those days Charley Ness and his five nearest neighbors took turns loading milk cans on their wagons for the slow, jolting haul to town.

Then, just prior to 1921, the Litchfield plant tried pooling butter shipments with other co-op creameries in the county. They were fighting for their lives against the so-called centralizer system—the buyers of cream and makers of butter who had markets the local co-ops couldn't reach. The farm cream separator had arrived, and with it the model T. Wagon hauls of whole milk gave way to a cream can thumping floor boards in the back of the family car.

The association—later to be renamed Land O' Lakes—began as a State-wide organization to succeed and further the work of the county co-op pools. Litchfield became the nucleus for Land O' Lakes district No. 1—the pooling point for a score or more of little co-op creameries. A. J. McGuire, who had been extension dairyman at the university in St. Paul, and was the first general manager of the association, came preaching the advantage of pool shipments, and the need for butter quality. Farm cream coolers were sold up and down the countryside.

Another farmer from Litchfield, John Brandt, became president of the big central co-op. Brandt believed in farmer-owned trade names, in advertising, in going all the way to market with co-op products. The farmer directors of the association, with these goals in mind, financed a national contest to find a name for the association's quality butter. Land O' Lakes was chosen, and in 1926 became the association name. The drives for better, sweeter cream from the farm, strict supervision of the local creamery, and contests for high-score butter became a source of pride, as well as dollars, to the Ness family when they learned that Land O' Lakes quality was being advertised, not only by the co-op but by local merchants, from the Atlantic coast to places as far away as Shanghai, China. President Brandt saw to it that Charles Ness and every other farmer patron in the Dakotas, in Minnesota, northern Iowa, and Wisconsin got the good news, and bad, about their joint venture in a monthly publication, in frequent district and local meetings. Today a morning news broadcast, 6 days a week over a network of stations, supplements the contact between patrons and headquarters at Minneapolis.

In the thirties Charley Ness' deliveries to the creamery underwent another change. District No. 1, at Litchfield, installed the first spray drier built in Minnesota. It pioneered in drying buttermilk from Litchfield and other creameries for human consumption. When the war came farm cream cans had given way to daily shipments of whole milk from the farm. Mr. Ness uses his separator only 1 month in the year now—when his pigs are weaned. A huge lend-lease spray drying plant was built at Litchfield. It is one of 9 operated by Land O' Lakes during the war, now under option for purchase by the co-op to supplement the 21 drying plants already owned.

Every morning trucks from the Litchfield creamery drive down the Ness farm lane and pick up his cans of milk, waiting in the electric cooling tank in the milk house outside the barn. They go to the creamery just across the street from the big district 1 processing plant in Litchfield. More often than not, Charley Ness' milk is piped directly to the big plant after testing and weighing. Or it may be separated, with the cream becoming butter and the skim going to the district plant. The butter, in 60-pound packages that replaced tubs during the war, then travels to the Land O' Lakes print room in Minneapolis for retail packaging.

District 1 is Litchfield's biggest enterprise. Spray and roller driers, milk condensers and evaporators, fill two buildings. A third is headquarters for a retail milk-bottling and ice-cream-manufacturing plant that serves the town. Busiest of all structures is one with many additions which houses the district offices, a locker plant with complete processing facilities, an egg receiving and grading station, a poultry-dressing plant, and a warehouse for distribution of Land O' Lakes feed and farm supplies.

This is headquarters for Mrs. Ness. The eggs from her farm flock are delivered there; she takes home Land O' Lakes own brand of concentrate to feed her hens. The locker plant has ended messy, back-breaking butchering days on the Ness farm. A hog or a steer loaded in the pick-up, delivered to the locker plant, comes back as lard, as roasts, as steaks, or ground meat all ready to cook whenever needed—and the cost is only locker rental plus a cent a pound.

Litchfield is processing and freezing headquarters for about a third of the 23 local creameries that belong to district 1. These creameries have installed lockers for storage only and others plan to do the same as soon as equipment is available and the processing room at Litchfield can be enlarged. The local creameries, since the war, have been little more than receiving stations for whole milk, and the locker business expands their service for patrons. This pattern has begun in many of Land O' Lakes districts. Central processing and freezing plants go hand-in-hand with Land O' Lakes growing frozen egg business, and in time may result in a frozen poultry deal.

Dressed poultry is important to the co-op. More than 13,000,000 pounds were sold last year, reaching market through five plants similar to that at Litchfield. Thirteen million dozen eggs also were handled. Turkeys are a Land O' Lakes specialty. None were raised by the Ness family, but the neighbors sold over a million pounds which were dressed at Litchfield.

Land O' Lakes field service, with headquarters in Minneapolis, is available in the poultry operation. A laboratory on wheels travels from farm to farm—principally those where hatching eggs are produced—blood-testing and advising on sanitation, housing and feeding problems. Six co-op hatcheries turn out 1,500,000 chicks and poults each year.

Field service in dairy production—Land O' Lakes has 21 men for this work—is generally confined to the level of creameries and district plants. Farmer patrons, except when they have special problems, are helped at frequent local creamery meetings, where field men often have county agents and State extension workers on hand to join in discussions of quality.

Quality is a Land O' Lakes watchword, and it begins on every patron's farm. When Charley Ness and his neighbors transact their business at Litchfield they have to walk by a model milkhouse erected at a front corner of the district headquarters building. Plans for the structure are available from the co-op, and hundreds have been built, just as thousands of cream cooling tanks were installed in earlier years.

One of the basic and difficult decisions by the co-op leaders in the twenties was the organization of patrons and member creameries to produce sweet cream butter of 93 score or better. There was no precedent for this large-scale up-grading, which involved tens of thousands of farm producers, hundreds of creameries and a brand-new Federal-State inspection system. The result, by 1930, was a new standard of butter quality for consumers, and Land O' Lakes' move all the way to market. Instead of selling through jobbers and commission men, the co-op established branch offices and warehouses and sold butter direct to retail outlets.

The quality emphasis has continued as Land O' Lakes expanded into the egg and poultry business, into cheese, into dried, condensed, and evaporated milk. Now that whole milk receipts are the rule instead of the exception some Land O' Lakes creameries are paying price differentials for top grade. Co-op officers, sensitive to present demands for condensed and dried milk, frozen and plastic cream, much of it for reconstitution and resale by dairymen elsewhere, see the day coming when Land O' Lakes will have a farm milk inspection service and creameries will maintain receiving rooms for two grades of milk.

The pattern for the future of Land O' Lakes was set during the war, as John Brandt sees it. The co-op then patriotically went all the way in the production of dried whole milk. Estimates are that a twelfth of America's production came from Land O' Lakes-operated plants—the largest single producer in the world. Co-op production of all milk powder was 120,000,000 pounds in 1945.

"We launched a new enterprise," President Brandt says, "in which all the values of milk as food—not alone the butterfat—are to be realized and our reputation for quality, whatever the final product, will be emphasized. Twenty years ago 90 percent of our creameries were selling buttermilk for hog feed. We now know that it's not economical to put milk solids through a pig or a calf. All of the milk that each patron produces has a better use, somewhere, somehow, and we're equipping ourselves to find it. I can see the day coming when, for instance, our central plants will do in one process the work that it takes numerous steps to accomplish today. Milk will flow in, and the butter out here, while the solids, in their ultimate salable form, come out elsewhere."

The farmer directors associated with John Brandt in the management of their business are ready for that day—as they have been quick to meet every change that has come in the past. For example, during the continuing shortage of butter due to the Government-enforced price structure, they have spent generously for advertising to consumers to keep the Land O' Lakes name bright, even though there has not been enough of the product to go around. This campaign has won national recognition and awards for the dairy farmers who sponsored it to protect their $8,500,000 investment in cooperative business.

Land O' Lakes, in March of this year, held a 3-day silver jubilee at Minneapolis headquarters. Thousands of patrons attended, and heard Dr. W. C. Coffey, president emeritus of the University of Minnesota and longtime dean of the college of agriculture, estimate their accomplishment in terms other than dollars.

"Through fostering the spirit of cooperation and securing greater profits from dairy herds," Dean Coffey remarked, "Land O' Lakes has bettered social conditions, contributed to community solidarity, encouraged better farming on a permanent basis, and added to the security and dignity of farmers and their families."

Meat Subsidies

REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, first reports from the 12 big livestock terminals this morning disclose the receipt of a big run of cattle amounting to 100,000 head. Most early sales on fat steers, good choice, running $18.50 to $21.50; a few extra-choice corn-fed reached a top of $22.50. Good choice hogs were bringing $16.50 to $16.75, with the market considerably lower on hogs weighing over 250.

When one takes into account a subsidy of $3 on the $16.50 to $16.75 choice steers, and a subsidy on live hogs of $1.70 per hundred, one can readily see that the livestock market is only a little higher when the subsidies are added to the June 30 OPA prices and is behaving well under the old law of supply and demand.

The important point I want to bring out is that the people are beginning to get meat for the first time in any reasonable quantities during the past 60 days. Furthermore, the people now are paying for their meat without the Government paying a part of it and charging it to the national debt.

I went to considerable trouble this morning to get from the OPA and the Department of Agriculture prices on certain commodities as of June 30, the last day of OPA control, showing the amount of subsidies that were figured in those prices. These figures are based on St. Louis prices in the center of the Nation, as of June 30, and show how much the people were chiseling on the Federal Government, which was to help pay a part of their grocery bill. Yes, to show how the people have been deceived by OPA in attempting to cover up price raises which all the people must yet have to pay in taxes running into billions of dollars.

	Prices as of June 30, 1946	Subsidy as of June 30, 1946
	Cents	Cents
Milk, quart, delivered	16½	1.5
Butter	67	14.58
Round steak	41	9
Pork chops	37½	8
Leg of lamb	40½	8

The housewife, who on June 30, 1946, paid 67 cents for a pound of butter, if she could get it, and generally she could not, had 14½ cents charged to the Federal Government in taxes which she later will have to help pay. When she bought round steak at 41 cents per pound—if she could get it—she charged 9 cents to the Government which she will later have to help pay. When she paid 37½ cents for pork chops—if she could get them—she charged 8 cents to the Federal Government. When she paid 40½ cents for leg of lamb—if she could get it—she charged 8 cents to the Federal Government.

Over 100,000,000 people during this OPA deception were only paying a part of their grocery bills. The unfortunate part of it is that the most of them did not know or realize that later they would be taxed to pay the remainder of their grocery bill which was charged in subsidies.

Naturally, those in the big cities like Detroit, Chicago, New York, who have insisted on a wage raise of 25 percent want to force the remainder of the people who do not receive these high wages to help pay these subsidies at the expense of the Federal Government. That is the reason why the heads of these labor organizations in big cities insisted that President Truman veto the price control bill which provided for speedily retiring subsidies. We got along pretty well in this country without this shell game of bookkeeping and deceiving the American people in the past. Now that the war is over we should quit charging a part of the grocery bills of the people of this country to the Federal Treasury.

We should stop this deception of subsidies so the average American, when he walks into a grocery store and pays a certain price for an article, knows that he will not have to pay for this article through taxes again.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include two editorials on the British loan which seem to me to express why the passage of the loan is important to our national self-interest:

[From the New York World-Telegram of July 6, 1946]

OUR FOREIGN POLICY

The United States did not have a firm foreign policy during the war. All other considerations were subordinated to the single idea of winning the war, which to most of us meant the defeat of Germany, Italy, and Japan.

Their defeat was accomplished. But victory has brought neither security nor peace.

By the bad deals we made at Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam we built up Russia to the point where today totalitarianism is as much of a threat to civilization as it was in 1938.

We have been in process of formulating a foreign policy the last few months, throwing the pieces together almost on the run. But we will kick the principal prop right out from under that embryo policy if the House of Representatives votes against the British loan, as it seems politically tempted to do.

We are holding the bag anyway. But we will be holding it alone if we refuse the loan.

The loan is essential to British recovery. If it is voted down, we will have isolated ourselves from at least one strong friend.

In the present chaotic state of world affairs that would be the course of folly.

Great Britain needed our help in 1942. It may be the other way around the next time. In any event, we have too much of the world's wealth to stand alone. We have disbanded our Army and Navy, and grounded our Air Force. If now we let our best friend down we will be wide open for a sucker punch. Weakness invites attack.

War is waste, and we have wasted a lot of money since the end of the war in pursuit of a will-o'-the-wisp security. We can well afford to invest a little more in sound insurance.

[From the Stamford Advocate of July 5, 1946]

THE LOAN IN JEOPARDY

There is danger that the bill providing for a loan to Great Britain will be defeated. After prolonged deliberations it was passed by the Senate; and it has been recommended by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. Only a few weeks ago, its enactment into law seemed assured. But a highly offensive statement of Mr. Bevin has exercised a profound effect on sentiment in the House; and many Members whose support had been counted on have shifted to the opposition. So fearful is the administration of the present outlook that a pretext was found to postpone until next week the debate previously set for today.

It would be little short of a calamity should the British loan fail of approval. In a very real sense it is the cornerstone of our policy of international economic reconstruction. Unless the credit is granted, the enormous effort we have devoted to laying the foundations for flourishing multilateral trade would prove wasted. The fund and the bank provided for in the Bretton Woods Agreements Act would labor under an insuperable handicap. Great Britain would be forced to seek shelter in a new economic nationalism within the framework of the sterling area and the Empire. Our objective of full employment at home in the midst of a world of expanding trade would remain unrealized.

The economic arguments for the British loan have been frequently stated. At the end of a prolonged negotiation, President Truman summed the matter up as follows: "Both sides have been fully conscious of the significance to other countries, as well as their own, of the outcome of these discussions, and they have from the beginning had continuously in view the common interest of their governments in establishing a world trading and monetary system from which the trade of all countries can benefit and within which the trade of all countries can be conducted on a multilateral, nondiscriminatory basis." And Secretary Byrnes, shortly thereafter, argued: "If we fail to make this loan, Britain will be forced to do business by barter with a bloc of nations. Those nations in turn will be forced to do business with Britain in preference to other nations. That means dividing the world into economic blocs. If the world is divided into economic blocs the peace of the world will be in danger. Wars frequently stem from trade conflict."

But beyond this, there are urgent political considerations which every citizen should have in mind, even though for obvious reasons, no administration spokesman could prudently allude to them. In spite of all our efforts, we find ourselves living more and more in a world divided. In the long run, the security of our institutions, if not of our frontiers, may depend upon a healthy economic revival in the friendly democracies.

Great Britain and France are the eastern bastions of human liberty. We have recognized almost instinctively that there are impelling reasons why we should strive to make these bastions secure. We have granted a loan to the French Republic. It is a matter of immediate national concern that we follow this by granting a loan to Great Britain. If we allow anything to prevent us from doing so, only the Soviet Union will rejoice. For the Kremlin would inevitably see in this a blow to those "fraternal ties" which today offer the only effective resistance to its further encroachments.

Mr. Bevin's false and provocative charges evoke an emotional reaction which was fully justified. But this reaction should not be permitted to block the passage by Congress of a measure so essential to our own welfare. We understand and we share the indignation aroused by the remarks of the British Foreign Minister. Yet it would be a tragic folly should it lead us to take reprisals against our recent ally and, in this manner, to sacrifice our own national interest.

This is no time to allow our decisions to be governed by the heat of the moment. The consequence of doing so can only be disastrous. We know how difficult is the position of a Representative subjected to a rising volume of protest from his constituents. But this is one occasion when it is peculiarly incumbent upon the Members of Congress to resist the immediate pressure from back home. The national interest is at stake—the national interest is in their charge. If their best judgment tells them that the British loan deserves their support, they should support it. The bitterness and tension engendered by Mr. Bevin will in time disappear. The nature of the relations—whether good or bad—that we now establish with our sister democracy will long endure. Every Congressman voting for the loan will be fully able to defend his action.

OPA and the Facts Do Not Agree

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include therein a statement by Leslie Gould which appeared in the New York Journal of July 5, 1946:

OPA BUREAUCRATS' CLAIMS DON'T JIBE WITH RECORD

(By Leslie Gould)

On this matter of how good is the word and the forecast of the little Washington bureaucrats—particularly when they are fighting to keep a job or slip over some reform.

A case in point is the OPA. In the days preceding its death and since, the boys on the left bank of the Potomac have been howling that only the OPA stood between the public and a runaway inflation like "1919."

According to them, if it weren't for the OPA, prices would be like they were in 1919.

In making such statements and forecasts, they are counting on the fact that few if any will check on them—as to just what happened in 1919 and how prices then compared with those under OPA "controls."

Well, a look back at 1919 and at prices under OPA shows that the market basket of the average housewife actually cost less 27 years ago without price controls.

Prentice-Hall, Inc., which keeps a close tab on taxation and Government regulation, has prepared an interesting table comparing 1919 costs of 20 items of food with those of the spring of this year.

This shows that in May 1919 a Washington housewife paid $5.89 for 20 items of food and in May, 1946 with "benefit" of price control paid $6.01 for the same selection. In Indianapolis the costs were $5.35 in April 1919 vs. $6.08 in April 1946.

All of which shows how much protection under the OPA and Government subsidies the housewife has not received.

The table follows, showing the 1946 price, the amount of subsidy—which also is paid by the consumer through taxes—and the total cost including the subsidy in 1946 as compared with the May 1919 costs:

WASHINGTON

	May 1946	Subsidy	May 1946 total	May 1919

The prices are taken from newspaper ads for 1919, and from newspaper ads or OPA ceiling prices for group 4 stores for Washington and from the Bureau of Labor Statistics for Indianapolis 1946 prices.

The 1946 prices in the table do not tell the full story of the inflation under price control, for lucky is the housewife who was able to buy at ceiling prices.

The Presidential Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I want to insert the following editorial comments on the recent Presidential veto exercised against the OPA bill which had been agreed upon by the Congress:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 1, 1946]

THE OPA VETO

Whether judged from the standpoint of logic, economics, or practical politics, President Truman's action in vetoing the amended price-control bill a few hours before the expiration of the existing law defies explanation.

It has been traditional in American politics for the President, on major issues of this kind, when in doubt, to accept the advice of his party leaders in the two Houses of Congress. Mr. Roosevelt departed from that tradition in 1944 in his memorable message vetoing the tax bill and denouncing it as a measure which would benefit "the greedy and not the needy." The resulting split between executive and legislative was so serious that it might well have been politically disastrous to him in peacetime.

If Mr. Truman, who was a Member of the Senate at that time, learned anything from the episode it is not evident in his action with respect to the price-control measure. Senator BARKLEY and other administration leaders who had worked prodigiously to hold back the forces which would have destroyed price control completely and who were intimately familiar with the temper of Congress and of the people urged the President with all the strength at their command to sign the measure. Yet, as against the practical wisdom of these lieutenants, Mr. Truman elected to follow the counsel of Chester Bowles, whose utter misconception of the character of his stabilization assignment has contributed more than any other single factor to the present revolt in Congress and in the Nation against the OPA.

What do we find to be the basis of the reasoning behind the veto of this measure? Mr. Truman's thesis (or Mr. Bowles' thesis as relayed through Mr. Truman) is that for 5 years we have demonstrated that "inflation can be prevented" and therefore, under adequate legislation, there is no reason why it cannot continue to be prevented; that we cannot have an economy which is "half-stabilized and half unstabilized," and that provisions such as the Taft price-relief amendment are merely "legalized inflation."

It is not necessary to contend that the conference bill is a good bill in every particular to show that this reasoning is completely fallacious. In the first place in four of the five years of price control the country was at war. Most of the key cost-of-living items were then rationed; wages as well as prices were controlled (although this control had begun to slip badly a year before the end of the fighting), and the moral climate was one in which generally speaking no sacrifice was regarded as too great if it was felt that it would contribute to winning the war.

For a year now the picture has been an entirely different one. Rationing has gone out of the window and the Administration itself has deliberately introduced the idea of "an economy half-stabilized" (which the President professes to discountenance) by encouraging Nation-wide wage increases as the opening phase of an inflation spiral. As to the moral climate it would be idle to deny that it bears little resemblance to that of wartime.

Finally the implication that the issue involved in the case of this legislation is the issue of price control or no price control simply is not so. That the Taft amendment, for example, calls for a more liberal attitude toward price relief than the formula of the OPA is true. But it is equally true that it is more in the spirit of the original price-control legislation than the formula hitherto in use, a formula which by its excessive zeal in preventing industry from earning "too much profit" not only interfered seriously with production but was an open invitation to overliberalization once the measure should be opened up.

The issue is not one of price control or no price control; it is one of price control as demanded by Mr. Bowles, without compromise or reservation, or price control which though defects may have found their way into it, represented a concession to experience, to changes in the economic picture and to the mood of the Nation. If Mr. Truman was convinced that the imperfections might possibly be of mortal seriousness he should have signed the measure with a message to that effect. Then the responsibility would be that of Congress. As it is he has gratuitously shouldered it himself, while widening the cleavage between himself and Congress at a time when there is still much to be done before the adjournment and when he is badly in need of Congressional cooperation.

In the circumstances no time should be lost in reviving the legislation which expired last midnight until a new measure can be worked out. Whether Congress will be prepared to make any further concessions in the new measure is an open question. Perhaps the departure of Mr. Bowles will make compromise less difficult. But at any rate the President would be well advised to think twice before he again, and perhaps finally, elects the dangerous choice of no price control as against modified price control.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 3, 1946]

TRUMAN'S VETO OF OPA BILL IS TERMED A CHOICE FOR CHAOS—MARK SULLIVAN SUGGESTS HE SHOULD HAVE ACCEPTED MEASURE, SOUGHT A BETTER ONE LATER IF NEEDED, TO MAKE THE ENDING OF OPA ORDERLY

(By Mark Sullivan)

WASHINGTON, July 2.—In the welter that has been created there is one thing that is wanted by the largest number of Members of Congress. It must be stated carefully. It is termination of price control—but orderly and gradual termination. The number who, throughout the months of controversy, wanted an abrupt and complete termination on June 30 was negligible.

For orderly termination of the Office of Price Administration, the plain first step, in the condition that has been created, is to extend the OPA as is for a brief stop-gap period, with use of the time thus gained to write a permanent bill.

For the stop-gap bill the House has voted overwhelmingly. Even after chaos had been created, and angry emotion had arisen, the number who opposed the stop-gap bill—the number, that is, who voted in effect for complete and immediate termination—was only 61. The vote for temporary emergency extension of the OPA as is was 283.

In the Senate the proportion favoring either temporary extension, or immediate writing of permanent legislation, is probably as large as in the House. But the Senate rules make it impossible for action to be blocked or delayed by the very small number who throughout have wanted complete and immediate termination.

This brings up one of the far-reaching questions forced to the front by the present condition. It is, to put it starkly, the ability of Congress to function. Something can be said for a Senate rule which gives much power to a minority—when the rule is used for the purpose for which it exists, namely, to prevent hasty action on long-range legislation. To use the power to prevent promptness in an emergency is different and indefensible.

LEGISLATIVE RULE ON TRIAL

The most thoughtful men in the Senate, and a large majority of the body, know that the ability of legislative government to function in the modern world is a present problem. To the end that Congress be able to function adequately, the Senate recently passed a bill reorganizing the congressional mechanism. The present postponing of action upon a measure dealing with a serious and immediate emergency makes the problem concrete. If the Senate is determined, it can get action on the OPA. It can show that the Senate can function.

But there is also a question of proper functioning on the part of the Executive.

To describe what Congress wants as an orderly and gradual termination of the OPA is to go to the heart of the hot contention now boiling. For what actually exists, until and unless Congress acts, is the opposite; it is abrupt and complete termination of the OPA. For this, who is responsible?

Plainly, Congress did not want abrupt and complete termination—if Congress had wanted that it would have legislated that. What Congress legislated was extension of the OPA, in modified form, until next year. What brought about immediate termination was President Truman's veto.

But instantly the President and those who counseled him to veto, including persons responsible for conducting the OPA, make charges against the act that Congress passed. They say it would have been impossible to administer successfully, that it would have resulted in chaotic conditions.

HE CHOSE IMMEDIATE CHAOS

Yet the President is in the position of choosing immediate and certain chaos, as against what might have been—assuming the charges against the bill are sound, which is by no means admitted—potential and delayed chaos.

In the contention now boiling, and likely to be a political issue for a long time, it will be difficult to deny there was a better course for the President and the administrators of the OPA. It would have been to accept the bill that Congress wrote, and do the best possible under it, with expectation that, in a spirit of cooperation with Congress, new legislation could be asked for if needed.

Whether the bill Congress wrote was what Mr. Truman says it is, or was wise and well considered, is a thing the average person cannot readily decide. A Senator who is a Democrat who is more or less impartial on the present question, and who has been in the Senate many years, says that in all his experience he has never seen any House or Senate committee give more intent or more thoughtful deliberation to any bill than was given to the present OPA bill by the Senate and House committees that handled it.

Facts on the British Loan From an American Viewpoint

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including some questions and answers on the British loan agreement.

First. Where did the idea of a loan originate?

Answer. The British first proposed, in September 1945, that the United States make a gift to Britain of from three to six billion dollars. From this proposal came later negotiations in Washington leading to the financial agreement of December 6, 1945 in which the amount was fixed at $3,750,000,000.

Second. Why does Britain want to obtain $3,750,000,000 from the United States?

Answer. Britain claims she is unable to pay for her imports and reduce certain blocked sterling balances—in other words get back on her feet economically without this sum.

Third. Is Britain unable to finance her own economic recovery?

Answer. Undisputed facts indicate that by proper administrative measures Britain ought to be able to survive economically with the minimum of financial assistance. She has borrowed $1,250,000,000 from Canada, and $425,000,000 from our own RFC. She is still the largest creditor nation in the world with far-flung assets and untapped resources reaching into the billions of dollars.

Fourth. Does Britain offer to put up collateral for the proposed "loan"?

Answer. No. She has not offered to do so and was not requested to do so. In borrowing from the RFC she put up $895,000,000 of marketable securities and other liquid assets, but on this transaction no such protective measures are involved.

Fifth. Is the financial agreement of December 6, 1945, subject to amendment?

Answer. Yes. Many important considerations pertaining to the "loan" are left for "further consultations." No one knows now what the final terms of the agreement will be.

Sixth. Will the "loan" stabilize or encourage expansion of world trade?

Answer. There is no guaranty of this. Britain's exports are already expanding rapidly without the stimulus of this "loan." She makes no commitments to purchase goods in the United States, or otherwise release existing sterling balances so that other countries can expand their trade.

Seventh. How can Britain and the United States both expand their exports without competing with each other?

Answer. They cannot. If Britain boosts her export by 50 to 75 percent above her prewar levels (measured by volume) our own foreign trade and domestic production will inevitably suffer. British and American goods are highly competitive with each other. And unless Britain does boost her exports that much she will not be able to repay the proposed loan.

Eighth. Will the loan agreement, if approved, result in lower tariffs?

Answer. Yes. One of the objects of the agreement, according to advocates of the loan is removal of trade barriers and in discussing the subject of barriers they persistently include the term "tariffs." Sir Stafford Cripps has said the proposed agreement "is an attempt to try and bring down tariff barriers on all sides to a great extent. A mere nominal reduction of a few percentages is not going to make anyone enter into a bargain and that, of course, our American friends understand perfectly well."

Ninth. Where will the money come from if the loan is approved.

Answer. American investors will be asked to lend money to the United States Treasury Department on bonds to be issued specifically for the purpose of the loan. Receipts from such bond sales will then be turned over to the British Government, under the terms of the financial agreement signed, December 6, 1945.

Tenth. Will this increase our own public debt?

Answer. Yes; at least it will be higher than it otherwise would be by the amount of the "loan," namely, $3,750,000,000.

Eleventh. Would not it be cheaper to give Britain $1,000,000,000 and forget it?

Answer. Probably. Some able economists say it would do Britain more good, and be a smaller drain on our resources, if the United States made an outright gift to Britain and other major trading countries of $1,000,000,000 each out of our excessive gold reserves. This method, however, would probably be too orthodox to satisfy the school of internationalists who regard gold as a "barbarous relic." Lord Keynes, who heads this school, said in the House of Lords in discussing the Bretton Woods plan, "Was it not I, when many of today's iconoclasts were still worshipers of the calf, who wrote that 'Gold is a barbarous relic'?"

Twelfth. Will Britain line up with Russia if the "loan" is not made?

Answer. No. If Britain allies herself with Russia it will be for other reasons. It is inconceivable Britain would obligate herself to a Communist state which is trying to cut her "life line" to the Orient and competing with Britain for Balkan influence. Britain has huge investments and deep-seated interests in southeastern Europe, the Middle East and the Orient. These are frictional areas in which British and Russian interest collide. Furthermore, Britain is a Christian nation, in the sense of general religious beliefs, and the English fundamentally adhere to doctrines of law and economics which are totally opposite to the Russian conceptions of such fundamental social beliefs.

Thirteenth. Would failure to approve the "loan" be a vote of no confidence in Britain or otherwise injure our relations with Britain?

Answer. Not unless the British desired it to be. Credit is available to Britain in this country if the British are willing to make a clean case as shown in the fact that she obtained a very substantial loan from the RFC on businesslike terms, posting required collateral and definitely committing herself to repayment of principal and interest. The agreement of December 6, 1945, is not in the same category. From the arguments advanced in behalf of the proposed agreement it is clearly regarded by proponents as a political transaction by which the United States will buy its way into the good graces of the world.

Fourteenth. What is the real alternative to this particular proposal?

Answer. If Britain actually needs $3,750,000,000 and can prove she needs it, and is willing to enter into a strictly business loan agreement, and if the United States can afford to lend the money, then a sound business loan probably could be negotiated under terms and conditions mutually satisfactory and not related to international political maneuverings. In that way mutual confidence and mutual respect would be fostered to a much greater degree than by the present proposal.

Break the Deadlock in the Settlement of the Korean Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein the text of a radio broadcast made on June 14, 1946, by Mr. Yongjeung Kim, president of the Korean Affairs Institute in Washington, concerning the problems in Korea today. The text is as follows:

This is ED HART speaking to you from Washington.

The world at this moment, after the bloodiest war in the history of mankind, unfortunately seems to be full of hot-spots. I mean those areas where former allies can, if they think their own interests are threatened, easily breed antagonism. Such an area is the ancient land of Korea. Korea was out of the news for 40 years because the Japanese planned it that way. Japan occupied and exploited it for that period—then shortly after VJ-day 30,000,000 Koreans felt the momentary joy of being free men once again. But, alas, those 30,000,000 Koreans were naive people. They didn't know the ways of power politics. When the war ended, American troops marched into the southern half of Korea; Russian troops into the northern half. The Russian troops—the American troops are still there. The Koreans are not free.

Far short of Korean expectation, in December 1945, the Big Three foreign ministers at Moscow denied Korea her immediate independence and decided to place her under a four-power trusteeship. A joint commission of the Soviet and American commands in Korea was set up to implement the provisions of the Moscow decision. It was to help the Koreans set up a provisional democratic government for the whole of Korea. This provisional government was to operate under the supervision of the international trustees. Subsequently, a heartening word from our Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes, announced that Korea might not have to go through with the trusteeship if the joint Soviet-American Commission so recommended.

Now that Commission, as everyone knows, has failed in its task. Its deliberations broke up May 6, and there is no provisional government in Korea. The Soviet Army rules the north and the United States Army rules the south. That condition is intolerable to 30,000,000 Koreans and dangerous for 140,000,000 Americans and 200,000,000 Soviet citizens.

In the studio with me is Mr. Yongjeung Kim, president of the Korean Affairs Institute. Mr. Kim has long been a leading protagonist for Korean independence. The institute that he heads has for years been telling the story of Korea and its people to Americans. Today, Mr. Kim has a very important message to transmit. He seeks to break the deadlock in the settlement of the Korean problem. He offers, not so much the solution, but a means of obtaining a solution.

Mr. Kim, you feel very strongly that the Korean problem is a world problem. Privately, you told me that as long as your country was denied independence, Korea would remain a cancer—capable of destroying the whole anatomy of world peace.

Mr. KIM. I'm a fanatic on that point, Mr. Hart. Korea is the crossroad where the Chinese, the Russians, and the Americans meet, either to shake hands with one another or to shake fists at each other. I don't want to see Korea become the Alsace-Lorraine or the Belgium of Asia.

Mr. HART. And you feel that it could easily become that if the Russians and Americans don't come to an agreement on Korea?

Mr. KIM. By allowing their joint conference in Korea to collapse, Russia and America have violated the spirit and letter of their solemn pledges. Korea, and not the United States or the Soviet Union, is suffering the consequences. Even the enemy, Japan, is undivided and allowed to have its own government. Korea is seeking only justice. She desires her rights to freedom and independence.

Mr. HART. So you want to see the Soviet-American negotiations resume as soon as possible?

Mr. KIM. Tomorrow morning would not be too soon.

Mr. HART. Well, why did the joint Commission fail?

Mr. KIM. I am told that negotiations broke down primarily on this point—which Koreans should be consulted in setting up a provisional government. The Americans took the position that all Korean leaders should be consulted. The Russians were unwilling to consult with anyone who had openly opposed the Moscow agreement on trusteeship.

As Mr. Raymond Swing, the distinguished American political commentator, pointed out, "The Russians cordially dislike chiefly two men, Dr. Syngman Rhee, former chairman of the Korean Commission in Washington, and Mr. Kim Koo, former president of the so-called provisional Korean Government set up in Chungking. Both Dr. Rhee and Mr. Kim Koo are bitterly, actively, and effectively anti-Russian. And it goes against the grain of the Russians * * * to give any political rights to their enemies."

Mr. HART. But you feel, Mr. Kim, that the American position is correct, that all democratic elements of Korea should have some say in the formation of your government?

Mr. KIM. In principle, I agree. The difficulty is in what we mean by democratic. What the Soviet considers democratic, you Americans might think totalitarian. What you Americans think democratic the Soviet might consider reactionary. And that is the nub of the whole difficulty.

Mr. HART. All right, Mr. Kim, suppose the Joint Commission meets again. Aren't the same differences still there to plague them?

Mr. KIM. Yes; they are, but here is how I think the deadlock can be broken. For the sake of my people and for the good of all nations, I am going to be cold-blooded about the matter. First, I would exclude all Korean leaders in the north and south who were repatriated after VJ-day from the formation of a provisional government. The Americans are not pleased with some of these people, and the Russians dislike some. By eliminating them we remove a cause of friction between the Soviet and American delegations. There are enough able Koreans who suffered long under the Japanese rule who could form a government friendly to both the Russians and Americans.

Mr. HART. So far, so good. Any other ideas?

Mr. KIM. Yes; I would have the Soviet-American Commission eliminate, immediately, the artificial boundary set up in the middle of the country. National unity should be restored. Once again we'd have the free movement of people and good to all parts of the country.

Mr. HART. All right. You get national unity and a provisional government—then what?

Mr. KIM. The next step would be the simultaneous evacuation of all Soviet and American armed forces from Korea.

Mr. HART. Do you think that the newly formed government could stand up on its own props—don't you need some advisers and technicians to rebuild your national life?

Mr. KIM. Naturally. * * * but I want to stress a point—whatever advisers may be needed should be invited by Korea. If they are appointed by Americans or Russians, power politics will inevitably result once again. Misunderstanding, friction, and distrust would upset the applecart. The only way to avoid this is for the Korean Government to have an absolutely free hand to select and dismiss all advisers and technicians.

Mr. HART. Mr. Kim, your suggestions sound logical, but in a world not yet ready for brotherly love, is there any way Korea could be kept from becoming the stepping-stone on the road to aggression by one great power or another?

Mr. KIM. Most certainly, there is. I propose that the United States and the USSR guarantee, jointly, the inviolability of Korean sovereignty and independence. And further to pledge that they will not seek nor allow others to obtain special privileges in Korea, either political or economic. Such an agreement would safeguard against any possibility of Korea's becoming a base for aggression.

Mr. HART. Well, what about China and Great Britain? Would you have them join in that guarantee?

Mr. KIM. Yes, indeed.

Mr. HART. Mr. Kim, in the course of this broacast, you've offered a number of suggestions that seem to make sense. Now, here's the $64 question: Have you any ideas as to how to go about getting the American and Russian delegations back to the council table?

Mr. KIM. After long deliberation over this matter I have decided the solution is to appeal directly to President Truman and Prime Minister Stalin. Mr. HART, perhaps you would be kind enough to read the identical open letter I've sent to President Truman and cabled Prime Minister Stalin.

Mr. HART. I'll be delighted to read it. Here is the text of Mr. Kim's appeal to President Truman and Prime Minister Stalin:

"SIR: I am taking the great privilege of writing an open letter to you as a friend of the common man. As a private Korean citizen who believes in the principle of true democracy, may I bring to your attention the sad state of affairs in Korea?

"Nine months after the Japanese surrender, Korea is still divided into two zones, which dislocates the economic, political, and social life of the people. Their suffering is far greater than imagined.

"A Joint Soviet-American Commission was formed to implement the Moscow Agreement of last December but, as you know, the commission was unable to carry out the provisions of the aforesaid agreement, and the conference was finally adjourned sine die. Korea is suffering the consequences. Moreover, progress toward national independence has been suspended.

"You are one of the champions of the oppressed and underprivileged peoples of the world, and you fought the war for the purpose of perpetuating freedom and peace. I know you must dislike very much the thought of any small nation, like Korea, suffering for no justifiable reason.

"I know you are burdened with many important matters, but the welfare of 30,000,000 people is no small matter. The United States and the Soviet Union have a responsibility to Korea because, instead of allowing her outright freedom, the two countries jointly pledged to guide her on the road to independence. Solution of the Korean question would be a solution of one of the problems of the world; and accomplishment of Korean independence would be a step toward the realization of peace, security, and freedom of the United Nations. May I beseech you, therefore to take the Korean case into your own hands in order to facilitate a just settlement for that friendly nation.

"I firmly believe the Soviet Union and the United States are too great to victimize even unintentionally, a small country like Korea. She has suffered long enough and she deserves humane consideration. She needs your help, now.

"There is an Oriental proverb that says, 'A sage considers even the words of a fool.' I fervently hope that you will make it possible for the Joint Soviet-American Commission to reconvene to fulfill its responsibility to the Moscow agreement at an early date so that Korea may obtain her long overdue independence.

"I have the honor to remain,

"Very respectfully yours,

"YONGJEUNG KIM."

Mr. HART. There you have the text of an identical appeal to President Truman and Prime Minister Stalin by Mr. Kim, president of the Korean Affairs Institute, Washington, D. C. Mr. Kim, our guest on this program, has told you of the difficulty his country is enduring on the hard, long road to freedom.

Roosevelt and the Future of Liberalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I have before me a speech on the subject Roosevelt and the Future of Liberalism, delivered by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] at the National Lawyers' Guild Banquet in Cleveland, Ohio, July 6, 1946, which I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the bar, to say that I am deeply moved by this honor is to say too little and, since such an expression should come from the heart and not from the mouth, too much. No man could accept an award dedicated to the name of Franklin Delano Roosevelt without the deepest pride and the truest humility. Pride that you have chosen to set my name beneath the name of our great President—and humility at the thought of how much one must do and be, to be worthy of such an honor.

But pride and humility are personal feelings. And they are shadowed by more somber thoughts on such an occasion. If it were within our mortal powers, I would prefer not to be standing here accepting such an award. Not alone because the occasion reminds us of the loss of a great man, the greatest of our times. But because, in a thousand different ways—some so blunt and clear, some too subtle for even the lawyer's delicate probing—the climate of this Nation and of the world is so different, so tragically different, for his not being here.

I for one—and I am sure many of you—wonder at the striking changes that have come over our national life in the short 15 months since the death of Roosevelt. Many of us who shared his aims and beliefs are more than a little worried at how far we have drifted from those aims. And, if we are in the midst of the struggles to attain them day by day, many of us perhaps are more than a little frightened that those beliefs we shared, those aims we fought for—and the man who personified them—are in danger of becoming a closed chapted of history, and not the guides to the greater tomorrow we thought them to be.

For sometime I have been trying to formulate what it is that has changed in the climate and temper of our country—or, if you will, in that part of our country that flows into and out of Washington. As a first approximation, I might describe it as a growing feeling of frustration and despair at the golden opportunity we have missed to advance on the road toward peace and security. Instead of a growing security, we are faced with inflation and the certain prospect of a severe depression to follow. Instead of peace, there is the ominous rumble of war talk, the menace of the bomb, the clash of imperialism, militarization eating away of our substance before we have fairly begun to repair it.

We seem to have let a chance go by—and we look unbelievingly at the emptiness of our hands.

Why have we missed this chance?

Is it because of war-weariness, a desire to return to normalcy, to relax our efforts, throw off the irksome burden of wartime controls? I scarcely think so. True, there has been a serious rift in our wartime unity of effort, both at home and abroad. But this is not to be attributed to normal relaxation following a strenuous war. On the contrary, I see no weariness in those who have steadily opposed the New Deal. They seem tireless; they have increased their efforts. I see no desire to return to normalcy on the part of those who are fighting labor or seeking inflation or muttering threats of war. They seem to be working overtime. Nor do I see any real desire to throw off controls on the part of those monopolies which would put quick profits before permanent prosperity. They would substitute their own corporate control for governmental directives.

Is it, then, a change in personnel? Have the fresh young New Dealers, grown old and weary in the struggle against special interest and retired to the comparative security of a larger income in private industry, have they been replaced by mediocrities who cannot fill the place of giants, by those who would compromise with privilege, by those who infuse Government posts with private interests, by those who shake polite fingers at monopoly but admonish "radical" lawyers, by those who would repress the exercise of individual judgment and the searching of individual conscience in public office, by those who would replace fair compromise and the traditional American give-and-take with an inflexible and small-minded "get tough" foreign policy?

Perhaps this is so. But this cannot be a cause, though it may be a serious effect. I seem to remember that in years past we liberals regularly shed many a bitter tear for eminent brethren in arms who proved to be sunshine patriots. But always there were others to replace them, more and more who came in to take up the good fight.

Or are these but symptoms of a deeper malady—has the war, perhaps, unleashed forces which threaten to undermine liberalism itself? That there are such forces no honest liberal would deny. Great corporations have grown even greater; this Nation has emerged as the most powerful and the wealthiest economic and military machine in the world, while other nations have been weakened; national rivalries have been intensified, and the unity of war replaced by the suspicions of peace making, or should I say war preparing. All these changes raise problems which may defy old solutions, which may permanently affect the climate of our thought.

But does the change in temper, this growing disillusionment, represent a necessary change in the Nation's aims and objectives since the death of Roosevelt? Does it represent a change which forces a retreat from liberalism? I think all of us must face this question candidly. I think that each of us must answer the question for himself, and then all of us must answer it together. As a liberal who believes with all his heart and soul in the things that Roosevelt stands for, my answer is no, we cannot and have not abandoned the aims, we cannot and have not abandoned the objectives, and we cannot and shall not abandon the spirit and the vision which gave them life.

What was the basic impulse of the New Deal with which we associate Roosevelt, the New Deal which was thrust aside in the war years by the greater urgency to repel a savage enemy, only to emerge shining and ever larger in those last messages of Roosevelt to the Congress? It was not the concatenation of alphabetical agencies the Republican dromedaries—14 years without water—trot out at election time to chew and rechew in public. It was not even the great pieces of legislation which Roosevelt put through the Congress—although these were the embodiment of the spirit.

No. It was primarily a point of view and a spirit. It was the point of view that the Government must be dedicated to increasing the welfare of the great majority of our people and not the privileges of the few. It was based on a belief in the wisdom and power of that vast majority. And it was a spirit which, in government and politics, I may liken to the spirit of the great scientists, a constant adaptation of the instruments of government to meet new social problems with new social controls. As new problems arise from an ever more complex society, we must find and test new methods of handling those problems—and if we do not persist in this endless quest, the society and the individuals in it will perish.

But this is more than a method of inquiry. It is at once the spirit and the heart of liberalism as we have known it, not alone in this country, but in many lands and during many generations. But in this country, this spirit of liberalism gave substantial shape to our concept of government. Since the days of Jefferson, we liberals have believed in the ruling principle of democracy, that the people are sovereign, that government is derived from the consent of the governed. I admit it may be difficult to find an echo of this principle in those July Fourth orators when they vote against OPA—which is supported by 75 percent of the people and opposed by less than 10 percent.

And we liberals believe that the law of self-preservation which the conservatives invoke as their first principle must apply to the whole people and not only to an individual or to any small group. We believe that the people—as a whole, without distinctions of any accidental kind—have a right to better themselves. And we believe that the only effective vehicle through which the people may better themselves is the government, the agent through which all the people may realize their striving.

To day that liberal belief is more threatened and more opposed than ever before by the forces of conservatism and the principle of economic anarchy they espouse. Unfortunately the conservatives also use the word "liberal" in the sense of the principles of individual, atomistic economic freedom put forth by Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill, principles whose usefulness has been rediscovered by the National Association of Manufacturers and propagated throughout the land as a cloak for their own form of despotism.

But I think we liberals have moved a step ahead of them—and largely as a result of Roosevelt. We have made the separation which has been so difficult for many liberals to make, between the liberal spirit and the conditions of economic individualism, between the use of Government to protect the many and the law of the jungle which leaves room for but a few.

We are no longer the self-contained nation of small farmers, merchants and businessmen of 1800. We are a nation in which—and in the Brandeis tradition, I cite the latest studies—a mere handful of corporations employs more than 60 percent of the Nation's workers, but where 2 out of 3 of these still earn less than $40 a week, and two families out of five have but $40 in liquid assets between them and an unpredictable future.

This is scarcely the society of Adam Smith. This is no longer the society of Jefferson's day to which many liberals would bid us return—and on which many conservatives pattern their appeals though not their practice. We cannot turn back the clock without smashing its mechanism. We must recognize, instead, the immense difficulties which bigness imposes on our attempts to fulfill the liberal ideal and to carry out the liberal spirit.

Those who fight liberalism, those who oppose marshaling the full powers of the Government for the welfare of the people, also call themselves liberals, and are overfond of quoting Jefferson. Yes, Jefferson did believe that the best government is that which governs least. And he did oppose the strong powers of government advocated by Hamilton and Jay and Madison. So we find "Jeffersonian Democrats" pitted against Roosevelt in 1940 and 1944—and "Jeffersonian Republicans" who have fought him since the days of the Liberty League.

Somehow, I cannot see Jefferson joining my Republican friends and some of their Democratic allies in their vehement defense of States' rights as they vote to perpetuate illiteracy or poor health. I hardly think that Jefferson would array himself with all those who fought the minimum wage because, they said, it invaded the sanctity of the home and destroyed the individual's liberty. I do not believe that Jefferson would add his voice and pen to the mad cry against Government controls over prices by those who would return us to "free prices" that will lead to wild inflation and even more desperate depression. Nor can I see Jefferson refusing to use the powers of the Federal Government to curb the stranglehold of monopoly over small business and the small farmer.

I am afraid it takes a stronger eye than mine to see Jefferson cast in the role of the hero of the NAM and the big-business lobbies. For Jefferson, like Roosevelt, was too much concerned with the welfare of the great mass of our people, not with the freedom of the malefactors of great wealth whose every decision curtails the freedom of millions.

No, those who today bespeak the right of the powerful individual to exercise his individual tyranny, will not find Jefferson on their side, not the Jefferson who all his life fought against all those forces that tended to debase people by "ignorance, indigence, and oppression." It is a little more likely that we should find Jefferson defending the rights of labor and the Wagner Act, rather than those employers who insist on their sacred individual right to destroy free labor. And I cannot quite see Jefferson joining in those loyal witch hunts of opinion which would cut off the root and the flower of the liberal spirit of free inquiry and free discussion.

I rather believe that Jefferson was as cordially hated by the conservatives of his day as Franklin Roosevelt was by their spiritual descendants. The measure of this hate is the measure of Roosevelt's success in devising ways and means of preserving liberal democracy in a world of increasing concentration of power, in a world which menaced the liberal tradition and the liberal spirit.

Because Roosevelt understood the difficulty of maintaining the integrity of the individual in the clash of corporate interests, he more and more recognized the need for new forms of aid to the individual, to the multitudes of individuals who seek to better themselves. Alone, and let loose in the anarchistic jungle of economic individualism into which the pseudo-Jeffersonians would thrust them, they are powerless to pursue progress. But with the Government running interference for them, they can achieve it.

Roosevelt measured this liberal idea of progress not in simple increases in national wealth—but in a better distribution of that wealth as it increased. Not in the greater size of corporations—but in their ability to produce cheaper goods and pay higher wages and profits. Not in the extent of our armed forces, nor the bigness of our bombs, but rather in the dedication of these instruments to securing a durable peace for our people against the enemies of human progress. Not in the simple increase in governmental powers—but in the use of those powers to achieve the end of greater security for all.

I return to my question—has the Nation changed these liberal objectives in 15 short months? Perhaps in this cautious company I should be more tentative in my answer than I am going to be. But I have been reading some of my mail over this week end, mail from many States. Fortunately, I am not a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, so that my mail is light—just a thousand or so letters and telegrams a day.

I do no find that there is any less desire today for the achievement of peace and security than there was 15 months ago. I do not find that people are less worried today about the dangers of inflation and the inevitable aftermath of depression. I do not find that people welcome the talk of war already sullying our doubtful peace. And I do not find any less insight among people that failure on the domestic front goes hand in hand with failure to lay the great foundations of peace.

Have the problems and needs of the people changed since the death of Roosevelt? Of course not. If anything, the failures of the last year have sharpened the need for solving them, and has made more urgent the cry for confident and bold liberal leadership to organize their solution. For the vast majority of our people are liberals, and not only those who try to articulate their needs or define their concept of government.

I would venture to say that more, not less, people are coming to see that the basic problem of our domestic life is to assure more and more security for the great majority of our people through governmental action, to give practical expression to those magnificent hopes for the future which Roosevelt set down in his economic bill of rights—set down, let me remind you, when we were in the midst of war and not when we faced a calm perspective of the future.

But standing athwart every effort to put the economic bill of rights into a legislative framework is the grim danger of inflation, an inflation which even conservative business papers concede will bring us closer to a precipitous depression whose severity they dare not contemplate. The forces that seek inflation menace every one of those rights and the entire fabric of our domestic security. They would weaken or even destroy our ability to fashion a durable peace. They would set at naught our hopes and permanently defer their realization, unless we are prepared to use every power of Government to stop the selfish and thoughtless few who would mine the pathway to security and progress.

To those who have been coerced or silenced or intimidated or driven to meaningless compromise or despair by the power of the conservatives and their propaganda, I say: Raise your voices and speak out for the liberal spirit and make it work. The vast majority of our citizens will not be led astray by the pious talk of a free economy that does not provide them with homes, that does not guarantee them jobs at decent pay, that ignores their basic needs and leaves them helpless. They will not be satisfied with a retreat from our principles, no matter how temporary, because there is no retreat from their need. They will not give us the liberal concept of government, no matter how many liberals are tempted to do so, for there is no temptation great enough to swerve the majority of our people from the path of progress and peace.

The insistent demand of the people for governmental action grows every day and in every field. Take the Nation's health. Before the war many of us might have agreed, without much questioning, that apart from some public sanitation measures the problems of health were best left for the individual to handle with his personal physician. We were relatively satisfied with the conditions of individual freedom that existed—without examining them.

But the war jarred us out of our complacent views. When two out of five of our most able-bodied group of citizens were rejected by the armed forces because of phyhical and mental defects—when we add up the man-years lost from our farms and factories because of illness, and we try to measure the food and equipment that we miss so sorely today, because so many of our people were unable to put forth all their efforts physically or mentally—then illness is no longer a "purely personal" business between the individual and his family doctor.

Sickness and poor health become a national problem. The meaningless and avoidable death of thousands of mothers and children every year, the enfeebling ills of preventable chronic disease, the toll of undiagnosed cancer, the tragedy of adjustable mental disease—the least known and most dangerous of our national health problems—all these strike at the core of our only true national wealth, the minds and bodies of our citizens. The individual is no more able to bargain individually and freely for protection against them than is the individual worker in a position to bargain with his employer about the conditions of his employment. To stem the flood tide of illness becomes no less a national problem than to stem the angry waters of our rivers from inundating our countryside.

And we liberals are prepared to use the full powers of Government, not only to improve the Nation's health, but to remedy all those conditions which are responsible for poor health—the low wages of millions, the poor housing of more, the insecurity and joblessness that threaten half the Nation. And we shall not be dissuaded by the barrage of propaganda of those who would reduce these problems to individual bargains; we shall not compromise with those who would confine the powers of Government to policing their private property.

Surely it is no accident that those who resist the use of governmental powers to help the sick are the same who would abolish price controls, who would emasculate the guarantees of full employment, who fight increased unemployment compensation, who would bar the Government from housing, who oppose governmental assistance for education and research, who reject aid to the farmers, and would stop the drive on monopoly.

I start with the problem of health, and I find myself moving into and across every one of those rights which mean security for the citizen. Many liberals seem to feel that the increasing preoccupation with his day-by-day affairs makes the individual lose interest in the liberal program. I cannot believe they are serious. There is no ivory tower for the individual citizen. It is precisely those daily preoccupations and concerns that drive each man and each woman into the liberal camp to embrace the liberal ideal.

Can any of us seriously believe that the great mass of our people are less liberal than we? Will the vast majority of our people stand by while conservatives thwart our efforts to achieve full employment, jobs at decent pay, decent homes, security for themselves and their families? Will the American people fall for the NAM propaganda which glorifies inflation and the return to laissez-faire? Ask them.

Will the farmer be misled by those who promise quick profits now but throw him to the mercies of a free market which drove our farm prices down to the vanishing point in the last depression?

Will the millions of white-collar workers, Government employees, teachers, pensioners, professional people endure an inflation which wipes out their standard of living?

Will the veteran who knows what good medical care is tolerate poor medical care for his family in civilian life?

Will the small businessman who has seen monopoly grab off the big war contracts throw in his lot with that monopoly?

Will labor give up governmental protection for its rights?

These are rhetorical questions. None of these groups—and together they make up more than 90 percent of our people——will for long be thwarted in their desire to achieve security, will accept any other view but the liberal view that the Government must use its full powers to provide that security. I cannot share the view of some liberals that we shall have to wait for another depression to make our people more liberal—that is a vain counsel of despair that would send us all into retreat. I believe, rather, that if we continue to give real liberal leadership, if we continue to speak out with courage and boldness for the things the people need and want, no reactionary wave of the future will engulf us.

As in domestic policy, no less is it true in foreign policy that the people of this country want liberal leadership. Everywhere—in Europe, in Asia, as well as in America—people want no more talk of war, no more threats of permanent militarization of their life or ultimate destruction. Yet the Roosevelt good-neighbor policy, the Roosevelt achievement of unity of the great powers that forged our victory in the war, and the Roosevelt vision of that unity as the basic structure of the peace, are today threatened by those who never fully shared his vision or accepted his liberal spirit.

Liberalism in foreign policy is not rampant nationalism. It is not waving an atomic bomb. It is not building up the most powerful military establishment to overawe the world and place the iron hand of the military on our traditional American way of life. It is not pushing the frontiers of America 8,000 miles across the ocean to play a dangerous and unwelcome game of imperialism. And it is surely not surrendering the conduct of our foreign policy to those who never supported the Roosevelt foreign policy either in peace or war.

Do you seriously believe that the great majority of the American people have turned their backs on Roosevelt's liberal and enlightened spirit in foreign policy? We liberals do not. And we shall continue in the path of that liberalism, confident that the vast majority of our people want the same things we do in foreign policy, the same things they so fully endorsed in the fateful election of 1944—enduring peace, accommodation with the needs of our allies, a firm friendship with all peace-loving nations, alliances with none against any other, freedom for colonial subjects, uncompromising struggle against the roots of nazism, the development of atomic energy for peace, and an advancing world prosperity for all.

What shall we liberals do about the growing threats to peace and security, to the liberal concept of government for the welfare of all, to the liberal way of life? I do not come before you with any ready made answers. But we have a guide in the practice of Roosevelt, the foremost liberal of our time. Roosevelt did not pretend that he had all the answers. But he set forth in a spirit of adventure and with smiling courage to find those answers and apply them to our national problems. He knew there was risk in all these ventures—the risk of the wrong answer, the risk of tackling the wrong problem, and the risk of failure.

Of course he failed, not once, but many times. But these failures—these set-backs—never swerved him from the constant effort to find new solutions for new problems, never marred that magnificent vision of a better life for all.

Roosevelt did not arrive at final answers or complete solutions, and he would have been the last to claim finality. And we liberals must not let our love for him make of his ideals and his words an incantation, a slogan or a perfect formula to fit every problem. Liberalism cannot stand still, just as Roosevelt could not. And, if I may borrow the words of that great liberal, Justice Holmes, we must not forget that "to rest upon a formula is a slumber that, prolonged, means death."

There will be plenty who will lay claim to Roosevelt and be the official interpreters of his legacy and in his name will make that legacy the end of their labors and not the gateway to the future it should be.

But the true inheritors of Roosevelt's legacy of liberalism will be those who go forth in the same spirit of adventure, with the same high courage, with the same pride in human achievement and the dignity of man. Let us swear eternal allegiance to the happy army of him who was the real happy warrior. And let the command be "Ever forward" for the good life for our people and for all mankind.

Should the New Deal Go Into the Fertilizer Business?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the New Deal was in the hosiery mill business, but took a tremendous loss. The New Deal was in the furniture business and took another loss. The Appropriations Committee provided the funds directly for the hosiery mills and furniture factories, the same as they are now attempting to do. The New Deal now proposes to go into the fertilizer business. Recently the workers in the packing plants at Kansas City asked the Government to take over and operate the packing plants, so they could be provided jobs. This was frowned on by the same people who want to put the Government into the fertilizer business.

I wish to include the following letter, which I have received from the Wisconsin council of agriculture, indicating their position on the proposed legislation:

WISCONSIN COUNCIL OF AGRICULTURE,
Madison, Wis., July 3, 1946.

Hon. REID F. MURRAY,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MURRAY: The appropriation bill for Government corporations (H. R. 6777) has had tacked to it as a rider a $3,000,000 appropriation for construction by TVA of a fertilizer plant at Mobile, Ala.

While there is no question in our minds regarding the shortage of fertilizer at this time, yet, there is a question in our minds as to whether or not an item of this kind should be hurried through as a rider without adequate consideration and certainly we feel that on an item of this kind there should be a hearing.

It is our understanding that the shortage of fertilizer springs from an insufficiency of mining equipment, which results in an inadequate supply of rock phosphate. It is also a fact that with present manufacturing facilities a 50-percent increase in production would be possible if mining facilities were inadequate.

We, therefore, urge that you oppose the Senate rider to the House bill which provides for this $3,000,000 TVA item pending the holding of hearings to determine the exact cause of the fertilizer shortage and to learn whether or not such an appropriation, under the circumstances, is justified.

Sincerely yours,

MILO K. SWANTON,
Executive Secretary.

The Wisconsin Council of Agriculture is the over-all agriculture group of the State. One unit of its membership has over 15,000 members. Nearly all the farmers of Wisconsin are represented by this council.

It is apparent that Mr. Swanton prefers to see some hearings before a legislative committee. There has been such a bill before the Agriculture Committee since April 1945.

Now Is the Time To Do Something About Stopping Needless Pollution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we are to have another Calendar Wednesday. The Rivers and Harbors Committee has first call on the calendar tomorrow. This committee is ready to submit to the House a pollution-control bill to which the committee has agreed and which is badly needed legislation in America today. It is hoped that Members will be on the floor tomorrow and that nothing will transpire to delay or defeat the passage of this important legislation.

Under leave granted me by the House, I am herewith calling attention to an Associated Press news story emanating from Fox Lake, Ill., last October. This news item quotes a prominent Illinois public health authority as stating that "evidence has been found to show that the virus of infantile paralysis can be abundantly spread in polluted water by improper disposal of human sewage." I call attention to the entire text of the following news story primarily to dispose of the fallacious attacks made on pollution control, legislation by greedy and selfish polluters who like to claim that "only a few sportsmen, fishermen, and idealistic conservationists" are interested in ridding the Nation's streams of pollution. As a matter of fact, the public health requirements of this country make pollution control and elimination a definite necessity.

TESTS DISCLOSE POLIO VIRUS SPREADS IN POLLUTED WATERS

FOX LAKE, ILL., October 12.—Dr. Edward A. Piszczek, Cook County's (Chicago) public health director, said today evidence had been found "to show that the virus of infantile paralysis can be abundantly spread in polluted water by improper disposal of human sewage."

Dr. Piszczek, in an address prepared for the Izaak Walton League, said students of infantile paralysis feel that it "can now be classed as most probably a gastro-intestinal-borne disease." Recovery of the virus in waste matter of 20 to 70 percent of the known contacts to cases of infantile paralysis, he said, "also gives reason for the abundance of the virus among the population."

"Recovery of poliomyelitis virus from the sewer collection systems of New York, Detroit, Charleston, S. C., and Chicago gives further evidence to the fact that the germs of infantile paralysis may be found in human sewage," he said, adding:

"Periodically * * * reports of the incidence of the disease seem to show a predominance among those victims who live around a brook or stream that was highly polluted with human sewage.

"The germs of infantile paralysis have been reportedly recovered from the gastrointestinal tract of fish which were caught in a stream that showed a high concentration of human waste."

Dr. Piszczek said a study of the infantile paralysis epidemic in North Carolina in 1944 gave direct evidence "that fecal material, sewage, or contact with flies by the individual, his food, or fomites may actually constitute a link in the chain of infection with poliomyelitis." Favorable breeding places for flies, Dr. Piszczek said, were found to be along highly polluted streams.

"The fact that infantile paralysis is primarily a disease of summer and early fall," he said, "tied up clinically through observation with the water-pollution studies and fly studies, gives strongly suggestive evidence in the link of infantile paralysis transmission and susceptibility."

Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the House to another newspaper clipping. This one is an editorial from the Courier-Journal, published in Louisville, Ky. This editorial emphasizes the demonstrable fact that pollution control is an undertaking which must be assumed nationally rather than by State and local authorities acting independently and in isolated instances. Bad pollution practices in one State or area make good pollution prevention impossible or impracticable in other States or areas. What is required is a national standard of stream purity and pollution control so that local authorities can proceed to eliminate pollution as quickly as possible with assurance that in so doing they will not unduly penalize their own region by putting it against unfair competition from backward communities still endeavoring to make illegitimate profits through dumping their filth into the public waters.

The legislation to be submitted by the House Rivers and Harbors Committee will go a long way toward the goal of protecting our public waters against the pagan practices of needless pollution. I hope it receives the substantial and overwhelming support of this House.

A SOUND ARGUMENT AGAINST FUTILITY

Louisville, which has as great a stake in efforts to control stream pollution as any community we can think of, doubtless will find itself on the side of the spokesmen for legislation with teeth in it, for machinery of control that will work. Their testimony before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives bore strong and plausible conviction that only through Federal action may effective programs be established. Time runs out, and public tolerance of piecemeal control by State and local authorities runs out with it.

As Tom Wallace, editor of the Louisville Times, pointed out to the committee, so-called local control is too likely to be amenable to local pressures for advantage and immunity, and the best results of the best conceived and best administered programs elsewhere upon a stream of common contacts will go for nothing. The frustration and hopelessness of communities, whose good intentions and sound plans are ruined because other communities in other States in upper reaches of a stream fall short, was described effectively also by another Kentuckian, Alfred LeFaber, of Ashland.

Presentation of the National Old-Age Pension Plan to the Ways and Means Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 13, 1946

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the value and importance of the national old-age pension program has come to be generally recognized. Many nations are further advanced in the application of this great humanitarian principle than our country.

The Congress, recognizing the need for old-age security has given our country a social-security program, largely controlled by and contributed to by the several State governments, a plan which has proven inequitable and difficult to administer.

It has been my privilege to appear before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in support of a national old-age pension program to be administered by the Federal Government with pensions to be paid directly to the beneficiaries just as retirement pay for Army officers, veterans, and Government employees.

The record of this presentation is inserted herewith:

STATEMENT OF HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE FIRST DISTRICT OF IDAHO

Chairman DOUGHTON. Give your name and address for the benefit of the record.

Congressman WHITE. Congressman COMPTON I. WHITE, a Member of Congress of the First District of Idaho.

I am in active support, Mr. Chairman, of a national old-age pension plan to be paid directly to the senior citizens just the same as the retirement pay for Army officers, veterans, and Government employees. I think that pensions are an adopted policy of the Government, and I am in favor of extending this national pension program to the senior citizens of this country.

And in support of this plan I want to read to the committee briefly from a statement made by a great national leader to a joint session of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, attended by representatives of the Supreme Court and the Diplomatic Corps.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Who is the statement by?

Chairman DOUGHTON. Mr. Congressman, Mr. EBERHARTER wants to know who the statement is by.

Congressman WHITE. I will give you the author at the end of the statement, if you will bear with me.

Mr. EBERHARTER. All right.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

"There is nothing mysterious about the foundations of a healthy and strong democracy. The basic things expected by our people of their political and economic systems are simple. They are:

"Equality of opportunity for youth and for others.

"Jobs for those who can work.

"Security for those who need it.

"The ending of special privilege for the few.

"The preservation of civil liberties for all.

"The enjoyment of the fruits of scientific progress in a wider and constantly rising standard of living.

"These are the simple and basic things that must never be lost sight of in the turmoil and unbelievable complexity of our modern world. The inner and abiding strength of our economic and political systems is dependent upon the degree to which they fulfill these expectations.

"Many subjects connected with our social economy call for immediate improvement.

"As examples:

"We should bring more citizens under the coverage of old-age pensions and unemployployment insurance.

"We should widen the opportunities for adequate medical care.

"We should plan a better system by which persons deserving or needing gainful employment may obtain it.

"I have called for personal sacrifice. I am assured of the willingness of almost all Americans to respond to that call.

"A part of the sacrifice means the payment of more money in taxes. In my Budget message I recommend that a greater portion of this great defense program be paid for from taxation than we are paying today. No person should try, or be allowed, to get rich out of this program, and the principle of tax payments in accordance with ability to pay should be constantly before our eyes to guide our legislation.

"If the Congress maintains these principles the voters, putting patriotism ahead of pocketbooks, will give you their applause.

"In the future days, which we seek to make secure, we look forward to a world founded upon four essential human freedoms.

"The first is freedom of speech and expression everywhere in the world.

"The second is freedom of every person to worship God in his own way everywhere in the world.

"The third is freedom from want, which, translated into world terms, means economic understandings which will secure to every nation a healthy peacetime life for its inhabitants everywhere in the world.

"The fourth is freedom from fear.

"Since the beginning of our American history we have been engaged in change—in a perpetual peaceful revolution—a revolution which goes on steadily, quietly adjusting itself to changing conditions—without the concentration camp or the quicklime in the ditch. The world order which we seek is the cooperation of free countries, working together in a friendly, civilized society.

"This Nation has placed its destiny in the hands and heads and hearts of its millions of free men and women; and its faith in freedom under the guidance of God. Freedom means the supremacy of human rights everywhere. Our support goes to those who struggle to gain those rights or keep them. Our strength is in our unity of purpose."

That, Mr. Chairman, was a speech delivered in the House of Representatives and to Members of the Senate and attended by the members of the Supreme Court on January 6, 1941, by that great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Now, he was President how long?

Congressman WHITE. He was President for almost 12 years.

Chairman DOUGHTON. How long?

Congressman WHITE. Twelve years.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Twelve or thirteen years?

Congressman WHITE. Yes, sir.

Chairman DOUGHTON. We had this question up many times during the time he was President.

Congressman WHITE. He said we were making a gradual revolution and a gradual change.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Just a minute. Did he ever endorse the Townsend plan?

Congressman WHITE. If that speech does not endorse its principles, I do not know what does.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Just a minute. Answer my question.

Congressman WHITE. That speech certainly endorses the Townsend plan.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Why did he not send endorsement to the committee directly on the subject? I discussed social security with him many times, and he never intimated it to me that he favored the Townsend plan.

Congressman WHITE. We had the States in some places paying one size pension and in other places paying another. Let us make it an equitable thing. Let us extend it to all of the people. That is what I am here before you for.

Chairman DOUGHTON. He never intimated to me he was for the Townsend plan.

Congressman WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in the name or the terms.

Chairman DOUGHTON. I do not like to hear you talk like that when you have intimated President Roosevelt was in favor of the Townsend plan.

Congressman WHITE. I am here interested in a great humanitarian principle; a forward step. Sometimes I think the little countries with small resources like Sweden and Norway——

Chairman DOUGHTON. I am not talking about whether we achieve or whether I favor the Townsend plan or not, but I do say that President Roosevelt never told me he favored it. They started at $200 a month and got down to $60; how could he have known their plan when they never stuck to any plan themselves?

Congressman WHITE. I am submitting a plan in favor of the national old-age pension.

Chairman DOUGHTON. I asked Mr. Roosevelt whether he was going to come out for the Townsend plan when hardly anybody knew of it. He said he was not for it. It started out at $200 a month and now it has gotten down to $60.

Congressman WHITE. What interpretation would you put on his speech here?

Chairman DOUGHTON. Just a minute. Was President Roosevelt for the $200 a month or for the $60 a month, or what was he for? Can you tell me what he was for?

Congressman WHITE. I will leave that amount for the wisdom of this committee.

Chairman DOUGHTON. I think I am entitled to an answer to that.

Congressman WHITE. Let the committee set the amount and plan and premium and the payments by themselves, but let us follow through with this pension plan. We have pensioned our Army officers, we have pensioned our naval officers, and we have pensioned the Government workers and God knows they have an easy time of it, and why not pension the veterans of industry?

Chairman DOUGHTON. The only question I asked you, and why ramble around the world, was whether or not President Roosevelt was in favor of the Townsend plan. I challenge you as to whether or not President Roosevelt ever came out for this plan. You say he did.

Congressman WHITE. I want to read one statement from this speech. He said, "We should bring more citizens under the coverage of old-age pension and unemployment insurance."

Chairman DOUGHTON. I do not think a dead man ought to be charged with things which in my own mind he never favored.

Congressman WHITE. I think with all respect to the committee and the party leader, he did.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Did he ever tell you that?

Congressman WHITE. His speech says that I think I am squarely in line with Thomas Jefferson.

Chairman DOUGHTON. How the Townsend people would have gloried if they could have gotten a direct statement from President Roosevelt that he was for their plan.

I challenge that statement. I discussed social security with him at length at different times, and this is the first time I ever heard he was for the Townsend plan.

Congressman WHITE. I quoted his own words.

Chairman DOUGHTON. I am not saying the Townsend plan is wrong or that it is right, but I am talking about what President Roosevelt stood for.

Congressman WHITE. I adhere to the principles laid down by George Washington, and which are quoted to us on every Washington's Birthday, and I have always subscribed to the principles laid down in Washington's Farewell Address. I also subscribe to the principles laid down in President Roosevelt's speech made on January 6, 1941, quoted here.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Did he name the Townsend plan in it?

Congressman WHITE. I am not going to quibble over the name. I am simply in support of the bill and the principle.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Did he name $200 or $60 a month or whether or not there should be a pension to people in need?

Congressman WHITE. I just quoted the words.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Of course he did not. He would not have stood for a thing like that, to pension millionaires. He was the greatest humanitarian that we have ever known.

Congressman WHITE. I was startled, Mr. Chairman, when I learned of the Beveridge plan in England and that it was presented as a great social advance, but I never dreamed that the English expected us to finance it. Why should we finance an old-age pension plan in England and leave our elder citizens out in the cold? I blush for my country, Mr. Chairman, if we do take the taxpayers' money, after all we have done for England, and pay their pension plan by making the British loan. Why should we foot the bill for the senior citizens of England and leave the old people here in need? We have coming a new generation where babies are born into the world naked, people who grow into manhood, and we have not even the reverence for our ancestors that the poor heathen Chinese have.

Chairman DOUGHTON. I have told you, Mr. Congressman, that President Roosevelt was not for the Townsend plan.

Congressman WHITE. I am in support of this idea to meet the needs and comforts of our senior citizens who preserved the heritage of America, so that when we turn this country into the keeping of a new generation and they come into the heritage of all that the passing generation has built and preserved for them that their benefactor the toilers can be supported in ease and comfort.

Why should we pay foreign people and why should we support them when our own people who are old need help after a lifetime of toil and who need retirement?

I am for a national old-age pension and have always been.

Chairman DOUGHTON. If we were to sanction or passed a law which allowed for a pension in England, that would be one thing, but we have not done that. You are putting up a man of straw and knocking it down again.

Congressman WHITE. You cannot disregard the fact that the English are asking for $3,700,000,000 after our having given them $29,000,000,000, and we are taxing the American taxpayers for that, and I do not think you can escape that fact.

Chairman DOUGHTON. That has not been done.

Congressman WHITE. If the Beveridge plan is adopted in England as it has been, and $3,700,000,000 of our revenue and taxpayers' income flows to England, how are you going to escape the fact that we are financing old-age pensions in England to the neglect of the senior citizens in this country? Can we escape that fact?

Chairman DOUGHTON. Do you want an answer to that?

Congressman WHITE. I would like an answer.

Chairman DOUGHTON. In the first place, I have heard nothing about financing a pension plan in England.

Congressman WHITE. The gentleman is not financing England?

Chairman DOUGHTON. Are you for financing an old-age pension in England?

Congressman WHITE. I am not. Let England finance it with its own money.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Then why raise that issue here?

Congressman WHITE. I am very definitely opposed to financing anything in England.

Think of the $29,000,000,000 and our own sacrifices we have made to support the British Empire, and now they come along with a plan for us to pay $3,750,000,000 to finance England, and the Beveridge plan is a part of it. We cannot escape that fact. We are neglecting our oldsters in this country to pension and finance a pension plan for senior citizens in England.

Chairman DOUGHTON. But we have not done that yet, and I do not know of anybody that wants to do it.

Congressman WHITE. Certainly not myself, and I hope the chairman does not want to.

Chairman DOUGHTON. You are putting up an entirely imaginary proposition. You say you do not want to finance a pension plan in England?

Congressman WHITE. I certainly do not.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Then why point that out as an argument to base a similar argument upon when you are against it? Everybody is against it so far as I know.

Congressman WHITE. I think you will agree with me that if a child is born in this country, no matter what station of life he is in, he has the birthright to an education.

Chairman DOUGHTON. You cannot argue that with me.

Congressman WHITE. The Government of the United States sees to it that a child is entitled to an education.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Who disputes that?

Congressman WHITE. I contend that if that is a birthright then why not give it attention when it grows old.

Chairman DOUGHTON. You might just as well say that everybody wants to draw a breath. What has that got to do with this?

Congressman WHITE. This is another birthright. Let us do this thing. Let us expand it more. It is a forward step. Let us provide that every citizen is entitled to his keep in comfort when he has reached the age of retirement.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Notwithstanding he may have double comfort and that it may go to many people who do not need it?

Congressman WHITE. Mr. Chairman, you cannot single out certain people. You do not pension selected Army officers. You pension all of them. You pension all of the Navy people and all of these Government people. Some of those men are getting five or six or seven thousand dollars and they have got a wife on $3,000 or $4,000 a year.

Chairman DOUGHTON. But they have paid in on that.

Congressman WHITE. Let us make this national old-age pension plan universal.

Chairman DOUGHTON. They have helped on that themselves.

Congressman WHITE. But the Government's contribution to pension Federal employees is very substantial.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Certainly, but it is on the basis of what service they have rendered the Government.

Congressman WHITE. You can take an industrious farmer and many a poor housewife who attends to her dairy duties, who tends to her home, and if their pay were raised along in line with Naval and Army officers and these easy-time Government employees down here they would get a good deal more compensation and be able to lay up a competence for declining years.

What are you going to do in a depression, takes taxes away from these poor people, such as social security and otherwise? Let us make a greater humanitarian step, let us follow the example of the Scandinavian countries, where they have a liberal old-age pension system far better than ours. In Sweden their old-age pension laws are away ahead of ours. We ought to be ashamed of ourselves, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman DOUGHTON. This plan proposes to pay pensions based on taxes collected each year.

Congressman WHITE. Yes.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Now, if a depression comes on what will we do?

Congressman WHITE. This pension fund in circulation would be a cushion.

Chairman DOUGHTON. You do not set aside any fund.

Congressman WHITE. This financial plan would be a cushion against depression.

Chairman DOUGHTON. You do not provide any fund, but you pay it out as fast as you get it.

Congressman WHITE. If——

Chairman DOUGHTON (interposing). Then, if there comes a depression, which you are talking about, nobody has anything, can you answer as to what they are going to do then?

Congressman WHITE. If the Government performs its prerogative and supplies the money function the circulation of money by the old-age pension will take care of it. You and I in the 12 years we have been here when there was a failure of the money supply know that we have had to appropriate $62,000,000,000 from the Federal Treasury for work relief in an effect to overcome the depression.

And that money was spent before we had taken on a global war. We find ourselves now in debt over $300,000,000,000, but $62,000,000,000 was appropriated, so there might be money to flow into the channels of trade and business, and this pension plan will be the cushion that sustains business, Mr. Chairman, money will flow readily, and we will raise that money just as the country would get it from any other source.

Chairman DOUGHTON. I thought this was predicated on the fact that the Townsend people believes we would not have any depressions at all.

Congressman WHITE. That is right. This pension plan is a financial cushion.

Chairman DOUGHTON. I thought you said it would prevent it.

Congressman WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I certainly appreciate the interest of the chairman, for whom I have a great deal of affection.

I think the Townsend plan is a great forward step.

Chairman DOUGHTON. The chairman does not take any stand on that at all.

Congressman WHITE. It certainly is in accord with the President's speech. I hope the American people will do better than adopt the ideals of the heathen Chinese and pay a little more attention to their parents—and to the passing generation that has bequeathed them so much.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Would you be in favor of adopting the Chinese form of government for ours?

Congressman WHITE. In every nation there are some things that are good and some things that are not.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Would you be in favor of changing our form of government?

Congressman WHITE. Not at all.

Very few people know that our CCC plan was borrowed from Bulgaria. We are adopting the good things of other countries every day. We are adopting the good where we find it. If we find good in the Chinese ideals I am in favor of adopting it. But I do not want to leave my closing statement just in regard to the Chinese.

I do say that I am unalterably in favor of a national old-age pension for the senior citizens of the United States.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Will you get this from me into the record: That I have expressed no opinion so far as the Townsend plan is concerned.

Congressman WHITE. The term is assembled, if Your Honor please, to indicate that we are in favor of a liberal old-age plan of pensions.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Have you finished?

Congressman WHITE. I have.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Mr. EBERHARTER.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. White, do you think the Beveridge plan is a good plan for England?

Congressman WHITE. I think it has some humanitarian principles in it. I will have to confess I have not made a thorough digest and close analysis of the plan, but it is a plan to make life easier and more secure for the toilers of England than they formerly enjoyed, and it is advancement over present conditions, and a good part of it I am in favor of up to this time.

Mr. EBERHARTER. In other words, it is a plan to care for every English citizen from the cradle to the grave, and you realize that, being a great humanitarian; is not that true?

Congressman WHITE. I stop with taking money from the American taxpayers to finance this English social program.

Mr. EBERHARTER. No; no. Answer my question. Are you in favor of the Beveridge plan for the people of England?

Congressman WHITE. If I was in charge of the Beveridge plan I would expect to weigh and consider all of the plans on their economy and adopt a constructive program. That is the same way I would do it here if I had anything to do with it.

There is an old saying, to never ask a man to do a thing you would not be willing to go and do yourself. I have followed that as a rule from man to man. I never asked a Congressman to do something I would not do myself, so I would not ask you to do more with the Beveridge plan on your money than to weigh all the facts, proceed accordingly.

Mr. EBERHARTER. In other words, you do not know whether you are in favor of the Beveridge plan?

Congressman WHITE. I will have to be frank; I have not weighed or digested it fully. It may be a good thing in England.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Do you know whether the Beveridge plan calls for a contribution by the workers of England for financing it?

Congressman WHITE. Like all things, it needs financing.

Mr. EBERHARTER. You do not know?

Congressman WHITE. However, the taxes are always channeled. It all comes from the people who pay taxes, whether the money comes through a sales tax or an income tax, and there are several channels. It is like several rivers flowing into one reservoir.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I just want to ask you one question. Do you know whether the Beveridge plan is called a contributary plan? Answer that yes or no.

Congressman WHITE. I do not know.

Mr. EBERHARTER. All right; that is what I wanted to know.

Congressman WHITE. The Beveridge plan is not under consideration here and I do not want to take the time, and all of my interrupted duties as Congressman, to sit down and analyze, and study, and do the research work which was necessary. If a Congressman had more help in their offices to make research there are many things for study that would be resolved which we cannot get around to by doing the necessary research work, and if there is anything that a Congressman needs it is help for research or assistance in analyzing the great variety of plans and policies that come up for consideration.

Mr. EBERHARTER. That is obvious.

Congressman WHITE. I have not been able to analyze and go into the essence of the Beveridge plan.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Just answer this question if you can, Mr. WHITE. Do you think it is easier to finance a pension plan from the standpoint of the taxpayer in the form of a contribution by a fund, easier in depression times than it would be in times of great prosperity?

Congressman WHITE. I hope the wisdom of the Congress will be able to prevent these depressions in future times by passing a constructive old-age and recovery pension law.

I hope to get stabilized economy so there won't be depressions and yet we will secure the ordinary revenue. Many States have found it expedient to raise their money by a sales tax. If that is a good thing and this is a great forward step why should it not be financed in some way?

Mr. EBERHARTER. You have no answer and no opinion in answer to my question.

Congressman WHITE. We have tried this contribution method before, and the real sufferer is the contributor because he has little or nothing to contribute when he is out of a job. In some States the workers have a low income even in their productive years and those people do not get the same compensation as they do in other States. This present system is inequitable. Some States are prosperous and the beneficiaries receive a higher income than they do in other States. The thing is unequal and should be revised and should be brought up to date and modernized, and we are here before you for that very purpose, to get, if we can, the support of this committee to bring out a constructive piece of legislation to embody the principles of a national old-age pension program so that we can have national legislation and advance the welfare of the whole country, and change the outlook of the man employed in his prime so that he will have security for the future in his old age.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and the rest of the committee for your kind attention.

Chairman DOUGHTON. You have been very considerate of the committee. You have been very courteous.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, there are quite a number of our fellow Members who have signed a petition which has been filed with the clerk, showing their interest in this program, and I ask leave to have that printed in the record.

Chairman DOUGHTON. That has not a thing to do with this hearing.

Mr. EBERHARTER. It is a petition to the committee?

Mr. ANGELL. Yes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Is it very long, Mr. ANGELL?

Mr. ANGELL. It is about four or five lines, showing their names.

Chairman DOUGHTON. Then let it be submitted. Without objection we will put the petition in.

Mr. ANGELL. Thank you, sir.

Congressman WHITE. I would like to have the privilege of revising my remarks, as most of my remarks were impromptu.

Chairman DOUGHTON. You may have that privilege.

At this time we will adjourn without date.

(Whereupon, at 5:20 p. m. the committee adjourned sine die.)

OPA

OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, should Congress reenact the OPA and include ceiling prices on livestock and grain products, it will create confusion and chaos. Certainly no one believes that we can, by legislative enactment, force these commodities back under ceiling prices without creating serious loss to the farmers, livestock producers, and processors of these commodities.

Consumers will no doubt argue, and rightfully so, that the prices of meat and grain products have risen since the death of the OPA. However, it must be remembered that subsidies are eliminated, and in most cases the prices have not risen much above the subsidy paid the producer or processor. With the elimination of subsidies the American people are now paying their honest grocery bills. Food subsidies have always been a fraud on the American people and must be paid indirectly by our people. We have been spending over $2,000,000,000 a year in food subsidies, and this adds to the inflationary pressure.

I have received a number of telegrams from livestock producers, farmers, millers, and meat packers urging caution in the reenactment of any price ceilings on these commodities. If these ceilings are reenacted, the black markets of the recent past will look like a Sunday-school picnic compared with those of the future.

The following wire from Elmer Read, vice president of the Shellabarger Mill, Inc., of Salina, Kans., is typical of many I have received:

After operating 1 week without OPA it seems definitely proven that the forecasts of doom emanating from Chester Bowles and other OPA exponents have no foundation. Should there be a few weeks delay in reinstating OPA I really believe the people will find they don't need them and that supply and demand is a better equalizer of consumption than any regulations imposed by an agency. There is a steadily increasing sentiment for excluding meat and livestock. I feel any argument for exclusion of livestock applies equally to grain and grain products. Also, feel same arguments apply substantially everything else covered, with the exception of rents. Actual operation of free-market grain has simply meant grain moving at previous black-market values, with some instances of lower prices prevailing than were common on the black market prior July 1. Even originating as much producer grain as we do, we had just about reached the point June 30 where we had to consider whether we should pay black-market values for wheat or face curtailment of operations for our mills during present crop. We sincerely hope there is no return to that situation. While present values look high, have seen no publicity in connection with price advances that recognizes the greater part of these advances was the elimination of subsidies. Believe no reasonably minded individual can defend continuation of subsidies under present conditions. I sincerely hope OPA extension bill can be blocked with a simple rent-control provision of some kind to tide over temporarily.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include a letter written by the Atlantic City Chamber of Commerce to the President of the United States, indicating their complete cooperation in an endeavor to hold prices within moderate bounds. Their cooperation was instantaneous, and I believe is proving to be effective. The letter follows:

ATLANTIC CITY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Atlantic City, N. J., July 6, 1946.
The Honorable HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR PRESIDENT TRUMAN: We felt sure you would be interested in the action of a group of our local merchants in cooperation with the Atlantic City Press-Union newspapers as a consequence of your plea for a hold-the-line policy in prices upon the discontinuance of OPA after June 30.

At a meeting of several leading local merchants and representatives of the newspaper on Monday, July 1, it was decided to make an intensive drive for the immediate cooperation of all merchants in inserting at a special low rate their individual and collective advertisements stating their plan to go along with your suggestion. Within a few hours approximately 100 of the leading business institutions of the community had agreed to the plan, and the enclosed clipping showing the collective advertisement is the result.

In addition, there were a number of separate individual advertisements.

You may be sure we will do everything in our power to keep down inflation here in Atlantic City from the standpoint of all merchandise, rents, etc.

Respectfully yours,

F. W. AMSTUTZ,
Secretary-Executive Manager.

Chaotic State of World Affairs Requires Approval of British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the News of Washington, D. C., a Scripps-Howard publication, had a brief editorial in its issue of July 8, endorsing the British loan, and giving cogent reasons therefor, and under leave granted, same is submitted herewith:

OUR FOREIGN POLICY

Th United States did not have a firm foreign policy during the war. All other considerations were subordinated to the single idea of winning the war, which to most of us meant the defeat of Germany, Italy, and Japan.

Their defeat was accomplished. But victory has brought neither security nor peace.

By the bad deals we made at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam we built up Russia to the point where today totalitarianism is as much of a threat to civilization as it was in 1938.

We have been in process of formulating a foreign policy the last few months, throwing the pieces together almost on the run. But we will kick the principal prop right out from under that embryo policy if the House of Representatives votes against the British loan, as it seems politically tempted to do.

We are holding the bag anyway. But we will be holding it alone if we refuse the loan.

The American loan is essential to British recovery.

If it is voted down, we will have isolated ourselves from at least one strong friend.

In the present chaotic state of world affairs that would be the course of folly.

Great Britain needed our help in 1942. It may be the other way around next time. In any event, we have too much of the world's wealth to stand alone. We have disbanded our Army and Navy, and grounded our Air Force. If now we let our best friend down we will be wide open for a sucker punch. Weakness invites attack.

War is waste, and we have wasted a lot of money since the end of the war in pursuit of a will-o'-the-wisp security. We can well afford to invest a little more in sound insurance.

Government Fertilizer Plants

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1946

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 6777) making appropriations for Government corporations, is now in conference. The bill contains an item of $3,000,000 inserted by the Senate to begin the construction of a Government-owned fertilizer plant at Mobile, Ala. At the time the bill was sent to conference, the conferees were instructed by the House not to agree to the Senate amendment. The conference report has not yet been filed, but there are intimations that the matter will be brought back to the House for another vote.

I voted to instruct the conferees to disagree to this Senate amendment for the reason that I do not believe it is a wise thing for the Federal Government to build and operate fertilizer plants unless very strong and compelling reasons can be shown as to the necessity for such a policy. In the case of the proposed Mobile plant, the House has had no opportunity to consider the proposal and I am advised that the matter was not extensively discussed in the Senate or in the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Before the Government goes into the fertilizer business, I believe there should be thorough consideration by the legislative committees in Congress which have jurisdiction over such matters. For many months, there has been pending before the House and Senate Committees on Agriculture the so-called Bankhead-Hill-Flannagan fertilizer bill. No hearings have been held in the House on this measure. I trust and hope that in this Congress or the next, there will be hearings on this measure. I think the question is one which should be given consideration. It is of such importance, however, that no action should be taken until adequate hearings have been held.

This is the view which is taken by the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, one of the great farm organizations of this country. In reply to an inquiry which I recently made as to the position of that organization on this appropriation, I received a letter from Mr. John H. Davis, executive secretary. Under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include that letter herewith:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF FARMER COOPERATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 8, 1946.

Hon. CLIFFORD R. HOPE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HOPE: This acknowledges your letter of July 8 inquiring as to our views regarding the $3,000,000 item in the Government appropriation bill for a Government fertilizer plant at Mobile, Ala.

The council has not established a policy either favoring or opposing such a plant. However, as a general policy we have consistently opposed direct Government operation of business in fields where private business, including cooperatives, could perform the essential functions.

As you point out in your letter, this item was put in the appropriation bill with very limited hearings in the Senate, and with no discussion in the House other than a brief consideration of the motion to instruct the House conferees to disagree to the amendment inserted by the Senate. We believe the Congress should not proceed with such an appropriation until adequate hearings are held, since the establishment of such a Government-owned plant would be setting a precedent for Government-owned business which might be far reaching in future years. Therefore, we urge that this item be deleted from the pending appropriation bill, since adequate hearings cannot now be held.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. DAVIS,
Executive Secretary.

Rivalry of Competing Engineering Bureaus Prevents Construction of Much-Needed Projects—Congress Must Face and Settle These Irritating Issues in the Interest of the Public Welfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, for years the people residing in the Tulare Lake Basin and the Kings River drainage area of California, long sufferers from recurring floods and periodic irrigation water scarcities, have planned for the construction of a great dam at Pine Flat on the Kings River which would provide them with protection against the whimsies of this utterly unpredictable watercourse.

As to the necessity of the construction of flood control and reclamation works at Pine Flat, there is no disagreement. All governmental agencies that have investigated and reported on the conditions existing in this area enthuse over the project. There is no dispute over the engineering phases of it, the place where the proposed dam should be constructed, the size and character of the works, nor in regard to the cost estimates. Insofar as the physical facts are concerned, everyone is in agreement in respect to what must be done in order to bring the waters of this unpredictable river under control.

But, unfortunately for the people whose interest swould be served by the construction of the project, a rivalry has developed between the United States Army engineers and the engineers of the Bureau of Reclamation for the construction job which has brought all planning for water control on the Kings River to a complete stop. Until it is determined once and for all just who is to build Pine Flat, the Army engineers under the Army authorization, or the Bureau of Reclamation under the provisions of the reclamation law, the project will remain just another unrealized dream—and the people will continue to suffer from alternate parching and inundation of their lands.

Impressed with the necessity of bringing this impossible situation to a close, an enlightened editor who resides in the area to be benefited through the realization of the project, Mr. A. J. Houge, has suggested in a most timely editorial which appeared in the Reedley Exponent of May 16, 1946, a basis for a proposed compromise which should have, and, I believe, will be accorded, the careful consideration of all who want to see an end to this profitless controversy and the commencement of construction activities within the foreseeable future. If we are ever to see "dirt fly" on this project, some compromise, the one suggested by Mr. Houge, or another that can be agreed upon, must be assented to.

Because I believe that Mr. Houge's thought-provoking editorial should be called to the attention of Washington officialdom, as well as to those who live within the circulation area of the Reedley Exponent, I offer it for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my instant remarks. It is:

WHY NOT COMPROMISE?

When a dispute between two organizations reaches the point of impasse, it is time that a compromise solution be made and enforced upon the disputants.

That stage has almost been reached in the present controversy between the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation over who shall build the dams required for California's water program. If some kind of solution is not found soon, parts of the State water program will suffer irreparable delay.

What we in southeastern Fresno County are now most concerned about is the status of the Pine Flat project, which has been handed first to one agency, then the other, taken away from one or the other or both and entwined in such a mesh of argument and controversy that the average citizen is in a high state of confusion about the whole matter.

The dispute between the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation, however, can be reduced to one basic argument: Shall the irrigation land in California be reserved for many owners of small family-sized farms, or shall some large landowners be allowed to maintain and increase their holdings as has been the case in the past?

If we were to resolve this dispute in some kind of compromise, we'd have to recognize, first, the rights of the people who over a period of past years have built up and developed their farms and ranches, adding more and more land and by the application of efficiency, thrift, and industry made themselves wealthy owners of large acreages.

A compromise agreement, therefore, probably would have to start out with the provision that present holdings not be disturbed. We might go further, and stipulate that in the course of normal inheritance the lands could be passed down from parents to children as long as they remained within present families.

This compromise might say that present large holdings not be increased by adding further lands irrigated by public development projects.

Against the rights of landowners who have built up extensive holdings over long-time operations, we have the argument that any irrigation projects built with public funds should not be used to make a few rich men richer. The water should be spread out over as many individuals as possible, used on a large number of family-size farms.

To satisfy this argumen', our compromise would provide that any future development of land under Federal irrigation projects be based on the family-size farm idea. The Bureau of Reclamation, for instance, would limit its waters to 160 acres for any individual, or 320 acres for a man and wife. In line with this provision, if a 10,000-acre ranch getting water from a Federal project were to be disposed of by its present owner, it would not be sold intact to a single new owner, but would have to be split up into 160- or 320-acre tracts for sale to small farmers.

We have no delusions that this kind of plan would satisfy both sides of the argument completely—no compromise ever did. But we offer it as a suggested starting point for a new effort to settle this long-standing dispute. We offer it because it seems now that the argument has gone long enough, and that the longer it goes, the slower will be the development of California's water resources.

It's time that a basic policy be determined for the use of California's irrigated land. With that done, Congress can tell the Bureau and the Army engineers to go ahead, work together, and carry on the development California awaits.

Immediate Statehood for Hawaii Asked by National Education Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON
DELEGATE FROM HAWAII
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, at its annual convention in Buffalo on July 5, the National Education Association adopted a resolution supporting statehood for Hawaii, as follows:

Moved that the National Education Association go on record as favoring statehood for Hawaii in the immediate future; and that we urge all of our members and affiliated State and local groups to exert every influence to promote action by Congress.

Submitted by Melvin B. Hill, New York.
Seconded by Leland M. Pryor, California.

The resolution was introduced by the New York State delegation and seconded by the State delegations from Washington, California, Oregon, and Arizona. It was passed unanimously.

In asking adoption of the resolution, Robert W. Clopton, assistant professor, University of Hawaii, Honolulu, T. H., and a member of the delegation from Hawaii, made the following speech:

This year we come not alone to amuse and entertain. We ask you, here in your capacity as delegates, and in your own communities as teachers and as citizens, to support us in our efforts to secure statehood for Hawaii in the immediate future.

As an incorporated Territory, an integral part of the United States of America, we now occupy exactly the same status which many of our present States once occupied. Only Congress, which is made up of Representatives and Senators from your States, can place Hawaii on an equal footing with the States. We, as a Territory, have no vote in Congress. We ask you to take our message back to your homes, to use your influence with your fellow citizens, and with the Senators and Representatives of your States, to gain support for our bid for Statehood.

Territorial status is an inferior status. We were willing to accept this inferior status as a temporary, transitional organization during which we were afforded opportunity to demonstrate our worthiness to full-fledged membership in the great family of States that is our Nation. But in our 48 years as an incorporated Territory we have fully demonstrated our capacity for self-government and our unfailing loyalty to American ideals.

We are Americans by tradition. We have a tradition of American influence and American ideals dating back more than a century and a quarter. Our government, our customs, our institutions, our language, and our schools were so thoroughly in accord with American ideals and practices that only very minor changes had to be effected when the flag of the Republic of Hawaii was lowered and the Stars and Stripes were hoisted in Honolulu in 1898.

We came into the United States joyfully and of our own free will. Our union was the culmination of almost half a century of hoping and planning. We wanted to be American, and now for 48 years we have been American, in deed and thought and heart, as well as in name.

We are Americans by birth. More than 85 percent of the population of Hawaii is composed of native-born American citizens.

We have much to contribute to our Nation. The ideals of democracy have reached a degree of fulfillment in Hawaii which has not been achieved in many of our States. Not only in legislation, but in actual practice, to a degree hardly believable to many who have seen it, we have eliminated racial discrimination. We are demonstrating to the Nation and to the world that people of many races and creeds can live together in active and friendly and pleasant cooperation and mutual regard. We actually believe and practice the ideals of democracy and Americanism in this regard. And we submit to you that it will be a distinct gain to the forces of practical democracy when we become a State and have two Senators and two Representatives to Congress who will, in their votes on social legislation, reflect our conviction in the soundness of basic democratic principles.

A question is sometimes raised here on the mainland about the Americanism and loyalty of the 32 percent of our population which is of Japanese derivation. We know that they are loyal to American ideals and principles. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has certified that not one instance of sabotage or treason was discovered among the Japanese in Hawaii before, on, or after December 7, 1941.

But more important than the absence of disloyalty is the evidence of an active and inspiring loyalty. The Japanese group constituted 52 percent of Hawaii's inductions into the armed services, in spite of the fact that they were not accepted even as volunteers until 1943, and were not included in the draft until 1944. These men served gloriously. The record of the One Hundredth Battalion and the Four Hundred and Forty-second Combat Team in Italy and France is unequaled for bravery and devotion to duty. More than one-third of the entire number of soldiers of Japanese ancestry received the Purple Heart for wounds received in action. Four out of five of the soldiers from Hawaii who were killed in action were men of Japanese descent.

In the war in the Pacific, Japanese-Americans from Hawaii in the interpreters' corps served to interrogate prisoners and to translate captured Japanese documents. General Willoughby, who was intelligence chief for General MacArthur, said the war would have lasted 2 years longer if it had not been for these Americans of Japanese ancestry. Every campaign, he said, was based on information they gained.

This group is combined with the other two-thirds of our population in a loyal American community qualified to take its place as a State.

The question of statehood for Hawaii will be discussed in your State, in your community. Your Senators and Representatives will vote one way or the other when the matter comes on the floor of Congress. We ask you to use your influence to secure for Hawaii the rights of statehood now.

For this you will earn the gratitude and aloha of the teachers and other citizens of our forty-ninth State—the State of Hawaii. Mahalo.

The British Credit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRENT SPENCE
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1946

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of July 9, 1946:

THE BRITISH CREDIT

The House of Representatives has begun final consideration of a measure which is as important for our safety, for the preservation of our way of life, and for the realization of the aims for which we fought as any measure Congress has been asked to pass upon thus far. This measure is the Anglo-American trade and financial agreement of last December, extending to Great Britain what is generally referred to as a loan of $3,750,000,000, but what is really a line of credit permitting our wartime ally to draw up to that amount over a period of 5 years if it finds this necessary in order to free itself from the more onerous economic shackles imposed upon it by the war and resume its place beside the United States as a champion of economic cooperation and economic freedom, which are the essential bases of a free and peaceful world.

To the outside world this credit has become the touchstone of America's policy and intentions after the war. Our readiness or unreadiness to grant this credit must decide whether the United States is willing to do its share toward world reconstruction on the basis of free, normal, and healthy trade, or whether the nations hard hit by the war must continue and even expand and tighten that vast system of economic regimentation and discriminatory financial and trade controls which are the forerunners of political regimentation and ultimate conflict. Our action here must decide, in short, whether the world shall look to the American or to the Russian system for salvation, and whether the United States is to be a leader in the postwar world or whether it prefers to retire to an economic isolation which would quickly nullify the gains of its conversion to international political collaboration.

It is for these reasons that both President Truman and Secretary Byrnes have sent urgent appeals to the House to approve this agreement. As Mr. Truman said, this plan is an integral part of our whole international economic policy, which Congress has already indorsed. Without this agreement it will be difficult, if not impossible, to proceed with the United Nations program for international cooperation. Without it, the prospect is not economic cooperation, but conflict in economic policy between the two greatest trading nations in the world—conflict which would not only be disastrous to the well-being of both countries, but would also endanger the peace and security of the whole world. Secretary Byrnes, struggling in Paris for a tolerable peace in the face of the handicaps already imposed upon him by congressional neglect of America's military power, adds the warning that political peace is not enough, and will not endure, if the world is again split into economic blocs waging economic warfare against one another.

Viewed in this light, the credit agreement far surpasses any benefit to be derived from it by American industry and our export business. It is to be hoped that the House will see the matter in this light, and—undeterred by extraneous issues—follow the way already pointed by the Senate and its own Banking and Currency Committee—a way that leads to a decisive approval. The whole program of world recovery, and with it peace and security, now hinge on this action.

It Is Your Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "It Is Your Congress," delivered by me at the biennial convention of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc., at Cleveland, Ohio, on July 9, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am pleased to discuss with the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc., the subject It Is Your Congress. These are dark days, not only in other parts of the world but right here in our own country. Unless one is completely insensitive to the social and political struggle which is taking place among our people today, he must admit that a great majority of our people are confused and perplexed about governmental trends in America. They are disturbed about the objectives of Government. They are worried about the question, "Where and what are we coming to?" I do not have the answer to that question, but I have no hesitancy in saying that the difficulties which confront us are of our own making.

The responsibility for governmental policies in this country cannot be placed upon the shoulders of Government officials alone but must be borne by the rank-and-file citizens of this country. They are the Government and when they cease being the Government or to the degree that they relinquish their governmental responsibilities, the future of representative government in this country will be endangered. We Americans as a people are constantly indulging in a couple of interesting psycological escape mechanisms. We frequently seem determined to escape reality. Thus we are constantly participating in the costly psychological luxury of wishful thinking and buck passing. We seem to like to drug ourselves with the psychological opiate manifested in the frequently false belief that after all everything will work out all right and that all we need to do is wish for the best and some way, somehow, we will be able to muddle through.

Then when we are occasionally brought up short by reality and confronted with the hard, cold fact that in some phases of our national life things just have not worked out for the best and we haven't been able to muddle through, we then, as a people, are prone to rise up in psychological self-defense and pass the buck to the politicians in office. We cry out against them and make them our scapegoat and whipping post when, in truth, they have been but reflecting the thinking and desires of the rank-and-file citizens of the country. Oh, no; I don't hold any brief for the professional politicians. I do not approve of the political tactics of those politicians whose public acts seem to indicate that they are much more interested in standing for reelection than in standing for principle.

There probably has never been a time in the history of our country when it was more important that men in high political office should stand for principles and policies of statesmanship, irrespective of political consequence. It is true that we need men in high government office who are willing to exercise a complete independence of judgment on the basis of the facts and evidence as they find them, irrespective of the effects of such forthright statesmanship upon their political futures. After all, as I have said on the floor of the Senate, it is not at all important that I, or any other Member of the Senate, be returned to office, but it is important that as long as we are in the Senate, we should stand for, and fight for, principle and we should be guided, even in a period of hysteria such as has characterized this country in the last few weeks, by the basic principles and rights guaranteed by our Constitution and its Bill of Rights.

Too many politicians under the political whiplashing of various pressure groups in this country have been willing in recent weeks to sacrifice basic civil and property rights of freemen in this country. They have shown by their votes in the Congress that they were not willing to stand up against the tide of mistaken public opinion. They ignored the well-established principles of constitutional law as handed down by our Supreme Court in case after case, such as, for example, the principle that an emergency does not create power not already embodied in the Constitution of the United States. For political approval and possible reelection this fall, many of them were willing to ignore the fact that the exercise of unconstitutional power in time of emergency by the President of the United States, even though he asks for that power, undermines the very foundations of representative government.

True, it may have been smart politics for politicians to permit themselves to be swept along with the tide, yes, with what amounted almost to a typhoon of public support for ill-considered economic legislation. However, upon reflection, I believe that the American people will come to recognize that it is much better to bear the ills of temporary economic suffering than to fly to totalitarianism of government with the resulting loss to the civil and property rights of the individual. One of the major premises which I would emphasize in this speech is that the Congress is your Congress and that it is a true cross section of the American people. There are no great men in it. In fact, there really are no great men in our Government anywhere. They are simply typical Americans; that is no reflection upon our Government, but it is the greatest compliment I can pay, not only to the Congress and the other branches of Government but to representative government itself.

Oh, yes; some Members of Congress and the Government rise to greatness on some things but never forget that they are but mere men. For that matter, never forget that the Presidency does not run itself but it is run by a mere man, no matter who he may be—Democrat or Republican. I would digress a moment to point out that a very interesting psychology is developing in this country highly sinister in its implications and dangerous to the preservation of government by the people, namely, that the President as an individual should not be subject to personal criticism. That's a new conception in American political trends. It certainly has no historical support, because our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains innumerable instances throughout our history in which our Presidents have, as individuals, been roundly criticized. I trust the time will never come in this country when election of a mere man to the Presidency of the United States will surround him with immunity from personal criticism.

I would be the first to insist that criticism of the President should be based upon facts, but when the facts warrant criticism then the maintaining of the health of our body politic in this country dictates the criticism. Don't forget that in the development of totalitarian states, one of the first techniques developed by the propagandists who sold fascism to Germany and Italy and communism to Russia was the technique of placing the head of the state above criticism.

The next point that I want to stress in this speech is the premise that the substantive legislative rights of the American people are no better than their procedural legislative rights. By that I mean frankly that the type of legislation that can be passed by your Congress will be determined and controlled almost entirely by the rules and regulations and procedures of your Congress which must be followed in passing that legislation. Why is it so difficult to pass some very much-needed pieces of social and economic legislation unquestionably desired by the overwhelming majority of the American people? The answer is to be found in the fact that the procedures of the Congress have been so designed and devised by special blocs in Congress as to prevent majority rule in both the House and the Senate.

I recognize that this is an abstract problem so far as the thinking of the average citizen is concerned. However, groups, such as this group, so influential in forming public opinion could perform no greater public service than to help educate the American people to an understanding that rule by majority in this country today is being defeated by the chaotic and archaic rules of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. Those rules protected by the political interests of certain groups of men in the Congress of the United States are a great bulwark of reactionism in America. I discussed this problem at some length in an article which I published in the June 15 issue of Collier's magazine. I wish to mention only a few of the points which I commented on in that article.

It is common knowledge that 7 members of the 12-man Rules Committee of the House wield what amounts to dictatorial power over the entire House. These men have time and time again prevented important measures from being properly considered in debate by the House as a whole, or even from reaching the House floor.

The theory behind the Rules Committee is that it should act as a traffic director on the legislative highway. In actual fact, the committee has become an obstruction to orderly traffic. Like feudal barons who levied a toll upon those who used their roads, the committee often allows bills to come before the House only on the condition that certain amendments be written into them. It frequently usurps the functions of the regular legislative committees by conducting hearings on bills that already have been carefully studied by the proper legislative committee confining itself, as it should, to questions of procedure.

There have been notable occasions when the Rules Committee, in effect, has originated legislation, although it was never contemplated that it should exercise this privilege. Recently, it will be recalled, the House Labor Committee approved the kind of bill it thought would contribute to labor peace. But a majority of the Rules Committee favored the Case bill, which the legislative committee had rejected. So it ruled that the Case bill be considered by the House rather than the Labor Committee's bill.

The job of the Rules Committee is to report to the House, in conjunction with a bill, a resolution setting the terms of debate upon the measure. Often the committee blocks the legislative road completely by failing to give a bill the right-of-way to the House floor under any rule of debate. Sometimes the committee works its will upon the entire House membership by imposing "gag rules" that restrict the time allowed for debate and the circumstances under which amendments may be offered.

There is no hope for government by the majority in Congress until the rules are thoroughly overhauled to free the House and the Senate from the legislative tyranny of a willful minority in either branch. These two infections of the body politic—the powers of the Rules Committee and the filibuster—are sources of intolerance and reaction. The Rules Committee must be assigned its original role of traffic director for House bills, and the Senate must adopt rules empowering a majority to end a filibuster.

It must be made clear to the voters that their substantive rights in the passage of all sound legislation needed in the interests of the general welfare cannot be separated from their procedural rights in attaining passage of such legislation. The people must be made to realize that the archaic rules of Congress permit self-seeking minority blocs to defeat legislation the people want without letting it come to a vote.

Most writers dip their pens in despair when they attempt to make suggestions for remedying these two evils. They point out that any resolution to reform the House Rules Committee would be referred to that committee itself—which group could be expected to protect its dictatorship by quietly filing the proposal.

They call attention to the fact that the rules of the Senate have been carefully devised to protect the filibuster. A third plus one of the Senators can now prevent cloture—put a limit on the length of time a Senator may talk—thereby allowing a filibuster to continue until the legislation against which it is directed has been withdrawn or emasculated. Thus, most critics say, it is almost hopeless to propose a resolution to eliminate the filibuster because the proposal itself would be subject to the filibuster technique.

The Senate has a Rules Committee, too. Although it does not have the sweeping powers possessed by the House Rules Committee, it does have jurisdiction over any proposal to change the rules and procedures of the Senate. Judging from the past, this committee could be counted upon to bury alive any proposal referred to it which seeks to reform the procedures of the Senate in the interest of majority rule.

But the problem is not as hopeless as the experts seem to think it is, provided enough Members of the Congress have the will to make the fight. The situation calls for a two-front attack in both Houses of Congress. The time to attack is on the first day of the new Congress next January.

On the first day of a new Congress the House adopts the rules that will guide it for the next 2 years. Usually the rules of the last Congress are accepted without change, by a routine motion. But that need not be the case. During that brief period on the opening day between the time that the Speaker of the House opens the session of the new Congress and that time when the House passes a motion adopting the rules of its previous session with whatever changes it may wish to authorize, the Rules Committee is temporarily stripped of power.

Hence it is at this time that the proponents of majority rule must strike their blows against the dictatorship of the committee. They must be prepared to offer at precisely the right moment an amendment to the rules depriving the committee of its broad powers over legislation, limiting it to the task of directing legislative traffic on the House floor.

This proposal would become pending business of the House, open to full debate on the floor and not subject to reference to the Rules Committee. The changes would become effective if approved by a majority of the House.

If the majority of the Members of the new Congress elected next November really want to establish majority rule in the House and be freed from the dictatorial domination of the Rules Committee, let them stand up and be counted on the opening day of the new session.

A similar fight for democracy should be waged in the Senate on first day of the next session of Congress. On that day all Senators who believe in the establishment of majority rule in the Senate should support a resolution aimed at preventing any future filibusters. By a majority vote such a resolution can be made the subject of the Senate business and disposed of without reference to committee. There is little doubt, of course, that the introduction of such a resolution will be vigorously opposed by the defenders of the filibuster. The sponsors of Senate rule by the minority already have made themselves clear. During the recent FEPC filibuster, Democratic Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland, stated: "The rule of the majority. The rule of votes. Majority to hades. * * * Let us not fool ourselves with the silly thought that majorities are always right."

Democratic Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia, rejected the idea of "a pure democracy, where every man's vote would be counted on every issue," and then later referred to the filibuster as a "bulwark against oppression by a mere popular majority."

It is clear that these Senators will wage a last-ditch fight against antifilibuster legislation with their customary weapon, the filibuster. However, a filibuster can be defeated. The recent FEPC filibuster could have been broken if a serious attempt to do so had been made by the Democratic Senators.

At that time the Democratic majority in the Senate, supported by many Republicans, recessed the Senate between 4 and 6 o'clock each afternoon during the filibuster, and on Friday afternoons recessed until each following Monday at noon. The Democratic administration made public statements in support of the FEPC, but took no effective action against the filibuster. No Democratic Senator and only a few Republican Senators were willing to join in my suggestion at that time to hold the Senate in continuous session for 24 hours a day for as many days, weeks, and months as might be necessary to break it. An opportunity to establish, once and for all, majority rule in the Senate was passed up. It should not happen again.

Under the filibuster with all its insidious effrontery, the principle of rule by a majority is denied the people in the determination of congressional policy. I do not say that the majority is always right, but I do say that under our form of representative government a minority of Senators should not be permitted, by means of the filibuster, to block legislation favored by the majority. If the majority passes legislation which the people of the country do not favor, it must answer to the voters of the country for their action on that legislation, and the voters will then have a chance to send men to the Senate under instructions to repeal any legislation that the people do not want.

There is no way to smash a filibuster but to exhaust the filibusterers by forcing them to speak day after day for 24 hours a day.

In a very real sense a filibuster is an endurance test. If a majority of the Senators really want to free themselves from the dictates of a willful minority they must be willing to take the time and undergo the physical strain that may be necessary to abolish once and for all the filibuster travesty.

If a majority of the present Senate really does not want to make that fight, then the voters should start finding it out in the 1946 elections. They should see to it that they send back to the Senate men pledged to make that fight. For my part, I am determined that the fight shall be made. But it cannot be made without the assistance of Senators in both parties. It will not be a pleasant fight. But with demonstrated public backing, it undoubtedly would end quickly.

It is important that the American people recognize that our form of government can protect their rights only so long as they keep it strong and effective. Representative government is not a machine that works automatically. It is but a set of rules and principles which the people by their own consent have decreed shall be binding upon their own conduct. These principles cannot work unless they are administered by men and women responsive to the will of the voters who elected them.

The people must be ever watchful against institutions—like the filibuster and powers of the House Rules Committee—which permit the perversion of free government by self-seeking men. If the people relax their vigilance, they may lose the fruits of democracy, which promote the greatest good for the greatest number within the framework of our private-property economy.

The last point I wish to make covers a matter which I discussed on the floor of the Senate on June 13, 1946. I pointed out in that speech that there is a great tendency in this country to build up an over-all big Government in Washington, D. C., at the expense of local self-government. The blame for that rests with the people themselves, but in their own self-interest they should stop the trend. I wish to say that unless I suffer from some form of myopia, I think it is perfectly clear to those who will read that the great struggle in the America of the next decade will be the struggle between self-government by the people of the United States at the local level, where they can best assume their responsibilities of citizenship, where they can best carry out their functions of free men in a democratic government, and the tendency to centralize more and more the power and rights of the people at the Federal level.

In the speech in the Senate on June 13, 1946, in support of an amendment which I offered to the OPA Act, which sought to place original jurisdiction over OPA violations in the local community price-panel boards, I said this: "So I offer this amendment, with my senior colleague from Oregon [Mr. CORDON], as another effort on the part of the Senate of the United States not only to help check the enforcement abuses of OPA, but to give the people down at the local level another opportunity to assume their responsibilities of self-government."

I wish to point out that there is raging in your Congress today a great struggle between two philosophies of government—a struggle between those who wish to build up an all-powerful centralized government in Washington and those who believe that the maximum of governmental controls of the affairs of men which can be left to the local communities should be vested in the local government of those communities. Those of us who hold to this latter point of view look toward the regionalization of administrative functions of our Government and the granting of more and more power of decision with finality to fellow American citizens on the local level. In other words, our point of view recognizes that men in Washington on the Federal level are no greater in ability and no more competent than our fellow citizens at the local level.

If we are to keep democratic government sound, if we are to preserve representative government in this country, its preservation and its strength will be largely dependent upon our regionalizing at the local level, because our government at the Federal level can be no stronger and no more effective than our government at the local level.

What is happening in America, at a great loss to self-government, is that our people, subject of course to the great weakness of wishful thinking and the tendency to pass the buck, are more and more sending to us at the Federal level functions of government which should be performed at the local level. In my judgment only to the extent that we can start the trend back to local government and have the functionings of government administered more and more at the local level will there be any hope of stemming this serious tide toward the development of an all-powerful Federal Government at Washington which will lead to the next step—and let us not mince words about it—a form of totalitarian government in this country.

Here is another test of sound middle-of-the-road liberalism versus reactionism. It is interesting to note that one of the contrasts between the liberals and the leftists is that the liberal fights for the rights of the individual in maintaining self-government in keeping with the framework of our Constitution and its Bill of Rights whereby the leftist seeks to develop an all-powerful Federal Government because he knows that his best chance of accomplishing the leftist's ultimate aim—namely, that of a governmental-dominated economy—is through the development of an all-powerful central government exercising control of the economy. It was such a pattern that the leftists sold to the people of Italy and Germany when they fell the victims of fascism, and it was the same type of pattern which the leftists developed in Russia under communism.

May I say in passing that the greatest partner which the leftist has in America today is the reactionary in both parties, because the leftist well knows that if the type of emphasis on material things and laissez-faire economy of the rightist or reactionary ever prevails in this country then the pendulum swings to the left, shortly after the reactionaries come into power, will become so sweeping as to lead directly into some form of state control of the economy. It is a great mistake, I believe, to think of the liberal as seeking only economic advantages for the people. That is the main objective, I think, of the leftist as contrasted with the liberal and of the reactionary as contrasted with the liberal except that the reactionary seeks economic advantages not for the people but for the privileged few.

Let us consider the leftist; for the liberal is anything but a leftist. The leftist is seeking a state economy; he is constantly thinking in terms of material welfare for the people. He is not thinking primarily, as is the liberal, in terms of political democracy's being hitched to economic democracy. He places the economic advantages uppermost. That is also true of the reactionary except he seeks to serve his own selfish interests.

Thus, when I call your attention to the subject, It Is Your Congress, don't blind your sight to the fact that the American people in the decade ahead must make a choice from among three types of candidates. The first type must offer the political and economic program of the reactionaries bottomed upon a laissez-faire economy which history shows is characterized by two outstanding economic phenomena: First, the exploitation of natural resources and human beings by the privileged few in the interests of profit dollars, and, second, the business cycle of boom and bust with periodic depressions and mass unemployment. The second type is from among the leftists. The program of the leftists seeks to establish a state-controlled economy in this country. My attitude toward the leftist groups can be made no more clear than I set it out in an answer to a wire which I recently received from a chapter of the Communist Party in this country commending me for some action of mine in the Senate. I replied to the wire as follows: "You may tell the representatives of the Communist Party, if in fact there are any in Salem, that any vote I cast on labor legislation in the Senate of the United States will not be based on any advice or desire of the Communist Party. My stand and votes on labor legislation pending before the Senate are motivated entirely by my desire to protect the civil liberties and individual rights guaranteed to every citizen in this country by the American Bill of Rights. The Communists seek to destroy those rights and seek to substitute for individual liberty in this country state control and domination of the life of every person. I shall oppose that totalitarian philosophy with all the vigor that I can muster."

The third type of political candidate in American politics today is the liberal. I feel that liberalism can be defined only in terms of specific issues. I do not mean, however, that I feel that liberalism does not have a very clear idealistic meaning. Let me put it this way: One of the objectives, for example, of a liberal government is to protect the economic weak from the exploitation of the economic strong and to do it within a private-property economy. That type of definition is similar to the one which Lincoln used when he pointed out that one of the purposes of government is to promote the "greatest good for the greatest number" and to do it within the framework of our American economic system. When we take that approach to the definition of liberalism, then we must think in terms of specific issues and test our liberalism by our votes on those issues.

To strike the balance between too little government and too much, to protect the economic weak from the exploitations of the economic strong within the framework of our private-property economy, to defend and guarantee at all times to the individual the civil and property rights set forth in our Constitution and its bill of rights, to keep the Government an effective servant and not a dictatorial master of our people, to promote the greatest good for the greatest number and to do it by maintaining the dignity of the individual are some of the basic objectives of the political liberal.

As I said at the beginning of this speech, you as rank-and-file citizens, and the 140,000,000 others like you, are the Government, and when you cease being the Government in this country then representative government will be lost. Your political desires are chiefly manifested through your Congress. It is your Congress. The primary blame for its faults rests with you because in the exercise of your most important right as free men and women, you elect your Congress. During the next decade, your votes will determine whether the controlling philosophy of that Congress will be reactionary or middle-of-the-road liberal or leftist. I leave the problem and decision up to you.

Restrictive Labor Legislation: An Attack on Civil Liberties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject Restrictive Labor Legislation: An Attack on Civil Liberties, which I delivered at the National Lawyers' Guild convention at the Hotel Hollenden, Cleveland, Ohio, July 5, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, and delegates to the convention, I deem it a distinct honor to join with you today in a study of restrictive labor legislation and its effect on civil liberties. The National Lawyers' Guild has won a high reputation in America because of its work in protecting and strengthening democratic processes. It is therefore a great pleasure to be with you on this occasion.

Almost a year ago we reached a victorious conclusion to a long and bitter war, but we are still in the process of transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy.

This reconversion process has been attended by many dislocations and disputes, not the least among them being labor-management disputes. Unfortunately, these labor-management disputes have been seized upon by various groups as pretext, occasion, or reason for a widespread attack on the rights of labor.

Backed by a barrage of publicity which almost invariably emphasized the labor in labor management disputes and focused with painful clarity on the mote in labor's eye, the foes of labor bent their efforts to the task of hamstringing or destroying labor's hard-won advances, and even nonpartisans were brought to believe that the consequences of labor-management disputes could be avoided in some fashion by putting restrictions on labor. The result was the introduction into Congress of a large number of bills limiting labor's rights.

In this situation, it seems to me, people have tended to overlook a consideration of basic importance—how do these proposed legislative measures affect the civil liberties of labor? For if proposed restrictive labor legislation does constitute an attack on the civil liberties of labor, then it strikes at the liberties of all of us.

The history of civil liberties in the political field is an old one. Freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of assembly were all issues before July 4, 1776. With the signing of the Federal Constitution and the ratification of the first 10 amendments thereto, these freedoms became the hallmark of our form of government. We accept as unquestioned the idea that every person is entitled to certain individual rights, and time shows a constant growth and development of that idea.

However, this growth has not been either rapid or smooth. There still remains a great deal of work to be done; for example, abolition of various restrictions on the right to vote and elimination of discrimination against minorities; but the outstanding fact is that the principle of civil liberties in the political field has long been firmly established and recognized here.

When we come to the economic field, we find that the concept of civil rights was for many years applied only to the employer. Thus, concepts such as the right to engage in a business, and the right to conduct one's business as one sees fit, have been accepted for a long time. However, it is only recently that there has been any recognition that employees also have civil liberties in the economic field.

From the point of view of logic alone, it is hard to see how civil liberties can be taken for granted in the political field and excluded from the economic area. Only on paper can we divide men's lives into functions and categories. Only in textbooks can we talk about the political man, or the economic man. In real life, man is an entity and all his functions constitute one integrated whole.

Civil liberties in the economic field are therefore just as important and as meaningful to the mass of people as in the political field. Liberty is the keynote of our system and we can no longer ignore such civil liberties in the economic sphere, as the right to organize and bargain collectively, the right to strike (refuse to work except under certain conditions), the right peacefully to picket (publicize the facts of a labor dispute), and the right to boycott (refuse to trade and persuade others to do likewise).

These civil liberties in the economic field, these liberties of labor, are widely recognized today. This recognition has been achieved by the enactment and court enforcement of the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act, and the Wagner Labor Relations Act, and by the line of Supreme Court decisions holding that peaceful picketing is an exercise of the fundamental right of freedom of speech, press, and assembly. Many of us have become so accustomed to these civil rights of labor that we may sometimes forget that such recognition has come only within the past 15 years. These rights in the economic field have not yet been as firmly accepted by the public generally, despite their widespread recognition, as have their counterparts in the political field. It is for this reason that we must be doubly vigilant against legislative measures which would nullify or cancel them.

A brief glance at the history of the struggle for their acceptance may serve to give us a better perspective on the problem.

Until 1842 the mere organization of a trade-union and an attempt at collective bargaining was prosecuted as a criminal conspiracy. The famous decision of Commonwealth v. Hunt, in Massachusetts, was the first legal recognition that it was not a crime for workers to organize into a trade-union. Thereafter, the attack on labor's rights was directed against the activities of trade-unions by other means. Government by injunction reigned for some 50 years, in many cases resulting in the denial to workers of the fundamental freedoms of speech, press, and assembly. The legal doctrine of restraint of trade and then the antitrust laws were other weapons brought into play against the activities of unions.

The result was an odd situation. At the opening of the 1930's, it was lawful for men to form and join a union, but it was also lawful for their employer to discharge them for so doing, to subvert the union by dominating it, or to create company unions. It was lawful for a union representing a majority of employees to request an employer to bargain collectively with it, but it was also lawful for the employer to refuse to talk to the union. Employees could disseminate the facts in any political dispute but were frequently enjoined from publicizing the facts of a labor dispute. In short, labor had rights but was effectively prevented from exercising them. When we viewed this situation against the background of the generally superior economic power and therefore superior bargaining position of the employer, it became plain that here was a gross injustice that required legislative redress.

Such redress was effected in the last 15 years. The Wagner Act granted remedies for violations of rights which by then it was admitted labor should have. Thereafter, a man could join a union and was protected against discharge by his employer for so doing. The employer was forbidden to dominate the union which represented his employees. The union representing the majority of employees in a particular establishment could not only seek to bargain collectively on behalf of the employees, but the employer was compelled to sit down and bargain with it.

Furthermore, by the Norris-LaGuardia Act, and by a number of Supreme Court decisions, the right to exercise the constitutional guaranties of freedom of speech, press, and assembly in a pending labor dispute without interference from employer, Government, or courts was assured.

It is frequently said that such legislation was one-sided. But such a statement is meaningless. All remedial legislation directed toward correcting an imbalance is one-sided. The workmen's compensation laws protect injured employees, not their uninjured employers; the Securities Exchange Commission protects investors, not brokerage firms or holding companies.

The Norris-LaGuardia Act, the Wagner Act, the line of Supreme Court decisions referred to, all redressed an imbalance, they added a remedy to a naked right already recognized they carried over into the economic field, rights long recognized and protected in the political field.

The trouble with a subject like labor relations is that it seems to incite and excite people. There is a tendency to make blanket statements, to declare that the labor movement is all white or all black, to employ extremes in ideas and language. Obviously, like most things in this world of ours, neither extreme is true. Like all things human, the truth lies somewhere in between.

We have experienced many strikes in the last several months and the publicity labor has received was anything but favorable. The impatience shown was understandable, the inconveniences that resulted were many. To claim, however, that the strikes have been the result of selfish motives and irresponsible leadership, thirsty for power, is ridiculous. Striking, as it has been said time and time again, is a grim business. Workers do not enjoy it. They do not look forward to it as a vacation. Living on the meager allowance of a union strike fund, or even on unemployment compensation, is not as comfortable as living on one's wages, whatever they may be. People seem to overlook these facts. Furthermore, management's role in the causing of strikes is too often overlooked. Management has frequently been guilty of precipitating or prolonging strikes by refusing to accept governmental recommendations after the unions have acceded to them. In view of the approach of the press and other organs of public opinion, the confusion of a large section of the public is understandable. It is the unions that stayed out, that were not working, and therefore, it was the unions' fault. All the more interesting is the fact that, according to a Fortune poll, public sentiment was more strongly pro-labor in the early spring of 1946, after the major strikes such as steel and General Motors, than in the fall of 1945.

I am not trying to minimize the grave implications to our national economy of such situations as the steel strike, the coal strike, and the railroad strike. However, I submit that before flailing about wildly in impatience and annoyance, we should, like a careful doctor, look beyond the surface symptoms and attempt to locate and treat the underlying infection, if any.

In this situation, in the face of a wave of strikes precipitated by basic and underlying economic causes, what has the Congress done with respect to the labor situation during the past session? The Congress sought to meet and correct the situation by a series of bills such as the Case bill, the Lea (anti-Petrillo) bill, the President's proposals submitted at the close of the railroad strike, the Hobbs antiracketeering bill, etc. The implications and dangers of the techniques used in these bills are, it seems to me, clear. They present a real danger, not only to labor, but to the country at large. They seek to deprive workers of the civil liberties they have so painfully acquired.

Anyone who cares to view the subject dispassionately will recognize very shortly that the recent wave of strikes had common and deep-seated causes—the economic dissatisfactions of the workers involved. The change-over from a war to a peacetime economy has been accompanied by tremendous dislocations and strains. Men were being laid off, take-home wages were decreasing, prices continued to go up, the housing situation was and is bad. All these problems, and many others, were accentuated by problems attendant upon returning the soldier to civilian life.

The first and most outstanding thing to note about the measures introduced into Congress is that they ignore the underlying economic causes of the many labor-management disputes we have experienced. The problems of rising prices, full employment, a minimum wage consonant with the existing price structure, health, housing, etc., all are ignored in the legislation referred to. These bills, then, do not address themselves to the basic infection. In fact, they are not even directed at the surface manifestations of the condition. Even a cursory analysis reveals that they would no more reduce the number of strikes than did the Smith-Connally Act.

Even more, however, is the fact that these legislative measures which have been proposed, and, in the case of the Hobbs bill, passed by Congress, are a direct attack on the civil liberties of workers.

The Case bill, which the President vetoed, is a prime example. This bill limits the right to strike by making possible the enforcement of a 60-day so-called cooling-off period during which strikes are illegal. In disputes involving public utilities this period could be extended to 95 days. The penalty for violation by employees is the loss of their status as employees under the National Labor Relations Act. In other words, the limitation on the workers' exercise of their civil right to cease work in concert when they choose is enforced by the threat of deprivation of their civil rights of organizing free from employer interference, of choosing their own representatives, and of bargaining collectively. In passing, it is worth noting that the penalty against an employer who violates this provision of the bill by a lockout is at most the payment of back pay. On the one hand, deprivation of civil liberties; on the other, payment of money damages.

The Case bill relegates supervisory employees to the pre-Wagner Act days, by the simple device of excluding such workers from the definition of "employee" in the act. And supervisory employees, under the terms of the Case bill, would include even those who have the authority "to effectively recommend" the adjustment of grievances. I doubt if the definition of supervisory employee could be stretched further than this bill stretches it. True enough, the bill says it does not prohibit a supervisory employee from becoming or remaining a union member. But without the protection afforded by the National Labor Relations Act, this nonprohibition is meaningless. Here again, there would be a nullification of the civil liberties of a large group of workers.

Nor is this all the Case bill does by way of wiping out civil rights. It reduces the area of collective bargaining by stating that workers are not permitted to bargain collectively for the establishment of welfare funds to be administered by unions. The bill not only takes away the right to strike because an employer insists that his employees work on nonunion materials, and where one union claims jurisdiction after another union secured an "effective" collective bargaining agreement, of course, what the word "effective" means only the Supreme Court would be able to state with finality, but an attempt to exercise the right to strike under such circumstances would result in the imposition of criminal sanctions. The laws against monopolistic practices by big business are here turned against the workers for using those civil liberties in the economic field which they have so recently acquired. The exercise of free press and free speech is made a crime when its purpose is to institute a secondary boycott. The protections now provided against "government by injunction" are largely eliminated by a specific provision in the Case bill exempting the labor disputes I have just described from the terms of the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

Workers who go out on strike in violation of collective bargaining agreements, no matter what the provocation, are punished by the loss of their rights under the Wagner Act. Would we deprive a person of the right of free speech because he has uttered a slander?

Finally, the Case bill incorporated within itself the Hobbs bill amending the antiracketeering law to make it applicable to labor unions. What I say now applies equally to the Hobbs bill as recently passed by Congress. Now, of course, no one can defend racketeering, whether it is practiced by labor unions or anyone else. But the fact is that there are ample laws on the books to punish union officials who engage in such practices. The proof of this is, that there have been, from time to time, convictions against union officials on exactly such grounds. The effect of the Hobbs bill is much more far-reaching than just the prevention of racketeering.

The Hobbs bill strikes from the present Antiracketeering Act the provision, that wages paid by a bona find employer to a bona fide employee, are not included in the terms "property," "money," or "valuable consideration" within the meaning of the Antiracketeering Act, and also strikes out the provision that the act shall not be construed so as to impair the rights of bona fide labor organizations in lawfully carrying out their legitimate objectives, as such rights are expressed in existing Federal statutes.

These provisions which the Hobbs bill strikes out were inserted originally on the recommendation of the Department of Justice to protect legitimate union activity. The elimination of these provisions may well result in judicial interpretations whereby a demand for wages backed up by a compulsion of any kind, even a threat of strike, will come within the terms of the Antiracketeering Act. This could be accomplished by a finding that the union action amounted to an attempt to obtain property (this would now include wages) by "actual or threatened force, violence, or fear of injury" to persons or property. After all, courts have held that even peaceful picketing is an attempt to "force" an employer to do something.

Furthermore, the penalties of the bill must be considered. The bill provides that "whoever commits or threatens physical violence to any person or property" in furtherance of the plan to obtain property as I have just described, is guilty of a felony, and the punishment is imprisonment for up to 20 years and a fine of up to $10,000 or both. Unfortunately, sometimes threats of violence and, more seldom, actual violence do occur on a picket line when tempers flare up. At present, such acts are punished, if at all, as misdemeanors against State laws, with appropriately mild penalties. But these minor incidents could, under the Hobbs bill, result in a 20-year jail sentence, not only for those who participate in the violence or threat of violence, but for all those who are on the picket line.

Under the Hobbs bill, workers might still theoretically retain their civil rights of strike and peaceful picketing, of making demands on employers for increased wages in collective bargaining negotiations, but the penalties for violation of the Hobbs bill are so severe that the mere existence of the legislation will be an effective deterrent to the exercise by workers of their rights.

I have discussed the Case bill at length, despite its veto, because I am sure that other attempts will be made to enact its provisions in the future. I shall not go into an extended analysis of the other legislative proposals for restricting labor, except to say a few words about President Truman's request for legislation. In vetoing the Case bill, the President soundly stated:

"Our problem in shaping permanent legislation in this field is to probe for the causes of lock-outs, strikes, and industrial disturbances. Then, to the extent possible, we must eliminate these causes. Strikes against private employers cannot be ended by legislative decree. Men cannot be forced in a peacetime democracy to work for a private employer under compulsion. Therefore strikes must be considered in the whole context of our modern industrial society. They must be considered in the light of inflationary pressures, or problems of full employment, of economic security."

It seems to me that those words I have just quoted apply with equal force to temporary legislation, and to situations where the Government becomes the employer by temporarily taking over private industries. I believe that the bill adopted by the House on May 25 at the President's request, even as amended by the Senate, is contrary to the principles enunciated by the President in his veto message in the Case bill, and would be a flagrant violation of the civil rights of workers.

That this is true of the provision for the drafting of strikers into the armed forces, a provision eliminated by the Senate, is obvious. But it is equally true of the provision that employees who strike or remain out on strike after the Government seized a plant lose their rights under the Wagner Act and the Railway Labor Act. The employees must not only remain at work or come back to work, but the terms and conditions of their employment are to be fixed by the President, with no rights to the workers to bargain collectively about these terms and conditions. Even on a temporary basis, I do not think such a measure can be defended. There is always the real danger that temporary steps in the direction of governmental fixing of the wages and working conditions of labor will lead to attempts at making this practice a more permanent one, and under such conditions democracy cannot survive.

We have recently passed through a war fought, on an international scale, for the very freedoms we have been discussing on the domestic level. All over the world, people have fought for and now are struggling to enact into law, measures that would ensure their political freedom and economic security. We overlook a basic factor in our labor situation in America today if we fail to realize that labor's struggle here for political freedom and economic security is an aspect of the struggle of people all over the world for these same objectives.

Strikes are not pleasant things for the public, any more than they are for the workers who forego their weekly pay. The elimination by law of strikes might seem to be a simple way of protecting the public from certain inconveniences. But the evil results flowing from this superficially easy solution would be beyond measure. The use of such antidemocratic devices to handle our labor relations problems as are contained in the restrictive labor legislation I have described, will be a direct blow against the democratic process. The deprivation of the civil liberties of workers in the economic field will lead inevitably to the destruction of our civil liberties in the political field. We must therefore be vigilant against all attempts to repress the workers in the exercise of their rights whatever occasional inconvenience to some sections of the public may result. The inconveniences inherent in the democratic process are a small price to pay for the greatness which is democracy.

Wheat Farmers

REMARKS
OF
HON. JED JOHNSON
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, last week I spent a few days in the Sixth Congressional District of Oklahoma which I have the honor to represent and met many wheat farmers who complained bitterly about the unjust and unfair attitude of the Department of Agriculture toward the wheat farmers of Oklahoma and the Nation.

I found these farmers especially resentful of an order from the Department of Agriculture requiring farmers who delivered wheat to the elevators to sell at least one-half of such wheat to the Government.

No assurance was given the farmers that they would be protected in the event of any increase in prices.

I was amazed to learn that the Department of Agriculture had sent "snoopers" into Oklahoma, calling upon operators of many grain elevators to obtain lists of farmers who had refused or failed to sell the Government half of their wheat.

To be specific, at Calumet, in Canadian County, Okla., I was advised that the owner of a grain elevator in that town had been visited by a man who represented himself as an employee of the Department of Agriculture and demanding such information.

Similar incidents were brought to my attention in Blaine and Kingfisher Counties, as a result of which I have received petitions from farmers, large and small, demanding that such unjust discriminations be immediately stopped.

Such a storm of protest has gone up from wheat producing areas that the Department of Agriculture has backed up and rescinded this unjust and ill-advised order.

Of course, the Department claimed its authority for issuing such an order under the President's wartime powers.

But the farmers of Oklahoma and the Nation, who played such an important part in winning the war by producing wheat and other foodstuffs to feed ourselves, our armed forces, and even our allies, feel that inasmuch as the shooting is ended, no such restrictions or mandatory orders can now be justified.

In wartime, our farmers and citizens generally went along and cooperated in a marvelous way. Some of the wartime orders and restrictions seemed useless and unnecessary, but our farmers did not complain. They took it on the chin, and despite a shortage of farm labor and the lack of machinery, they went all out in a production program never before equalled or even dreamed of.

But now, Mr. Speaker, the farmer is entitled to a square deal. He is tired of being harassed by the same Government that he has so loyally supported with all his devotion, his energy, and more important, his own sons, that this might be a free and decent world in which to live. Let us keep it free.

Rent Control—Acts, Not Words, Important

REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from a resident of the Fourth Michigan Congressional District comes the following letter which should show to even the most skeptical that those who want to return to the American way are willing to make sacrifices to do so, while some so-called progressive and liberal dyed-in-the-wool New Dealers when they get a chance forget their so-called liberalism. The letter is as follows:

I am more than pleased that you are back to look after the peoples' rights.

I have 26 places that I rent but have not and do not intend to raise prices of rent. I have taken a "licken" since 1941 and am willing to stick it out for as I see it the New Dealers want prices to go up so they can say, "See what the OPA did." The way to lick OPA is to hold prices where they are and things will adjust themselves, no matter when OPA goes, prices will go up, and I am going to cite you one case of rent raising in Benton Harbor, Mich.

The postmistress lost no time in raising the rent of her flat that she rents to Jess Levers' daughter. The next day after OPA went out she raised 15 percent. You will find that the New Dealers never miss a chance.

I have talked to several landlords and everyone has told me that they were not going to raise rent. Of course, they are the good old Americans who believe in America. OPA is out, let's keep it out.

I can see why some landlords raise their rent if you have a tenant that has caused you a lot of trouble. The landlord says, well, I will get rid of him, so raising the rent gets him out the easiest way—no papers to serve.

This is to let you know that I am for you and what you are doing.

Yours truly,

A. S. MATTHEWS.

BENTON HARBOR.

The writer of the letter is not only a landlord but an old-fashioned American who believes in the American way.

Unless I am mistaken the postmistress referred to is Anne Parsal, an ardent New Dealer.

For the sake of consistency, it is my hope that the writer of the letter is mistaken but if he is, Anne can so advise her neighbors by writing the News-Palladium.

Sales of Vehicles to Veterans

REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, the Cleveland Press has reported accurately many instances where veterans have purchased vehicles from the War Assets Administration, later to find that the War Assets Administration's estimates for repairs have been totally inadequate, and in many cases the veterans have purchased vehicles good only for junk. Because of the many disappointments and the loss of money by veterans who purchased these vehicles, on June 7 I requested that the War Assets Administration, in selling vehicles, use the same procedure as it follows in the sale of airplanes, namely, to attach to each vehicle a copy of the inspection report, so that the prospective purchaser, or actual purchaser, shall have available the report of the condition of the vehicle which is revealed by the inspection report.

On July 3 I received the reply from John S. Cooke, Director, sales group 1, Office of General Disposal, War Assets Administration, Washington, which states as follows:

Mr. W. J. Hays has asked me to reply to your communication of June 7, 1946, relative to your suggestion that in selling vehicles the same procedure be used as is followed in selling airplanes, that is, to attach to each vehicle a copy of the inspection report.

Your suggestion is deeply appreciated, and we fully realize that the purchaser should have all pertinent details relative to the condition of the vehicle he desires to purchase. In fact, it is urged that a prospective purchaser personally make a thorough inspection of the vehicle, and if he desires, he may utilize the skill of a trained mechanic in determining the condition. However, a complete inspection report is kept in the sales office pertaining to each vehicle being sold, so a prospective purchaser may see such report before making a purchase.

I thank you for your interest in this matter but do not believe a change is justified at the present time in view of the fact that these reports are now available as stated above.

What little concern the War Assets Administration has for the veterans is clearly evidenced by the fact that they realize that the sales office which has available a complete inspection report, may be hundreds of miles away from the location of the vehicle; also the fact that they suggest that a prospective purchaser may utilize the skill of a trained mechanic in determining the condition of vehicles, displays an arrogant attitude toward the pocketbook of the veteran, and toward priorities which Congress has set forth by legislation in favor of veteran purchasers.

From my experience with the War Assets Administration, I believe that some portion of the vast number of supernumeraries on the staff should be assigned to preparing duplicate inspection reports to be attached to vehicles, both in the interest of fairness to prospective purchasers and as some justification for the huge administrative appropriations granted them by Congress.

International Control of Atomic Energy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHAPMAN REVERCOMB
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech that I made on July 4, 1946, Chautauqua, N. Y., on the subject of the proposed plan of international control of atomic energy.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Our discussion tonight deals with a proposed plan of international control of atomic energy. In substance, the real question is: Whether the United States should keep secret the way to make and use the atomic bomb or divulge that secret to the world.

Whenever atomic energy can be used for purposes beneficial to mankind, knowledge of that use should be given to all people. But to this date, the only known use of that energy is to destroy human lives and man's handiwork.

Mr. Bernard Baruch has prepared a plan, stated in a speech by him on June 14, 1946, before the Atomic Energy Commission of the United Nations. We are here asked to say whether or not in our opinion that plan should be adopted.

The Baruch proposal is, in summary, the creation of an international atomic development authority. As the name indicates, this would be a board or group composed of the representatives of different governments. The members, as representatives of their respective governments, would be given full knowledge of atomic energy in all its phases, including the bomb.

Atomic energy as a theoretical power is known to the scientists of all countries. The way to make a destructive bomb, however, is known only to a group of scientists in this country who are under the direction of our Government. Therefore, the only new thing that would be given to other governments would be knowledge of how to make the bomb.

The Baruch plan would place in the authority management and ownership "of all atomic energy activities potentially dangerous to world security." This of course means the bomb. The language could not have any other meaning because the bomb is the potential danger to world security.

The authority would have "power to control, inspect, and license all other atomic activities." It would foster beneficial use of the energy. That purpose of the plan is of course good.

The proposed organization is to be the leader in atom knowledge and is to make research and development of that power.

Then the Baruch plan proposes: That when a plan of control of atomic energy has been agreed upon and put into effective operation with punishments for violations and rules for control that: (1) manufacture of atomic bombs shall stop; (2) existing bombs shall be disposed of; and (3) the Authority shall be in possession of full knowledge as to the know how for the production of atomic energy.

The plan also says that there shall be an agreement removing the bomb as a weapon. This is a pious purpose but you could no more stop the use of the bomb by one who wanted to use it than you could stop the use of the submarine, the flame thrower, jellied petroleum, or rockets, by renunciation of their use, if war should come. The whole sum and substance of the Baruch plan is that the knowledge of the making of the atomic bomb shall be divulged to a commission made up of representatives of the governments of the world, and consequently means a divulging of that secret to the separate governments of the world. I am against that for two principal reasons.

(1) The world is safer from the atomic bomb so long as knowledge of its making and use is left in this country because this Nation is essentially a peaceful Nation. With all our armed power and capacity for waging war, it is not likely that we shall seek war. We have no reason for doing so. Therefore, so long as this bomb is within the possession of this country it is not a threat to the people of the world. True knowledge of our history will convince any other government that we are not aggressive in starting wars.

(2) Furthermore, from our own viewpoint, if we give knowledge of this bomb to other nations, we have placed in the hands of those who may attack us a weapon of utter destruction without known defense against it.

Some may say this is a lack of faith in the United Nations. It is not a lack of faith in that organization. I have the highest hope that it will work and that difficulties between nations which may appear to threaten war may be amicably settled, but certainly there is no guaranty that such a desired end will be obtained, and if it is not obtained, this peaceful nation, by its own surrender of this destructive instrument, has made itself subject to attack and possible annihilation.

We all know that whenever any one of the strong nations desires to abandon the principles of settlement of disputes by conference and then resorts to arms to enforce its viewpoint and its demands, war comes, regardless of all the high purposes of nations that now form the membership of the international organization. The danger is too great for us to burn our bridges behind us. With all our hope for peace, we are not going to abandon our armed strength. On the other hand, we have declared a policy of maintaining the strongest armed forces known in our history. That is not an abandonment of the idea of peace. It is but security for peace and for the protection of our people in event some other nation, through its own judgment, goes upon the warpath.

By the same reason, if we are to maintain our strong force for the peace of the world and for the security of our own country, why, then, would anyone think of surrendering to all the world the knowledge of the making of this destructive atom bomb? Why place it in the hands of those who possibly may be the same potential enemies against whom our armed forces are kept?

There are some who say that in time scientists of other nations will find a method of creating this bomb from atomic energy. Perhaps that is correct, but that time will also give the opportunity at least to study defensive methods against its crushing power. After the First World War, we sank our battleships and lessened our defenses in a desperate desire to assure peace. It did not work. It only made us less strong for our defense. That mistake would be small compared to the blunder if we should surrender the atomic bomb as a defensive weapon.

So, therefore, I say to you that the peace of the world is more secure while the bomb is held carefully guarded by this peaceful Nation than if knowledge of it be given to all others.

Furthermore, as an American citizen charged with the duty and the binding obligation to maintain the defenses of my own people, I cannot approve any plan, the ultimate purpose of which is to share knowledge of this secret weapon which might be used for the destruction of my own people.

Look to the Source

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from PM of Tuesday, July 9, 1946, entitled "Look to the Source."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOOK TO THE SOURCE

The case of Representative ANDREW MAY, of Kentucky, as revealed by the Mead committee, has set tongues wagging and produced a 9-day searching of the public conscience. But it needs a wider frame for its meaning to be understood. The important fact about the May case is that it is not isolated. We are not dealing merely with the charges that a single Congressman of too easy conscience yielded all too willingly to the blandishments of money and friendship. We are dealing with the coarsening of the human conscience that is not only America-wide but mankind-wide.

Even a random sampling of recent events will disclose how deeply this corrosion has eaten into American political ethics. Take BILBO's victory in the Mississippi primaries, on the basis of the most open incitement to anti-Negro hatred since the era of the Night-riders. Take the economic Bilboism that strangled the FEPC and allowed it to die with scarcely a quaver of regret. Take the moral obtuseness of the Senators and Congressmen who were willing to gamble with runaway price inflation and the destruction of the people's living standards because they cared more about pleasing the business lobbies. When Representative MAY said in his naive way that he had done nothing that other Congressmen were not doing all the time, he was—in a deeper sense than he knew—giving the whole ethical show away.

The story goes beyond Congress. The political orators deliver glittering periods about the war veterans and how much the Nation owes them. One thing the Nation owes them is housing. Yet the major organizers of the housing blockade are the banks and insurance companies and trust companies who control the flow of mortgage money. A special grand jury in New York, as told in Karl Pretshold's PM stories last week end and today, is adjourned for a month after Wall Street pressure was applied to forestall a criminal indictment. As part of the pressure, we have the inglorious spectacle of the New York State superintendent of banks, Elliott V. Bell, pleading against a criminal indictment on the ground that it may undermine public confidence in the banks. This sums up the current state of public morality: let truth go begging for statement, let the skies of the veterans' welfare fall—but let no harsh words be allowed to tarnish the interests of the American banking fraternity.

I do not say these things are new and unexampled. They follow all too closely the pattern of American public and political ethics after World War I, in the incredible twenties and the Teapot Dome, in the era of Warren Gamaliel Harding and the big money. Go farther back into American history to the period that followed the Civil War, and you get to the tawdry ethics of the Grant administrations, the Credit Mobilier scandal, the fake land-booms nourished on bribery—the whole era that Mark Twain in one of his bitterest novels called the Gilded Age.

Is the main indictment then against capitalism? Is the root of political corruption to be found in the cash-nexus? That is too easy an answer—as the whole recent experience of Russia shows. The Russians have done away with capitalism and the private business system. Yet they, too, as the current news-items document, have their public graft scandals and their private greed for money and power. Even the severest penalties imposed by the party and the state have not been able to prevent Russian officials from yielding to bribery and lining their own pockets at the public expense. The Communist philosophy of legislating political ethics from above has proved as leaky as our own noble experiment in the twenties of legislating temperance habits. The values men live by come from deeper sources than the commands of a Congress or a Politburo.

What is happening today is that the faiths are failing—whether they be the faiths of capitalism or socialism or democracy. In their traditional form they are proving an insufficient cement to hold men together in a structure of social decency.

The clinching truth of that is, for me, the two recent blows against the Jews in Palestine and in Poland. Britain is now a Socialist state, the inheritor of the democratic Socialist doctrine which ought to be the greatest humanist heritage of our age. Yet that has not kept the British from attacking Jewish settlements in Palestine, herding Jewish leaders into concentration camps, paying Jews the final indignity of acting out a neo-Nazi role on the soil of the Jewish homeland. And the tragedy of the Jews massacred at Kielce, in Poland, on the basis of a blood-ritual lie, is more than the age-old tragedy of Jewish pogroms. It takes on a new and special twist after the Nazi planned campaigns of extermination. It shows that 6,000,000 dead bodies are not enough to memorialize man's inhumanity to man.

To many people the answer will seem to lie in a return to religion. The trouble is that the religious faiths have failed too. They depend too much on the inner personal conversion of the individual taken by himself. If humanity moves away from the corrupt and the bestial it will be not by individual conversion but by the reestablishment of the sense of society—the sense of what ties men to other men. A local community, for example, in which men have come together to work out the housing problem or the task of crushing the fascist virus in the schools, is worth all the sermons in the book. This functioning sense of society, at the level of daily living, is the source to which alone we can look.

Tribute to Howard Hughes, One of America's Outstanding Aviators

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay a deserved tribute to a great American who today lies in a hospital on the other side of the continent, fighting grimly and bravely for his life, and to bespeak the most sober hopes and prayers of this Congress for the early and complete recovery of Howard Hughes from the grievous injuries he suffered "in the line of duty."

The gratitude of the Congress and, through it, of the American people, for the great contributions that Howard Hughes has made to this Nation's supreme accomplishments in aviation has been expressed before, for among his many laurels he holds the Congressional Medal, awarded in 1941.

Yet, the number and variety—and the importance—of his contributions to aviation progress, and the fact that he was, characteristically, taking all the risks upon himself in test-flying a new long-range photo reconnaissance plane, of his own design for the Army, when it crashed last Sunday, commend to us this further expression of the Nation's gratitude and appreciation of his services, and its prayers for his recovery.

This man flew around the world in 3½ days, in 1938—for a record still unbroken. He pioneered in high-altitude flying, and from that experience he conceived the ship known today as the Constellation, the world's fastest transport aircraft. He has constantly taken the most extreme risks—financially as well as risks to his life and limb—in furtherance of his faith in the ever-widening horizons of flying, setting world land-speed and transcontinental-speed records and collecting almost every honorary award the aviation realm could offer.

These few words do not begin to tell the whole story of the force and inspiration that Howard Hughes has been in raising American aviation to the high estate it occupies today, but I should like this brief review to be made part of this body's formal expression of its most sober hopes and prayers for Howard Hughes' early and complete recovery from his injuries.

Fiscal Policy of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Far From Out of the Woods," published in the Concord Daily Monitor and New Hampshire Patriot of July 9, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAR FROM OUT OF THE WOODS

The United States Government has just closed its fiscal year, a year in which we were fighting Japan for 2 months and which we were not fighting 10 months. The year ended with 34 cents of every dollar spent, a deficit of $22,000,000,000.

The rate of spending did drop sharply following VJ-day. It averaged $4,900,000,000 a month for the balance of the fiscal year, whereas it had been nearly $8,000,000,000 during the 2 months of war. The cumulative deficit at the end of the year was $270,000,000,000, and the debt limit had been fixed at $275,000,000,000.

Forty-seven and a half percent of what the Government spent in the fiscal year was raised by income taxes, other internal revenue and miscellaneous receipts accounting for 18½ percent more. But total receipts were $3,500,000,000 less than in the previous fiscal year.

The Federal fiscal situation in the year just closed is not too reassuring, despite the reduction in the deficit from the preceding year. The budget is still not balanced and monthly deficits are still occurring, and will continue to occur in the new fiscal year just begun.

There was in the Treasury something more than $14,000,000,000 when the last fiscal year closed. President Truman indicated in his budget message to Congress last January that he would use some of this to balance the 1947 Budget. But that is subterfuge, and not balancing. It would simply mean a reduction in the cash balance.

Neither is the recently set debt limit any safeguard against further deficit spending. The limit has been repeatedly changed in recent years, and will be again, if it gets in the way. Even as it stands it permits at least a $5,000,000,000 deficit in the fiscal year 1947.

The country had on July 1, beginning of the new fiscal year, nearly as high employment as it can ever expect to have. In short, the Nation is as prosperous as it can hope to be for a great many years. It is this prosperity which means that tax receipts, being principally from income taxes, are also at about the highest point they can be expected to reach for a long time. This being so the Federal Budget should show a surplus instead of continuing deficits. Even in June, a month in which income taxes are due and paid, the monthly deficit was $1,100,000,000.

The Federal establishment is still spending far too much money—far more than the situation justifies, and far more than it can continue to spend. For 16 years it has been running annual deficits, and there is as yet no evidence that it will not continue to run deficits year after year. Talk of a balanced Budget in the 1947 fiscal year is still just talk and nothing more. Worse is the indication that there will not be balanced budgets in the years which follow 1947.

For a year or two business will be good, but deflation is bound to come. It is a long-continuing process. In the past it has always run for a considerable period of years. It will this time, unless a new war intervenes, or unless we go on another speculative spree such as that in the late twenties, and neither of these possibilities is desirable.

In a period of deflation, when goods exceed or equal demand, price levels fall gradually. So do profits. Business casualties increase, because such a period requires better management than does a period of rising prices. Income tax receipts will fall, too, and unless Federal expenditures do also Federal deficits are inevitable.

Last year debt service was 7 cents of every dollar Uncle Sam spent. It was about 10 percent of every dollar Uncle Sam collected in taxes. Continuing deficits will increase this charge, and so will declining revenues. It is a spiral as vicious as that of inflationary processes. It breeds upon itself, for it dictates Federal policies as to credit and interest rates which encourage unsound spending.

The fiscal condition of the Federal Government is still one of the greatest problems the Nation has. Merely because the war is over and the wartime spending peaks have been passed is no reason for ignoring the situation. In fact, it needs more attention now than ever, for now is the only chance we may have to get back upon a sound fiscal policy nationally.

Should the OPA Be Revived?

REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM J. ERVIN, JR.

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. Speaker, when President Truman vetoed the OPA extension bill, he invited our citizens to give their Congressmen their views upon this very important and highly controversial issue. The newspaper columnists and radio commentators assure us that Americans are deluging their Senators and Representatives with letters and telegrams relating to OPA. This statement I readily accept because I am receiving an unprecedented number of communications upon this subject from various parts of the Tenth Congressional District of North Carolina.

The columnists and commentators further assert that practically all of the communications directed to Senators and Representatives by the people are demanding the re-creation of the Office of Price Administration without substantial change. This assertion I can neither affirm nor deny, because I have not seen any congressional mail except my own. In the light of the constant reiteration of columnists and commentators that OPA messages reaching Congressmen almost uniformly demand retention of price and rent control without substantial change, I have been surprised to find that about 60 percent of the communications directed to me by residents of my district ask that OPA be buried forever, and approximately 40 percent of the same pray that OPA be given a second birth.

These communications are obviously of a spontaneous nature in the great majority of cases for they are, as a rule couched in the language of their authors. I might add here that one of my correspondents gives a prescription for a truly pleasing OPA extension bill if we can only discover somebody smart enough to work out the necessary administrative details. He frankly states that he wants price controls continued on the things he buys and removed from the things he sells.

The surprising division of opinion among those of my constituents communicating with me upon OPA lends some slight support to a theory I have long entertained, but never heretofore expressed, namely, that oftentimes newspaper columnists and radio commentators are like Congressmen in that they disseminate abroad under the guise of news propaganda reflecting their personal ideas. This is merely the opinion of a most uninfluential Congressman. Consequently, it is to be expected that no columnist or commentator or Congressman will deem the comparison odious and become angry with me for voicing it.

It is difficult to consider the question of extending price and rent controls with any degree of impartiality. Both the advocates and opponents of OPA have indulged in much intemperate crimination and recrimination. As an inevitable result, the controversy arising out of the proposal to extend the life of the Office of Price Administration has generated more heat than light.

It is both natural and desirable that the conflicting views of the American people in respect to OPA should find their reflections in the Congress, which is charged by our fundamental law with the responsibility of deciding whether the OPA shall be revived and of prescribing the conditions under which it shall operate in case of its revival. It might save us much disappointment in the future to realize clearly at this time that it is not likely that Congress will be able to bring forth legislation upon these matters satisfactory in all respects to anyone. It is an old American pastime to condemn Congress as if it had the capacity to act with the ease and consistency of an individual. Before I became a Congressman, I emulated the example set by many columnists, commentators, and editors and spoke with assurance of Congress as having one mind only or no mind whatever, depending entirely upon whether its latest act or omission met or failed to meet my approval.

It will help our understanding of legislative events, however, if we will always bear in mind that, for good or ill, the Constitution vests the power to legislate in the national field in the Congress, and that the Congress consists of 96 Senators and 435 Representatives. While it is quite possible that Congress might act more wisely if it would abdicate its legislative function and become merely a rubber stamp for expressing the will of the President or of the head of some governmental agency, the Constitution does not contemplate that it should do so. On the contrary, our organic law is framed upon the principle that the Congress shall produce such legislation as reflects as nearly as possible the judgments of a majority of the Senate and of a majority of the House, irrespective of how erroneous such judgments may be.

As no legislative proposal can pass Congress without gaining the affirmative support of at least 218 of the 435 Members of the House of Representatives and at least 49 of the 96 Members of the Senate, it follows that any legislation upon a controversial subject is necessarily the product of the compromises incident to the give and take of the legislative process of reconciling divergent views. Hence, no one should ever delude himself into believing that Congress is likely to enact any statute upon any highly controversial subject which will meets his full approval in all respects.

The attitudes of its Members in respect to the proposal to revive the Office of Price Administration divides Congress into the following three general groups, namely: First, those who oppose the reestablishment of OPA in any form; second, those who favor the revival of OPA without substantial change; and third, those who advocate the restoration of OPA under a statute compelling OPA to follow policies designed to encourage the maximum production of needed goods and housing accommodations. It might be added that there are wide variations of views in respect to particular matters among those falling within each of these three general groups.

I do not question in the slightest degree the complete sincerity of the members of any of these groups. Truth is not to be found either in the assertion that the advocates of OPA are desirous of destroying the American system of free enterprise or in the charge that the opponents of OPA are seeking to promote a ruinous inflation for the benefit of selfish interests. The truth is that all of these groups are most anxious to preserve our way of life and to protect our economy against the existing threats of inflation. They differ only as to the methods by which these laudable objects can be best attained.

There is no doubt that the United States is now confronted with the threat of inflation because existing goods and housing facilities are inadequate to meet the needs of our people. In my judgment, these shortages largely arise out of a combination of these factors: First, the necessary devotion of our major efforts to production for war during the days of combat; second, the unfortunate strikes which have afflicted our country since the cessation of active warfare; and third, OPA practices and policies discouraging production of civilian goods and housing accommodations.

A diligent effort to reach a correct decision concerning the administration of price and rent controls by the Office of Price Administration has convinced me that OPA merits neither complete condemnation nor abject adulation. Taking its work by and large, it has done a pretty good job under most trying circumstances. It has not, however, acted wisely at all times. Upon some rare occasions its conduct has been little short of ludicrous. This finds illustration in its act in putting ceiling prices upon milk without freezing the prices of the feed which the cow converted into milk.

The facts will hardly support the contention of OPA's most ardent supporters that OPA has prevented rises in the cost of living. This assertion has been disproved upon many occasions in recent weeks by the Office of Economic Stabilization itself in justifying substantial raises in the wages of many hundreds of thousands of laborers upon the ground that such advances in such wages were necessary to enable such laborers to cope with the increased cost of living. While OPA has failed to forestall substantial rises in the cost of living, it has undoubtedly minimized such increases.

You may not concur in my observation that existing shortages have been caused in part by policies and practices of OPA itself. Let me remind you that the guns became silent in Europe on May 8, 1945, and in the Pacific on August 14, 1945. The cessation of hostilities made production for the satisfaction of long-deferred civilian needs the matter of foremost importance in our national economy. Notwithstanding this fact, and notwithstanding the further fact that OPA had practically unlimited power to control prices and rents down to midnight on June 30, 1946, serious shortages in civilian goods and in housing accommodations still prevail throughout the country.

In my judgment, this condition did not result solely from our long concentration upon production for war and the unfortunate work stoppages occurring after active warfare ceased. It has arisen in part from certain policies and practices of OPA itself, which OPA has persisted in following in spite of the admonitions and entreaties of many of its friends. The policies and practices in question may have been justified under the exigency of war, but they have undoubtedly impeded our reconversion to a peacetime economy because they have stifled production and raised the cost of living. I will undertake to describe some of these policies and practices in a readily understandable fashion.

OPA insisted upon regarding each industry as a single entity rather than as many individual units, and consistently refused to grant relief to individual producers suffering losses under inadequate ceiling prices in cases where the majority of the producers in the particular industry were making a profit. In enforcing this policy, OPA forced innumerable producers out of business by denying them absolutely needed increases in price ceilings merely because other producers in the same field were realizing profits upon their operations. The public has been unnecessarily deprived of the productive efforts of these unlucky producers through OPA's foolish defiance of the plain economic principle that private business cannot be carried on at a loss.

OPA pugnaciously adhered to the somewhat related fallacious notion that the eligibility of an individual producer for price relief should be determined upon his "over-all" operations, and that he should be denied any increase in the ceiling prices of goods made by him at a loss if his business as a whole netted him a profit. The disastrous effect of this policy on our economy can best be shown by illustration. Let us assume the case of a manufacturer who was making a cheap line of goods at a loss and an expensive line of merchandise at a profit. He applied to OPA for some slight increase in the ceiling prices of his cheap line of goods in the very human hope of converting his losses thereon into a gain. OPA inquired of the manufacturer whether or not his profits on his expensive line of merchandise exceeded his losses upon his cheap line of goods. He answered this question in the affirmative. OPA refused to grant him any price relief in respect to his cheap line of goods, and told him that he would have to continue to make such cheap line at a loss because his profit on his expensive line of merchandise exceeded such loss and made the "over-all" operations of his business profitable. The manufacturer quit making his cheaper line of goods at a loss and concentrated his efforts upon producing his expensive line of merchandise at a profit. This hypothetical event occurred in actuality in untold hundreds of instances because of OPA's acceptance of the unrealistic theory that men can be compelled to produce goods at a loss. This practice contributed materially to driving cheap goods from the market and to compelling consumers to purchase higher priced substitutes because the cheap merchandise was no longer available.

By too rigid adherence to rather contradictory pricing policies, OPA constantly preferred new businesses over established businesses and new lines of goods over old lines of merchandise. It habitually ignored the existence of increases in the cost of producing old lines of standard goods by established manufacturers and refused to grant the slight raises in the ceiling prices of such goods of such manufacturers necessary to enable such manufacturers to continue to produce such goods. On the contrary, however, it manifested considerable liberality in fixing prices upon standard goods manufactured by new businesses and in setting ceilings upon new lines of merchandise made by established businesses. These conflicting practices helped to drive standard goods bearing cheap prices from the market, and to glut the market with shoddy new merchandise bearing high prices, and to create the "crazy-quilt" system of varying ceiling prices upon identical articles made by different manufacturers in the same locality. These policies explain in large measure why reasonably priced ordinary shirts have disappeared from the market and why shop shelves are filled with exorbitantly priced sport shirts, which many men would hate to be caught wearing at 12 o'clock midnight in the bottom of a coal mine during a total eclipse of the moon. These practices also enable me to comprehend why one of my constituents bought the same type of brick from two different manufacturers for erecting the same wall of the same building and why he paid the old brick manufacturer $16.50 per thousand for such brick and the new brick maker $20 per thousand therefor.

As I have stated, the Nation is faced by threats of inflation because existing goods and housing accommodations are insufficient to satisfy the needs of our people. The fundamental question is: How can we best prevent inflation? Shall we refuse to reestablish OPA in any form and place our faith solely in the unrestricted operation of the law of supply and demand? Shall we revive OPA without change, and make it possible for it to persevere in policies and practices which have stifled production? Shall we restore OPA under a statute compelling OPA to pursue policies and practices calculated to encourage the maximum production of needed goods and housing accommodations?

Whatever we do we should do quickly. The state of uncertainty should speedily end.

Existing shortages make it at least hazardous to refuse to reestablish any price and rent controls. Past performances of the policy-makers of OPA render it unwise to revive OPA without change and to afford it an opportunity to persevere in policies and practices which have stifled production. These policy-makers still occupy the high posts in the agency. I fear that they, like Ephraim, are joined to their idols. It is difficult for the Ethiopian to change his skin, or the leopard his spots, or the bureaucrat his mind.

It is well to remember that controlling prices by man-made law is an unnatural way of preventing the operation of the natural law of supply and demand. Price controls of this nature are at best temporary expedients to restrain sellers from exacting from buyers exorbitant sums for scarce things. They do not have any tendency in and of themselves to make such scarce things more plentiful. On the contrary, they aggravate the scarcity and thus prolong the resultant danger of inflation if they are too rigid in their application.

The only possible way to remove the threat of inflation confronting our country is by the production of sufficient goods and housing accommodations to satisfy the wants of our people. While it is important to resort to the temporary expedient of price and rent controls to prevent the soaring of prices and rents upon scarce goods and housing accommodations, it is at least equally as essential that affirmative action shall be taken to encourage the speedy production of the needed goods and accommodations. Consequently, it seems to me that our national economy will be best promoted by reviving OPA for not exceeding 1 year under a statute which will encourage the speedy production of goods and housing accommodations in sufficient quantities to satisfy the needs of our people. Only in this way can an end be put to the danger of inflation arising out of the existing shortages of such goods and accommodations.

Such legislation must necessarily be based upon the proposition that the producers of such goods and the providers of such accommodations shall be entitled to reasonable profits for their efforts, for it is sheer absurdity to expect any man to produce or provide anything for another at a loss in a free economy.

The statute should insure the removal of price controls from a particular commodity just as soon as the supply of such commodity equals the demand for the same.

The proposed legislation should put an early end to the practice of paying about $2,000,000,000 annually out of the Federal Treasury in subsidies to the producers and processors of certain food items. Few Americans are cognizant of the fact that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1946, the following appropriations were made out of the Federal Treasury for the payment of subsidies upon the following items of food going upon our tables, namely:

Butter	$100,000,000
Dairy products	568,000,000
Flour	190,000,000
Meat	595,000,000

Economists contend that the payment of governmental subsidies is inflationary in nature because it relieves the consumers benefited thereby of the necessity of spending corresponding sums of their own, and thus, in effect, increases the purchasing power of such consumers to the amount of the subsidies. Be this as it may, there is little sense in times of peace for the consumer to pay directly to the seller a portion of the purchase price of an article consumed by him, and to pay the remainder of such purchase price in the form of taxes to the Federal Government in order that the Government may relay such remainder of such purchase price to the seller in the form of a subsidy.

The American people must not be misled into believing that prices will remain at present levels. They are sure to advance to some extent, irrespective of the fate which may befall OPA. This has been insured by a number of factors, including the many recent raises in the ceiling prices of commodities and services approved by OPA and the Office of Economic Stabilization to enable employers to provide increased benefits and wages for their employees.

It is highly desirable that the President and the Congress speedily agree upon price- and rent-control legislation sufficient in scope to protect our national economy against the perils of run-away inflation.

We need not despair, however, if such legislation should not be forthcoming. We could still nullify the impending threats to our national economy by heeding and practicing the exceedingly sound counsel which William Green has given to the members of the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Green has said:

The sudden ending of OPA brings a responsibility to business and to labor for carrying on policies that will safeguard the interests of all. We were already in the current of inflation and some price increases are inevitable to readjust production to more satisfactory levels. Minor temporary increases can be absorbed with little permanent change in the purchasing power of our wages. Our major need is increased volume of production.

Our safety lies in getting through this period of transition with no major increases in costs or stoppages of production. Major changes will be cumulative in effect and may start the chain of dangerous inflation. Some employers' organizations are wisely taking action against price and rent increases.

For their own safety the wage earners of the United States should exercise self-discipline and good judgment, and refrain from taking ill-considered and unwise action pending action by Congress. Labor will then be in a position to demand cooperation for holding prices and especially rent levels. Wage earners can best stabilize their wage dollars by helping to increase volume of production which can wipe out scarcities and the danger of run-away inflation.

As workers in a free economy let's first strengthen our foundations so that our strongholds will weather the difficulties. As citizens of a democracy we must preserve our rights by insuring the general welfare.

Regimentation—Federal Planning Is Not the Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, some may recall that last fall the administration insisted that the Federal Government must create 8,000,000 jobs for those who would be unemployed in 1946.

Administration estimates of the amount necessary ran from $24,000,000,000 up.

Those of us—and I was one—who opposed any such expenditure for such a purpose under the plan then offered were charged with being reactionaries. When we ventured to question the estimates and the prophecies of the New Dealers, of men like Wallace, we were characterized as being not only ignorant but lacking in the milk of human kindness.

At that time Wallace—even though the failure of the attempts of former President Hoover and former President Roosevelt and their advisers to make accurate estimates as to employment, unemployment, and prosperity, were pointed out to him—insisted that the New Dealers were infallible in drawing their conclusions as to what must be done.

An editorial in the Washington News of today—July 10, 1946—calls attention to the fact that no group of men can safely ignore or disregard nature's law or the law of supply and demand. That editorial is as follows:

OPA IS DYING

Today, there is some question whether President Truman will get out of Congress another OPA bill as good as or a little worse than the one he vetoed—and whether when he gets it, he will approve it or veto again.

And, on evidence presently at hand, there is doubt whether it will make much difference.

OPA has been a dead Cock Robin for 10 days, counting today. And so far the economic effect has been less than cataclysmic.

The only sustained and voluminous public uproar is for reinstitution of rent controls. On that question there seems to be few, if any, dissenting voices in Congress. If there is failure to agree on other OPA features, it should be easy to get a meeting of minds on rent control.

That can be explained, perhaps, by the fact that in the war years several million American families were begun, while very few additional homes were being built. And it will take a long time to build enough houses and apartments, a longer time than on most items for supply to overtake demand. Hence the need of controls to keep some landlords from charging all the traffic will bear. Even on rents, many tenants seem to be willing to pay reasonable increases to meet the added costs landlords have had to assume in the upkeep of their properties.

As important as or more so than a roof overhead, is something in the stomach. So people are worried about food costs. Since OPA's demise most food costs, that is, costs legally charged, have risen—though some have fallen. Part of the rise is explained by the discontinuance of subsidies which had been paid to food producers and processors under the OPA set-up—so to that extent the consumer actually paid the full price in taxes, if not in prices. Then there is that difference between what was the legal OPA ceiling price and the black-market price. The principal "legal" price increases have been in meat and dairy products. In some American communities as much as 80 and 90 percent of available meat and better was in the black market in the last few months of OPA. So statistics don't mean much.

For instance, in the New York City market butter has ranged from 70 to 80 cents a pound. That's compared to the old OPA ceiling of 65 cents a pound—but with very little butter being offered at that price—while the black market offered butter aplenty at $1 to $1.25 a pound.

The same with meats. In the last week there has been the greatest flood of cattle and hogs into the markets in a decade. Prices have bobbed up and down. Roughly those prices have been above the OPA ceiling, yet below the black prices. So how can anyone tell whether prices have risen or declined over the prices most people actually paid before the end of OPA?

One thing we do know is that in the last year the Government paid out $1,874,000,000 in money taxed and borrowed, in food subsidies alone. Also $70,000,000 in copper, lead, and zinc subsidies, and $54,000,000 in subsidies for stripper oil wells. That was pretty close of a $2,000,000,000 total. And the new OPA bill provided $1,000,000,000 subsidies for the year now starting. So if the OPA is not continued we'll save a lot of money that we otherwise would spend in subsidies.

Scripps-Howard newspapers have supported continuance of OPA. We have believed in orderly decontrols. But the ineffective law which Congress now seems willing to enact is not one which gives us much hope.

The exemption of meat and poultry yesterday was the pay-off. More exemptions are likely to follow today. Maybe we would be better off to accept extension of rent controls and forget about the rest.

We recall that we also were among those who were strong for NRA. When the Supreme Court knocked NRA in the head, we were among those who prophesied that there would be hell to pay. We were afraid wages would be cut. William Green of the AFL predicted there would be widespread labor unrest and strikes—then even as now. We were afraid there would be cutthroat price cutting. (Those were the days when everyone was talking about the need of higher prices, not lower.) But when NRA passed out of existence, what happened? Nothing much. Both prices and wages remained about the same.

Ours is a tough country. We survived NRA with all its fumble-bumble economics. And we survived the death of NRA. We lived through OPA, despite all its bureaucratic thumbs. And if OPA isn't continued, we'll probably still be doing business at the old stand.

Ours is an abundant land. So long as Americans work and produce, we'll probably be able to get what we want for what we can afford to pay. That is, if we work and produce.

Financial Agreements Between United States and United Kingdom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following comparison of actual provisions of the financial agreements between the United States and the United Kingdom with recommendations of House Postwar Planning Committee:

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Our trade with Great Britain in the past has been greater than with any other single nation. Britain's present position requires assistance to get back on a sound trading basis. To facilitate this recovery is to facilitate our own trade and to promote world stability and recovery.

Page 28:

The objectives of American policy should be to assist the United Kingdom to return to a less restrictive system of trading as rapidly as possible. This, of course, will require financial assistance from the United States in the transition period.

Page 9:

The committee feels that a solution to the present problems involved in American foreign trade with countries within the so-called sterling area must be worked out as a prime requisite for large-scale loans to Britain.

The committee feels that while it is natural for England to resort to a continuation of import controls, Government purchases, and quotas, there must be assurance of freeing trade within the shortest possible period. The committee feels that productive loans can be made to England and to the countries to whom England owes large sums of blocked sterling for war debts. The committee is convinced that scaling down and funding of the war debts of Britain to these countries is a preliminary step to any agreement to furnish loans by the United States. All loans, settlements of lend-lease agreements, and surplus-property agreements should be made contingent upon the willingness of England to remove the termopary restrictions on imports, with a schedule agreed upon for their timely removal.

The same principle would apply to the removal of exchange controls which have been made necessary in wartime and are continued as a result of war debts in neutral areas and countries of the sterling area. These controls effectively prevent at the present time any large purchases from the United States by countries like India and Egypt. They are supplemented by bilateral agreements presently being negotiated and by a continuation of the Ottawa agreements affording tariff preferences within the Empire. These should also be modified.

2. That a prerequisite to the granting of large-scale loans to England should be the removal of discriminatory treatment of quotas, exchange controls, and tariff preferences, with an agreed schedule based on the volume of trade, and flexible time schedules for their removal. The committee calls especial attention to the danger of perpetuating state purchasing quotas and to the use of exchange control as a general over-all method of rationing imports with a consequent impairment of freedom of all private trade.

PROVISIONS OF AGREEMENTS

2. Line of credit:

The Government of the United States will extend to the Government of the United Kingdom a line of credit of $3,750,000,000 which may be drawn upon at any time between the effective date of this agreement and December 31, 1951, inclusive.

3. Purpose of the line of credit:

The purpose of the line of credit is to facilitate purchases by the United Kingdom of goods and services in the United States, to assist the United Kingdom to meet transitional postwar deficits in its current balance of payments, to help the United Kingdom to maintain adequate reserves of gold and dollars, and to assist the Government of the United Kingdom to assume the obligations of multilateral trade, as defined in this an other agreements.

7. Sterling area exchange arrangements:

The Government of the United Kingdom will complete arrangements as early as practicable and in any case not later than 1 year after the effective date of this agreement, unless in exceptional cases a later date is agreed upon after consultation, under which immediately after the completion of such arrangements the sterling receipts from current transactions of all sterling-area countries (apart from any receipts arising out of military expenditure by the Government of the United Kingdom prior to December 31, 1948, to the extent to which they are treated by agreement with the countries concerned on the same basis as the balances accumulated during the war) will be freely available for current transactions in any currency area without discrimination; with the result that any discrimination arising from the so-called sterling-area dollar pool will be entirely removed and that each member of the sterling area will have its current sterling and dollar receipts at its free disposition for current transactions anywhere.

8. Other exchange arrangements:

(i) The Government of the United Kingdom agrees that after the effective date of this agreement it will not apply exchange controls in such a manner as to restrict (a) payments or transfers in respect of products of the United States permitted to be imported into the United Kingdom or other current transactions between the two countries, or (b) the use of sterling balances to the credit of residents of the United States arising out of current transactions. Nothing in this paragraph (i) shall affect the provisions of article VII of the Articles of Agreement of the International Montary Fund when those articles have come into force.

(ii) The Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom agree that not later than 1 year after the effective date of this agreement, unless in exceptional cases a later date is agreed upon after consultation, they will impose no restrictions on payments and transfers for current transactions. The obligations of this paragraph (ii) shall not apply:

(a) to balances of third countries and their nationals accumulated before this paragraph (ii) becomes effective; or

(b) to restrictions imposed in conformity with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund, provided that the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States will not continue to invoke the provisions of article XIV, section 2 of those articles, after this paragraph (ii) becomes effective, unless in exceptional cases after consultation they agree otherwise; or

(c) to restrictions imposed in connection with measures designed to uncover and dispose of assets of Germany and Japan.

(iii) This section and section 9, which are in anticipation of more comprehensive arrangements by multilateral agreement shall operate until December 31, 1951.

9. Import arrangements:

If either the Government of the United States or the Government of the United Kingdom imposes or maintains quantitative import restrictions, such restrictions shall be administered on a basis which does not discriminate against imports from the other country in respect of any product; provided that this undertaking shall not apply in cases in which (a) its application would have the effect of preventing the country imposing such restrictions from utilizing, for the purchase of needed imports, inconvertible currencies accumulated up to December 31, 1946, or (b) there may be special necessity for the country imposing such restrictions to assist, by measures not involving a substantial departure from the general rule of nondiscrimination, a country whose economy has been disrupted by war, or (c) either Government imposes quantitative restrictions having equivalent effect to an exchange restriction which that government is authorized to impose in conformity with Article VII of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund. The provisions of this section shall become effective as soon as practicable but not later than December 31, 1946.

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Page 29:

1. A scaling down of the sterling balances accumulated during the war is in the interest of both the United Kingdom and the rest of the world. A large part of these balances is attributable to transactions very much like lend-lease, and should accordingly be handled in a manner similar to lend-lease settlements. Abnormal sterling balances which are not eliminated in this manner should be converted into long-term obligations which will not place an immediate strain upon the British balance of payments. These financial arrangements will make a substantial contribution toward the establishment of a free exchange market for sterling.

Page 29:

3. That as large as possible a portion of the loan to England should be devoted to the liquidation of lend-lease settlements for such goods as are to be retained by England or for consolidating deliveries made under section 3C of the Lend-Lease Act after the end of hostilities.

PROVISIONS OF AGREEMENTS

10. Accumulated sterling balances:

(i) The Government of the United Kingdom intends to make agreements with the countries concerned, varying according to the circumstances of each case, for an early settlement covering the sterling balances accumulated by sterling area and other countries prior to such settlement (together with any future receipts arising out of military expenditure by the Government of the United Kingdom to the extent to which they are treated on the same basis by agreement with the countries concerned). The settlements with the sterling-area countries will be on the basis of dividing these accumulated balances into three categories (a) balances to be released at once and convertible into any currency for current transactions, (b) balances to be similarly released by installments over a period of years beginning in 1951, and (c) balances to be adjusted as a contribution to the settlement of war and postwar indebtedness and in recognition of the benefits which the countries concerned might be expected to gain from such a settlement. The Government of the United Kingdom will make every endeavor to secure the early completion of these arrangements.

(ii) In consideration of the fact that an important purpose of the present line of credit is to promote the development of multilateral trade and facilitate its early resumption on a nondiscriminatory basis, the Government of the United Kingdom agrees that any sterling balances released or otherwise available for current payments will, not later than 1 year after the effective date of this Agreement, unless in special cases a later date is agreed upon after consultation, be freely available for current transactions in any currency area without discrimination.

3. The net sum due from the United Kingdom to the United States for the settlement of lend-lease and reciprocal aid, for the acquisition of surplus property, and the United States interest in installations located in the United Kingdom, and for the settlement of claims, shall be $650,000,000, subject to the account adjustment referred to below. This amount consists of (a) a net sum of $118,000,000, representing the difference between the amount of the services and supplies furnished or to be furnished by each government to the other government after VJ-day through lend-lease and reciprocal-aid channels, less the net sum due to the United Kingdom under the claims settlement, and (b) a net sum of $532,000,000 for all other lend-lease and reciprocal-aid items and for surplus property and the United States interest in installations located in the United Kingdom and owned by the United States Government. The actual amounts due to the respective governments for items included in (a) above other than claims will, however, be ascertained by accounting in due course, and the total sum of $650,000,000 will be adjusted for any difference between the sum of $118,000,000 mentioned above and the actual sum found to be due. All new transactions between the two governments after December 31, 1945, will be settled by cash payment.

The total liability found to be due to the Government of the United States will be discharged on the same terms as those specified in the financial agreement concluded this day for the discharge of the credit provided therein.

Address of Maj. Gen. James M. Gavin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. IVOR D. FENTON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, there has just come to my desk a copy of an address delivered to the graduating class of the Staunton Military Academy, Staunton, Va., by a great soldier and commander, whom I am proud to number among my constituents, Maj. Gen. James M. Gavin, commander, Eighty-second Airborne Division, of Mount Carmel, Pa.

The advice given by General Gavin on that occasion stresses the building up of individual character and through it the development of a strong nation. He also stressed the place which education must play in achieving tolerance and understanding of our fellow men and other countries.

One line in General Gavin's address has especially impressed me; he told these young men, our leaders of tomorrow, "You must remember the lesson you have learned; the principle is worth the effort, always choose the harder right rather than the easier wrong."

Coming as it does from the battle-proven commander of one of the greatest fighting outfits of World War II, the Eighty-second Airborne Division, which fought in Italy, France, Holland, and Germany in the epic battles of Anzio, Salerno, the air invasion of Europe on the Cherbourg Peninsula, the Battle of the Bulge, and the final campaigns of the war, which compelled the beaten German Army to surrender, I think it most fitting to reproduce his words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for others to read.

General Gavin's address follows:

General McFarland, members of the faculty, members of the graduating class, families, and friends, it is a delightful and pleasant experience to be here. This is a lovely setting—here in the hallowed Shenandoah Valley. A more beautiful environment I believe I have never seen. Mid these buildings, hewn from the soil of the valley itself, you have been fortunate to have spent the most impressionable years of your lives. Even these, the buildings, evince a strength, the strength of character and sturdy dependability of the people of Virginia who have contributed so much to our Nation's greatness. It is indeed an inspiring setting.

Now, from this, the very cradle of our Nation's liberty, you go forth in the time-honored manner to make your way into the world and a troubled world it is. I am both grateful and honored to be permitted to say but a few words to start you on your way. First, I want to congratulate you, the graduates and the faculty, for having so successfully completed the prescribed course of instruction and training. To cope with the problems that will beset your way you have been well armed with all the educational advantages provided by the curriculum of this school and you have acquired, in addition, each in your own way, added spiritual and moral strength, you have learned to choose the right, and always the harder right instead of the easier wrong.

This is the essence of character. In this chaotic world where, nowadays, more frequently than not, passing transient gains are taken instead of willingness to work for a principle and sacrifice oneself if necessary.

It is very inspiring to see and visit a school and a student body with such high standards as yours. The measure of our Nation's place in the world is its character. This is true of any nation. The character of a nation is the character of its people collectively, and individually. Individually it is you. The future of our Nation rests in your hands. You must remember the lesson you have learned; the principle is worth the effect, always choose the harder right than the easier wrong.

Coming, as I do, from recent association with many thousands of soldiers, many of them your relatives and friends, I would like first, as far as I may presume to, to speak for them as they would on a great occasion such as this; your graduation. These veterans through their sacrifice and effort with the cooperation of all our people on the home front, have brought the American Nation through its greatest period of trial. Victory has blessed their arms in a war that we sincerely hope was the last of all wars. They were, before our country was attacked, all freedom-loving, typical Americans, each sharing what our forefathers had described in the Declaration of Independence as "Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Theirs was the heritage of our forefathers, who despite the cynicism of the older nations of the world, the trials of time, and the vicissitudes of fate, had molded on this continent a great and free nation of the people. This heritage gave them privilege of citizenship and responsibility as well—the responsibility of defending this Nation and its institutions in its hour of need. This defense they sprang to and in this defense they were fully and ably supported by every American from every walk of life and of every creed. The victory was a common one, hardly a man may say that he contributed more than another. It added to and strengthened the heritage that we call our own. It is a heritage of free enterprise and self sacrifice that we, each of us, share and share alike. This heritage, with just pride and great confidence in you, they pass on to you to cherish, to guard, to strengthen, and preserve. May it provide guidance in moments of doubt, inspiration in moments of need, and strong mental courage to always choose the right, regardless of how hard a right it may be.

Regrettably, there are today in this world many problems, both economic and social. The nations of the world are beset with troubles normal to a postwar period, but nevertheless trying and difficult to their people. It is this world to which you must adapt yourself, and to which all of us and our Nation must become adjusted. There are, in the world today, few permanent and effective restrictions on the exchange of ideas, on the exchange of economic resources, and on travel and movement. With the advent of man's flight and, in recent years, the vast increase in the range of flight, it has become a very small world. It is truly one world. It is a world to which we must adjust ourselves and in which we must learn to live in understanding with others. Only through this will humanity save itself from disaster and provide the era of peaceful, fruitful, progress beneficial to all of mankind.

The real measure of our adjustment to this world is our tolerance and understanding of our fellow men and of other countries. These can only be acquired through broad education. I would recommend to you that you work, read, and study so as to broaden your outlook and appreciation of all of our national as well as international problems. Truly, to do this you realize that your education begins today as you go forth into the world. While I have no intentions of disillusioning you on this, your graduation day, I must emphasize that your education is just beginning. Regardless of whether you go into the Army, or into the other services, or to school or into civilian life, you are on the threshold of an adult life that to be lived well and properly will require broad interests and unceasing self education. These are prerequisites for tolerance and understanding, and tolerance and understanding are prerequisites for peace and happiness in this world.

If our Nation is to fare well in this unstable world it is because you and your generation graduating from schools and universities this June of 1946 will give it in time by your effort, the stability, adaptability and understanding it needs.

In the last analysis then, the school has given you your education and character to equip you well for your place in the world. Those who have gone before you have passed on to you, their sons, through their able and courageous efforts the great American heritage of democracy and all that it implies. The world offers you opportunity and it gives you as well some great problems which you should recognize and be prepared for. In this atomic age more than ever in the past there is unparalleled need of tolerance and understanding. You must continue to prepare yourselves mentally for the world in which you will live and make your way. Be curious, be eager to learn, be understanding, be true sons of your forefathers. Good luck and may God bless your way.

General Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NED R. HEALY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. HEALY. Mr. Speaker, there is a tremendous amount of public interest developing in support of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill. I continue to receive more and more letters and telegrams urging that the House of Representatives pass this bill before recessing for the summer. As partial evidence of the widespread interest I wish to include in the RECORD two newspaper clippings which follow:

[From the Chicago (Ill.) Sun of June 4, 1946]

VETS URGE SPEED ON HOUSING BILL

Representative BRENT SPENCE, Democrat, Kentucky, chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee, will receive a telegram today from a newly formed group of aroused veterans on Chicago's near West Side.

The wire, signed by representatives of four veterans' organizations, resulted from a meeting in Bowen Hall of Hull House last night to discuss the veterans' immediate need of housing facilities.

ACTION ON BILL SOUGHT

Representative SPENCE will be urged to get the Wagner-Ellender-Taft housing bill out of committee and onto the floor of the House of Representatives so that veterans can have decent homes.

"Unless your committee acts—and acts soon—the only hope for removal of the disgraceful housing conditions here is another Chicago fire," the telegram will state.

FUTURE CONSIDERED

Elmer Gertz, chairman of the Veterans' Housing Committee of Chicago, told the group that the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill is not only a bill to provide homes for veterans. "It is the key to good housing in America for years to come," he said.

John G. Stevens, commander of the Greek Veterans of World War II, chairman of the meeting, declared "Unless we get legislation on the housing problem soon, Congress is going to take a vacation and then we'll have to wait until next fall."

Whereupon the slogan "We need homes worse than Congress needs a vacation" was adopted.

[From the Portland (Oreg.) Journal of May 22, 1946]

GENERAL HOUSING BILL SUPPORTED

Portland Housing and Planning Association swung into action this week to help low-income persons get homes to seek revision of the existing planning and zoning code, to advocate a corps of experts for annual inspections and to seek city-wide support of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill.

In supporting the program of the Portland housing authority in acquisition of Dekum Court, an association resolution calls for all properties owned or subsequently built or acquired by the authority to be put on a graduated low-income rental schedule at the earliest possible date.

Portland, according to the association's resolutions, has outgrown the planning and zoning code instituted in 1924. A pat on the back was given the planning commission for obtaining Earl O. Mills, consultant, on revision of the code.

In another resolution the attention of the council and bureau of buildings is called to the need of building inspectors, to make annual inspections of all multiple dwellings, and institution of a system of license fees to cover costs, records and enforcement.

The Reverend Thomas J. Tobin was elected president of the association. Other officers include Walter Durham, first vice president; George Thomas, second vice president; Mrs. R. E. Gearhart, corresponding secretary; May Darling, recording secretary, and Roi Morin, treasurer.

Governor Eccles' Testimony Favoring Financial Agreement With Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, general debate in the House on Senate Joint Resolution 138, the financial agreement bill, commenced last Monday, July 8. Today is Calendar Wednesday, and we are compelled to suspend further debate until Thursday. Both sides have over 10½ hours of general debate remaining. The leaders are making an effort to get the resolution voted on Saturday, July 13, even though it is necessary to have a long night session Saturday night.

Governor Eccles, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, made an interesting statement before our committee in support of the resolution. It is as follows:

ANGLO-AMERICAN FINANCIAL AGREEMENT

STATEMENT OF MARRINER S. ECCLES, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Mr. ECCLES. Mr. Chairman and members of the Banking and Currency Committee, I appreciated this opportunity to express my views on the proposed British loan.

This is one of the most important issues of our time, and one of the most difficult. During the weeks and months of continuous negotiations which we conducted with the British representatives last fall, I formulated three questions in my mind which I eventually found could be answered, at least to my own satisfaction:

1. Why do the British need help from abroad?

2. What would it cost us to help them out?

3. What would we get in return?

First: Why do the British need help from abroad?

They need it because they have just finished an all-out war against our common enemies. They need a blood transfusion to help them regain their international economic health. The proposed credit is not and, therefore, should not be judged as a commercial loan. It is more like a draft on a blood bank.

We in this country know something about the cost of the war. We too have thrown our resources into the breach without thought of anything but victory. And we, too, face a tremendous job of reconversion and of recovery from the strain which the war effort placed on our economic and financial system. This job we plan to do with our own resources. Why cannot the British do the same?

To answer this question we must look at the peculiar character of the British economy. We, in America, who are accustomed to a nation with vast continental resources, find it difficult to realize how different is the position of a country where lifeblocd is in foreign trade.

The key to the whole British problem is that here is a country which cannot live largely from its own resources, a country which must import or die. The British are handling their domestic reconversion well enough, but let us look at the problem they are up against in getting back to pay-as-you-go basis internationally.

Britain's export trade, the main source of her international earning power, was reduced to one-third of normal during the war. Why? Because in her wartime partnership with us, it was agreed that she should concentrate her efforts on war production while we provided her essential imports under lend-lease.

Lend-lease abruptly ended on VJ-day. Britain's real struggle to rebuild her export trade did not begin until that day. She has already made great progress under severe handicaps. She must free labor and materials badly needed for reconstruction at home in order to manufacture goods for export.

She must renew contact with foreign markets and adjust her output to the world's needs. All of this takes time, effort, and organization. Meanwhile the essential imports of food and raw materials must keep flowing in if the British people are to survive.

This temporary loss of exporting power would have been serious enough by itself but in addition, again as a result of the war, Britain has suffered other losses of overseas income.

Before the war Britain was one of the greatest creditor countries in the world, receiving each year close to $1,000,000,000 of net income from her foreign investments.

To finance her war effort, she had to liquidate a large part of her foreign investments and to incur, in the form of frozen sterling balances, foreign obligations amounting to approximately $12,000,000,000. As a result, her net income from foreign investments has been reduced to about $400,000,000.

Not only has she lost this income to pay for current imports; in addition she no longer has as large a volume of liquid assets as would otherwise have been available to tide her over this postwar situation.

In short, the British need help from abroad in meeting the bill for essential current imports during the period when they are getting back on their feet in international trade.

Second: What would it cost us to help them out?

The bill which is before you calls for a line of credit in favor of the British Government up to an amount of $3,750,000,000. This figure was not just picked out of the air. It represents the very careful judgment of the American negotiators as to the minimum amount which the British need from us. It assumes that the British will continue to maintain an austere living standard while they work their way out of their postwar predicament. It takes into consideration the extent to which they can use existing resources and borrow from countries other than the United States. It represents the hard-core deficit in Britain's overseas balance of payments during the postwar transition period.

Now what does a loan of $3,750,000,000 cost the United States? The interest rate which our Government has to pay on borrowed money is not the important matter that some have tried to make it seem.

The real question is the strain on our financial and economic resources. That involves a real cost. I scarcely need remind you that we, too, have inherited troubles from the war. As a result of the way in which we financed the war, our national debt amounts to yearly $275,000,000,000 and our people possess a mass of excessive purchasing power.

The great shortage of goods relative to this purchasing power has created dangerous inflationary pressures in our economy. The expenditure in our markets of dollars provided under this loan would admittedly add to these pressures at this time. However, the added pressures would not be as heavy as they might seem at first sight. The risks which remain are, in my judgment, a small price to pay for what we expect to get in return.

Expenditure of the dollars under the proposed loan would not hit our markets all at once. In fact it would be spread out over a number of years.

The line of credit would be available until the end of 1950 and would be drawn upon by the British only as needed. Furthermore, many of the dollars drawn under the credit would be spent initially in other countries and might take some time finding their way back here.

Even the dollars spent in this country during the next year or so would be used in part for purchasing goods in ample supply. And unless we bog down in the management of our own affairs at home, I might add, more than we already have, our vast capacity to produce goods will progressively overcome the shortages during the life of this extension of credit.

It was neither practical nor desirable to attempt to specify as a condition of the loan how, or when, or for what the dollars should be spent in our markets.

We already have over-all control of exports, through export licenses, whereby we can control the timing and nature of all foreign demands, whether they arise under this loan or otherwise.

This control should be retained during the period of inflationary pressures in our economy whether this loan is made or not. However, we shall have to share with the world some of our scarce resources. This fact has been recognized in our food program. We shall need to recognize it as it affects other necessities if we are to help bring about economic and political stability in the world.

Up to this point my assessment of the real cost of the loan has assumed that it would be duly serviced and repaid. But what of the risk of default? What if this loan proves to be a dead weight on the American taxpayer and not a self-liquidating investment in British recovery?

Of course this risk exists but in my judgment it should not deter us from action.

It can easily be exaggerated and I, for one, would enter upon this loan with every reasonable expectation that it would be repaid. A country that has shown the vigor, the courage, and the strength of character that Britain has shown during this war period is a country in which we can have confidence.

Through all the rigors of wartime life in England, the British people have shown a capacity for government and for management of their economic affairs which is rare in this world.

The payments on this loan which will probably amount to no more than 2 percent of Britain's annual expenditures abroad, will certainly not prove unmanageable if we succeed in building any sort of a satisfactory postwar world.

Of course, we cannot foresee the conditions which will prevail over the rest of this country; and neither this loan agreement nor any of the other economic arrangements into which we now enter can survive a state of world-wide economic collapse such as we suffered during the great depression of the thirties.

Further, we in this country must recognize that in the long run international trade must be a two-way street, and that only through an adequate intake of foreign goods and services can we sustain a thriving export business and enable the debts due us to be paid.

But let me impress this thought upon you: That our very purpose in making the loan is to create the conditions in the world under which it can be repaid.

Third. What would we get in return?

The contract for this proposed loan provides for repayment of the principal and for a moderate rate of interest, but at this juncture in our affairs at home we are certainly not looking for loans just for the sake of a financial return. On the contrary, no foreign loan should be made at this time which does not reasonably promise lasting benefits and compensations to the United States far outweighing the financial consideration involved. My endorsement of this proposed loan to Britain is based on the firm belief that it is an essential step in world recovery and reconstruction.

We live today in a sick world. We have yet to attain the objectives of the Atlantic Charter—freedom from want and freedom from fear. We do not yet know whether the victory of American arms in the war will be crowned by victory of American ideals in the peace. But we do know that if the war-shattered world is not restored to a tolerable degree of economic health our ideals of peace and democracy cannot survive.

This situation is a challenge to America. We have already gone far to meet this challenge, but the measure which is now before you is, in a sense, the keystone of the whole program.

As you know, this Government has taken the lead in drawing up treaties of economic peace as the basis for a stable world order. We have laid down rules of the game for a peaceful and productive system of world trade and finance, first in the Bretton Woods agreements and then in the proposals for an international trade organization.

The basic justification for the British loan is that it would enable Britain to join with us in turning these blueprints into a living reality. Without the loan, the British would have to go their own way without us—indeed, in opposition to us.

As you know, Britain is the largest market in the world trade so that her commercial and exchange practices have a very great influence on the rest of the world.

Traditionally she has tended to follow liberal trade principles. If we refuse this loan, however, she could hope to maintain her essential imports only by making a desperate bid for domination in world markets. She would be forced to intensify the restrictive and belligerent currency and trading practices born during the years of war and depression.

In order to exploit to the full her advantage as the world's leading importer, she would have to turn increasingly to state trading and barter. A large part of the rest of the world would be forced into the same pattern and free enterprise in foreign trade would be strangled. Along this road lies further totalitarian development.

The alternative is clear. If we grant the British sufficient credit to cover that hard-core deficit in their overseas payments during the transition years, they will be able to work their way out of their postwar predicament in a peaceful and orderly way.

They will be able to open their markets to the world on a basis of nondiscrimination and receive access to foreign markets on the same basis. They will be able to make pounds sterling earned by foreign suppliers of the British market freely convertible into other currencies so that trade would no longer have to be arbitrarily channeled along bilateral lines. Dollars provided by the loan would flow to the British Empire, to Latin America, to western Europe, to all of the countries receiving net payments from Britain.

The loan to Britain would become in this way a source of assistance to a great many other countries which desire dollars to make purchases here. In short, the road would be opened to a genuine world trading system, which is essential to the maintenance of productive employment and economic stability in a democratic world.

The costs and risks of this project must therefore be weighed against the objectives which we seek. Without effective British participation, which is possible only if we lend our aid, the Bretton Woods institutions and the international trade organization cannot fulfill the hopes which we have placed in them.

Without the fulfillment of these hopes for a stable and productive economic order in the world, there is little prospect of success for the United Nations organization in its search for political stability and security. Without economic or political stability, we can expect only a continued drift of world affairs toward the catastrophe of a third world war.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Brown, do you wish to interrogate the witness?

Mr. BROWN. Just this question:

You said our debt is about $275,000,000,000. What is Britain's debt at this time; do you know?

Mr. ECCLES. I am told that it is about $100,000,000,000, which is more significant, it seems to me, when we consider these facts:

We hear this sort of criticism of the loan: That we should not be called upon to lend to the British, since we are poorer than they are as evidenced by our much larger national debt. I have heard those arguments, and possibly you have, too. There are so many errors in this statement that at first it seems unworthy of attention, and yet I am sure it has deceived a good many people. It should be obvious to anyone that large public holdings of Government bonds in a country, in their own country, are not a mark of poverty.

Even if they were, the British public holds about the same per capita that we do. In other words, the British debt per capita is about the same as ours, and in relation to the national income, Britain's national debt is 50 percent higher than ours, while the interest which she pays on it is 100 percent higher than what we pay.

The United States national debt, at the end of 1945, is 1.73 times the national income for 1945.

The United Kingdom national debt at the end of 1945, was 2.65 times the national income for 1945.

And I should like to point out, in connection with the United States national debt at the end of 1945, that it has been substantially reduced since that time, and there is every prospect that it will be reduced by a considerable additional amount between now and the end of the year. It would be my offhand estimate, assuming our national income of course does not continue to remain down as a result of these serious strikes, that whereas the debt came close to $280,000,000,000, I would expect at the end of this year it would be somewhere between two hundred and sixty and two hundred and sixty-five billion dollars. That certainly is a possibility.

As you know, it has already been substantially reduced in the months of March and April and May, and it has already been announced by the Treasury that there will be a retirement of close to $4,000,000,000 additional on the public debt in June.

The interest payments on the United States debt are 2.5 percent of the national income in 1945. The interest payment on the British debt is 5.09 percent of the national income for 1945.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad to have that. May I ask you, Governor, if you would give us the capacity of production of goods and services of Britain compared with that of the United States?

Mr. ECCLES. What are you basing that on? National income? Are you judging the capacity produced on the basis of national income?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. If you do not have those figures at this time, you may place them in the record later.

Mr. ECCLES. Measured by national income, the figures for 1945, Britain's was about one-fifth of ours. I would say that normally we would have reason to expect that it might be as much as one-fourth of our production.

Mr. BROWN. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Crawford.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman Eccles, you were referring to the status of the British per capita debt, total debt, national income, and percentage of national income paid in interest. As related to the United States, that is. I believe you said that our interest was about 2.5 percent of the 1945 national income.

Mr. ECCLES. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What national income figure did you use for that?

Mr. ECCLES. I think our national income last year was around 155 or 160 billion dollars. I do not recall exactly what the figures were, but I assume that the staff people can give it to you.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Could you give us the other side of the question which would answer it? In other words, if the interest paid amounts to 2.5 percent of the 1945 national income, what was the interest paid? We could then calculate the national income very easily.

Exemptions Under a New OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of July 8, 1946:

EXEMPTIONS UNDER A NEW OPA

Numerous proposals are now being made to exempt this or that commodity from OPA control, in the event the control machinery is revived. Special interests in the Middle West want all meats free from price fixing. Similar interests in the South want oil and cottonseed prices uncontrolled and the old differential on southern pine removed.

This idea of exempting specific products by law is indefensible. The thing to do is to adopt proper control principles and then release each specific product from restrictions as soon as conditions warrant. In some cases, where conditions are already approximately right, the release should be almost immediate. In other cases, a relatively long time would elapse before controls were removed. But in all cases release would be under a fair formula. There should be no favoring of some by premature or arbitrary release.

The thing for Congress to do, then, is to arrive at sound control principles and to let the new OPA administer those principles under new formulas. The objective at this time is to obtain maximum production at minimum prices. The only way prices can be held down is to work consciously for high production. Materials and labor costs are high. One difficulty has been that labor efficiency has been too low. Another has been that production was curtailed, due to work stoppages and the scarcity of materials and parts.

We cannot go on this way. The new OPA, if there is to be one, will have to be realistic in a dozen directions where hitherto OPA was merely obstinate. We need, in other words, an improved OPA, but it will be of no value to create a control machinery which covers everything except meats and petroleum products and cottonseed and perhaps, eventually, a hundred and one other commodities which have friends in Congress.

Whether conditions are such that a specific product need no longer be under price control is an administrative matter, to be decided by the enforcement agency which is finally set up. It is not a legislative matter for Congress to decide politically or on the basis of this or that sectional interest.

Surely it does not require superhuman intelligence to see that.

The British Credit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. FOLGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times:

THE BRITISH CREDIT

The House of Representatives has begun final consideration of a measure which is as important for our safety, for the preservation of our way of life, and for the realization of the aims for which we fought as any measure Congress has been asked to pass upon thus far. This measure is the Anglo-American trade and financial agreement of last December extending to Great Britain what is generally referred to as a loan of $3,750,000,000, but what is really a line of credit permitting our wartime ally to draw up to that amount over a period of 5 years if it finds this necessary in order to free itself from the more onerous economic shackles imposed upon it by the war and resume its place beside the United States as a champion of economic cooperation and economic freedom, which are the essential bases of a free and peaceful world.

To the outside world this credit has become the touchstone of America's policy and intentions after the war. Our readiness or unreadiness to grant this credit must decide whether the United States is willing to do its share toward world reconstruction on the basis of free, normal, and healthy trade, or whether the nations hard hit by the war must continue and even expand and tighten that vast system of economic regimentation and discriminatory financial and trade controls which are the forerunners of political regimentation and ultimate conflict. Our action here must decide, in short, whether the world shall look to the American or to the Russian system for salvation, and whether the United States is to be a leader in the postwar world or whether it prefers to retire to an economic isolation which would quickly nullify the gains of its conversion to international political collaboration.

It is for these reasons that both President Truman and Secretary Byrnes have sent urgent appeals to the House to approve this agreement. As Mr. Truman said, this plan is an integral part of our whole international economic policy, which Congress has already endorsed. Without this agreement, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to proceed with the United Nations program for international cooperation. Without it, the prospect is not economic cooperation but conflict in economic policy between the two greatest trading nations in the world—conflict which would not only be disastrous to the well-being of both countries but would also endanger the peace and security of the whole world. Secretary Byrnes, struggling in Paris for a tolerable peace in the face of the handicaps already imposed upon him by congressional neglect of America's military power, adds the warning that political peace is not enough, and will not endure if the world is again split into economic blocs waging economic warfare against one another.

Viewed in this light, the credit agreement far surpasses any benefit to be derived from it by American industry and our export business. It is to be hoped that the House will see the matter in this light and, undeterred by extraneous issues, follow the way already pointed by the Senate and its own Banking and Currency Committee—a way that leads to a decisive approval. The whole program of world recovery, and with it peace and security, now hinge on this action.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials:

[From the Baltimore (Md.) Sun of June 30, 1946]

NO HOUSE STALLING ON THE REORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS

The congressional reorganization bill has passed the Senate. But it is stalled in the House. There the Rules Committee, which controls House legislative programs, is taking its time about bringing the reorganization plan before the lower Chamber. It is within the power of the administration leadership to blast this Rules Committee blockade. This should be done because the pending bill is of an importance which anyone with a sense of history and an insight into our political institutions must appreciate.

Article I of the United States Constitution is devoted to the Congress. This top billing did not happen by accident. The Constitution makers looked on the Congress as the core of their scheme of government. An Executive was necessary, as were the courts. But in 1787 both these agencies within living memory had been turned against the general welfare in the old country. The Congress, representing all kinds and conditions of the people, was as perfect a guarantee against this kind of subversion as human ingenuity could devise.

Today, 160 years later, the Congress is not doing so well. Its business has proliferated in a thousand directions. To that business it brings pretty much the machinery of the past, and not always of the recent past. The result is that its Members are overworked and underpaid. Not unnaturally, the Congress has been subsiding in relative influence as against an executive steadily on the make in power and a top Federal judiciary reflecting the executive point of view.

It is here that the La Follette-Monroney program for congressional reorganization comes into the picture. Its purpose is to modernize the congressional machinery so that the National Legislature may "adequately perform its main functions of determining policy, authorizing administrative organization and appropriations to carry out policy, and supervising execution of the resultant programs."

Congress, of course, has made errors, some of them serious ones. Indeed, some of these errors may be attributable to the defects of the present set-up. On the other hand, nobody should expect perfection from mere structural change. But that structural change can help seems pretty clear. The Senate debate on this reorganization plan was grave and elevated. No wonder. For most of the Senators agreed with Senator LA FOLLETTE that something has to be done "to save representative government in America." That warning ought to shake the bill loose for action in the House.

DEMONSTRATED NEED

It's to be hoped that the Nation's lawmakers realize that in recent months they have been giving a highly convincing demonstration of the need for passage of the congressional reorganization bill.

They have spent months in getting little done, and now are having to rush to take care of the most pressing needs of the country before they go home.

In this final rush to get essential problems attended to, they have at times been impatient of opposition and have pressed for final action rather than for the wisest action.

When possibilities for middle-ground courses are neglected, there's strong chance that legislation adopted will not be that which will best serve our needs.

Political motives have ruled strongly in this Congress. There has been a stalemate between Congress and the President that has had serious effects on the country at large. Some Congressmen have been against just about anything recommended, but have had no reasonable alternative measures to offer. Certain lawmakers have placed personal political safety above the country's needs.

It is reasonable to assume, however, that most Congressmen haven't liked this situation. They wanted to get things moving, but they found that they couldn't. They were entangled in the outmoded procedures bequeathed them by past Congresses, and they could get no agreement on policy.

The result of this situation has been a most distressing time for the Nation, and there is no assurance that there won't be more difficulty stemming from the same sources.

It is difficult under the circumstances to see how Congressmen find it in themselves to go home without seeing that the reorganization bill is made law. It provides for securing unity on policy between Congress and the Chief Executive. It simplifies and modernizes congressional procedures. It provides expert assistance for Congressmen. It follows the rule of common sense instead of precedents that were established in days long ago.

The fact remains, however, that Congressmen can and may go home without final passage of this bill.

[From the Detroit (Mich.) News of June 29, 1946]

A SELFISH BLOCKADE

Speaker RAYBURN and the House Democratic organization are blocking the Senate-passed bill to reorganize the Federal legislative machinery for purposes of efficiency and responsibility.

The spectacle, as reported by Jay G. Hayden, of our Washington bureau, is a repulsive one. RAYBURN and his buddies are holding out for changes in the bill, without which they will not let it come to a vote. These changes are designed to preserve not so much the power as the prerogatives of the ruling clique, mostly southerners, which enjoys the advantages conferred by seniority on long-continued service.

The bill would reduce the number of committees. This would actually increase the power of control of the House majority organization over legislation and with it the possibility, at least, of effective party responsibility for legislation. But it would also deprive a number of aging southern gentlemen of committee chairmanships, which mean much to them in prestige, clerk hire, and other prerequisites. So the organization is against it.

It is the same with the provision for setting up policy committees by which, it is hoped, the majority and minority parties might be helped to formulate coordinated, recognizable, and hence more responsible legislative policies. The ruling clique of Democrats is content to keep policy-making under its own hats, where it now resides when it recognizably resides anywhere.

The News never has waxed very enthusiastic over this bill. The root causes of legislative irresponsibility are to be found in the failure of party discipline. This in turn is rooted in the direct primary. The only cure for it is for the political parties to forsake the custom, which grew up with the primary system, of remaining aloof from the selection of the candidates who run for election under their respective banners.

But the bill is worth while, as far as it goes. The treatment being accorded it by the House organization is more evidence of how badly Congress needs heroic medication to revive its sense of responsibility to the country.

The Negro Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 19, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial by Lucy Baskerville, secretary of the Carter Patriotic and Civic Association, Inc., which is a splendid example of the tolerant and progressive spirit of many members of the Negro race toward racial relations.

It appeared in the June 15 issue of the Hartford Chronicle. There would be very few serious racial problems which could not be solved if they could be approached in the spirit of this editorial, by both the white and colored peoples.

OBSERVATIONS ON NEGRO PRESS

(By Lucy Baskerville, secretary, Carter Patriotic and Civic Association, Inc.)

The editor's invitation to act as guest editor for this week's Bridgeport edition of the Hartford Chronicle is considered a privilege and an honor.

Our subject is "Plain observations of an average reader of the Negro Press."

We affirm these truths to be self-evident:

That the press is mainly responsible for mass progress, or mass incitement to "act that might set us back 100 years."

That the press is with us from the time we learn to read until the time we cease to live, a sort of eternal textbook of life that patterns and molds us toward progress or retrogression.

A million things worthy of mention happen in a day. A given group of journalists decides which few of all these happenings shall be presented to the reading public.

Discerning journalism, carefully recalling the chain of events of yesterday, selects and states today's news mindful of tomorrow's repercussions.

Sometimes our Negro journalism fails to think in these three dimensions.

When this happens our page ones emphasize the bad in other races, failing to bring the sheet into balance with an equal emphasis on the good in other races. I daresay this increases circulation (because it is a well-recognized trait in human nature to enjoy sensationalism), but do such practices lead to the "One World" idea of the UNO toward which the world is slowly groping?

Advertising: When Westbrook Pegler attacked a certain section of the Negro press for accepting advertising of "Lucky Numbers" books, Loadstone, Love Powers, and sundry other items dear to the heart of the superstitious, our group (Carter Patriotic and Civic Association) discussed that particular Pegler column at length, and unanimously agreed that Mr. Pegler was "dead right." (However, at the same meeting we passed an oral resolution condemning the same Mr. Pegler for practically everything else he had written about colored people up to that time.)

Our editorials: One of the most intelligent men we know insists that he never completed the fourth reader. He is a successful businessman today at 50. His alma mater is said to be travel, listening, and reading editorials.

There are many ambitious young men of our race today who for one cause or another will not complete their formal schooling in a regular classroom, but who have already completed the first phase of this successful man's education, and to whom the Army discipline has already taught much of the second phase. There remains for these the final phase only—to have presented to their attention the type of editorials that will reach their consciousness with sufficient impact to cause them to work out their economic and social and political destinies within the framework of the American Democracy, without injury either to themselves or others. The news of the day condensed into the editorial can be made to tell of the progress, the needs, the history, the natural resources, the opportunities to pioneer in export and import trade and discovery in the wide African lands beyond the seas, as well as of the opportunities here at home for those who have the eyes and will to work.

Finally it is the privilege and the sacred trust of the Negro press to bring to these youths the things spoken of in a Garvey poem which I have hanging on the wall beside my desk:

"You sit and quarrel all your life,
And blame the moving world at large;
You fail to enter in the strife,
To sail in fortune's happy barge."

Is the Railroad Retirement System Sound?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, is the Railroad Retirement System what railroad employees have been told and believe it to be?

Is the manner of financing it sound?

Do railroad employees have a real reserve, in the form of a trust fund, in the United States Treasury?

Is the Railroad Retirement System an independent service separate from the so-called social security plan?

The politicians in control of the Government since the passage of the Railroad Retirement Act have assured railroad employees that they have a genuine retirement plan, soundly financed in every way, amply supported by a well-guarded and administered trust fund, and that it is set up independently of the so-called social security or other Federal retirement plan.

The Railroad Retirement Board in its annual reports paints a glowing picture for railroad employees. It presents elaborate tables and charts to show employee annuities, pensions, and survivor benefits currently disbursed and accruing for future payments.

On the surface the plan has a good appearance. The trouble is, railroad employees do not get the whole picture, and what is given them is greatly distorted. I think it is high time that the mask be removed from the Railroad Retirement System so that the railroad employees may know just what it really is.

The fact is that when this plan is carefully examined it will be seen that it is more particularly a scheme to tax railroad employees and employers to pay Government operating costs than a retirement plan.

How any unbiased and disinterested person can really think this subject through and come to any other conclusion is difficult to conceive.

From the time the railroad retirement plan went into effect in 1937 through March 1946 the Government collected from railroad employees and railroad companies taxes for the retirement account amounting to $1,742,500,000. During this time it collected from the general public, of which railroad employees form a part, and therefore must help to pay, hidden in the prices they pay for the necessities of life, taxes for the "interest" on their so-called trust fund amounting to $43,800,000. A total of $1,786,272,000. Of this amount, $1,064,500,000, or approximately 59 percent, went for current benefits; $642,000,000, or approximately 36 percent, remained in the Treasury and was spent for general Government operating purposes; $24,672,000, which equals about 2.3 percent of the benefit payments, was used for administrative expenses. The balance, $55,200,000, remains in the general fund and disbursing officers' account.

Railroad employees are told by the politicians in Washington that this $642,000,000 is a reserve, and that acting as trustee for the railroad employees, they hold it as a trust fund, and that it draws 3 percent compound interest. The employees are also told that this reserve is available at all times in the future to be drawn upon as need arises.

As a matter of fact, railroad employees have no such trust fund in the Treasury. Virtually all they have to show for this $642,000,000 is I O U's which appear on the books of the Treasury as a credit for Government securities.

Railroad employees have been given the impression that after they have been taxed 3½ percent of their wages—the amount was less to start with and will be slightly higher later—that they were through contributing. In this they are mistaken. They must continue to pay and pay and pay. They do not realize that they are being heavily taxed to pay for so-called social security, old-age and survivors insurance, and civil-service annuities. But more on this subject later.

Designating this $642,000,000 a reserve has given railroad employees a grossly false impression. Many of them have been led to believe that this so-called reserve actually composes the money they and their employers paid into the account. They do not know that this money has been used up to pay Government expenses.

It is a political and not an economic concept to regard the taxes collected from railroad employees and employers which are paid into the Treasury and disbursed by it for operating the Government as a trust fund. There is nothing about the transaction which has any of the characteristics of what has commonly been considered a trust fund.

Black's Law Dictionary defines a trust fund as follows:

A fund held by a trustee for the specific purpose of the trust; in a more general sense, a fund which, legally or equitably, is subject to be devoted to a particular purpose and cannot or should not be diverted therefrom.

Certainly railroad retirement taxes which the Government appropriates to its own use cannot even be said to be held by it, much less held by it as trustee for any specific purpose.

The specific purpose for which the politicians in control of the Government are supposed to hold these funds, and for which railroad employees believe they are held, is retirement benefits, assuredly not to pay operating expenses of the Government.

Funk & Wagnall's Standard Dictionary defines the term "investment" as "the act of investing capital productively, also the money so invested, or the property so produced."

It would be the height of absurdity to pretend that this money is productively invested, in any commonly accepted sense of the term as it is used in connection with trust funds. This money is spent for political or other nonproductive purposes, and in no small measure of the most destructive kind.

Here is what really happens: The administration in charge of the Government taxes railroad employees and employers, ostensibly to provide such employees with a retirement system. As a part of the scheme it pretends to invest that portion of such taxes not used to pay administrative costs and to meet current benefit payments in a trust fund.

But the administration spends this money to pay general debts incurred in the operation of various governmental functions. It simply uses the money to wipe out a certain amount of current general public indebtedness and creates in its place a like amount of long-term special public indebtedness.

Instead of taxing the general public to pay $642,000,000 of current operating debts the administrations in charge of the Government taxed a special group, railroad employees and employers, to pay such debts.

In the guise of providing a retirement system for railroad employees the forces in control of the Government tapped a new source of revenue to provide them with more spending money.

Without the Railroad Retirement Act the administrations would have been compelled to either reduce the general operating costs of the Government by $642,000,000, a dire necessity, or tax the general public for this amount.

With this act they have been relieved of that difficulty. They just "borrowed," in perpetuity, from railroad employees $642,000,000 with which to pay off an equal amount of current general public indebtedness.

The all-important consideration in placing one's money in a trust fund is the safety of the principal. A trust fund that swallows up the money entrusted to its care, like the Government swallows up the taxes which it collects from railroad employees and employers, just is no trust fund.

Nor is a trust fund such in reality unless the capital entrusted to it is put to productive use. That is absolutely necessary to make it a trust fund.

When one purchases an endowment policy from a life insurance company the premiums one pays in go into productive enterprise. They are used to produce tangible wealth. The public benefits by the newly created wealth, the company receives compensation for its service in putting the premiums paid in to work, and the holder of the policy receives compensation in the form of dividends for the use of his money. Thus we see all parties concerned benefit by the transaction.

True, life insurance companies hold Federal Government securities. But they also hold productive assets, mortgage loans, railroad and public utility bonds, real estate, and so forth.

In any event, regardless of who holds Government debt obligations they remain nonproductive and are just so much dead weight upon the citizenry as a whole.

The premiums, capital, paid on an endowment policy are always safe and can be recovered if the insurance company is sound and solvent. Here are embodied the principles of a true trust fund.

But not so with the money paid into the Railroad Retirement Account. No new wealth whatever is created. In fact, this money is in the first instance in large measure taken out of productive enterprise and then put into wholly unproductive Government projects. This point is vital.

Railroad employees have prided themselves on having their own retirement system, separate from and independent of the social security or any other Federal retirement plan. But the distinction they make is a superficial one. They have their own agency, the Railroad Retirement Board, to administer their benefits, but that is all.

What really counts is the financial structure of the plan and who manages the financing. When these features of the scheme are examined it will be seen that the railroad retirement plan rests on substantially the same basis as the social security and civil service retirement plans.

The management of the finances of all three is in the hands of the politicians who happen to be in control of the Government.

All the taxes which the Government collects under these plans in effect go into a common pool along with other Federal taxes, namely, the general fund of the Treasury.

Like the taxes collected for railroad retirement benefits, all the taxes collected for social security and Federal civil service retirement benefits, except those required for administrative costs and current benefit payments, are spent by the Government for general operating purposes, and there is nothing to show for these contributions but I O U's.

Just as railroad employees are told that they have a reserve in the form of a trust fund in the Treasury which draws interest and can be resorted to at any time in the future to provide retirement and other benefits, so persons coming under the so-called social security old age and survivors insurance and the civil service annuity plans are told the same thing.

As in the case of railroad employees who are assured that a tax of 3 percent compound interest on their I O U account will be levied upon the public to build it up and provide retirement benefits, so also those coming under these other plans have a like assurance with respect to their I O U accounts.

In the case of social security, the tax would be equal to more than 2 percent compound interest, and in that of the civil-service annuity plan 4 percent compound interest.

Railroad employees are being taxed not only to help pay the interest on their own false trust fund but also the illusory trust funds held by the Treasury for employees covered under social security and the Federal civil service retirement plans. They pay these taxes through hidden taxes added to the necessaries of life, and also in the form of pay-roll withholding taxes.

They are further being taxed through hidden or consumer taxes to provide the contributions made by their own employers and those coming under social security. And they are being taxed to pay the 8-percent contribution which the Government makes toward the civil service retirement plan.

Thus, we see that all of these plans are but parts of a whole. It is through the payment of consumer taxes by the public that employers coming under these retirement acts are provided with the funds to make their contributions. This feature alone strongly identifies these plans with each other.

To understand the railroad retirement system it is necessary to study it in connection with the social-security plan and also the Federal civil-service retirement system. Other Government programs which we shall not mention here are also involved.

It is important to understand that the taxes which railroad companies contribute to their retirement account are not really paid by them. Those taxes are shifted on to shippers and others who use their services. In turns they are passed on to distributors, wholesalers, retailers, and so forth, and finally charged to the consuming public.

The same is true, of course, with respect to the taxes paid into the social-security account by producers of raw materials, manufacturers, and the several handlers involved in getting finished products to their ultimate destination where the consumer finally takes over the tax load. That these taxes are ultimately paid by the consuming public is not theory but obvious fact.

Some, but not all of the taxes paid into the Federal civil-service annuity account are provided through consumer taxes.

How much in taxes has the Government collected from these groups for such benefits, but spent on itself? How much in I O U's has the Government exchanged for this cash? Following are some revealing figures which were as of March 31, 1946:

I O U's held by the Treasury

Railroad retirement I O U's	$642,000,000
Federal old-age and survivors insurance I O U's	7,224,400,000
Unemployment I O U's (includes railroad unemployment I O U's, and Federal and State unemployment I O U's under Social Security Act)	7,378,200,000
Federal Civil Service I O U's	2,159,900,000
Total	17,404,500,000

Railroad employees and their employers, industrial workers coming under social security and their employers, Federal employees, and the Government—taxpayers—have already paid $17,400,000,000 in taxes for retirement and other benefits which the Government has spent for other purposes.

Something more than one billion of this represents interest collected from the public, a large portion of which employees coming under these retirement plans paid in consumer and pay-roll withholding taxes.

The employees who contributed a large part of this sum, and for whose benefit the remainder was contributed, have nothing but I O U's from the Government to show that this money has been handed over to it.

It is claimed this $17,400,000,000 in I O U's is a true reserve because it can be converted into cash at any time by issuing Government bonds and selling them to investors. That is, they could be converted into cash by levying a general tax on the public. Selling securities is only deferred taxation.

But who is the public? There are about 1,500,000 railroad employees covered under the Railroad Retirement Act—40,000,000 fully covered and 30,000,000 more having some wage credits under the Social Security Act—and roundly 3,000,000 civil-service employees. These groups, therefore, compose a large portion of the taxpaying public. It is upon them that would in great measure fall the tax burden for replenishing the spent funds in their accounts.

Here we have a good illustration of "we owe it to ourselves." Surely a very substantial part of this money which has been sunk into political projects could never be recovered by railroad and other employees coming under these plans except by paying it themselves.

It should be borne in mind, however, that Federal employees are far in excess of the number really required. The cost of the surplusage is in great measure being borne by the other two groups.

Of course, these plans are not set up with the idea that the I O U's are to serve as a true reserve, as this term is commonly understood. It is inherent in the scheme to make them irredeemable. The idea is to develop the I O U account to a sufficient size so that the "interest" thereon plus the employee and employer taxes is adequate to meet benefit payments. This point will be further developed a little later.

The Government must this year collect taxes or charge to the public an amount equal to approximately 2.3 percent of $17,400,000,000 in I O U's or more than $400,000,000. They call this interest. Railroad employees will have to pay their share of this in the form of hidden and payroll withholding taxes.

But we are only at the beginning of the program. How much more will the employees and employers coming under the several Federal Government retirement plans have to hand over to the Government to finance its operating costs?

The Crosser bill raises the tax employees and employers each must pay from 3½ to 5¾ percent for 1947 and then steps the rate up to 6 percent for 1951 and 6¼ percent for 1952 and thereafter. A total increase of 2¾ percent over the present rate.

The chief actuary for the Crosser bill estimates that the taxes provided therein are sufficient to produce cumulative amounts of I O U's every 10 years approximately as follows: $2,300,000,000; $3,400,000,000; $4,500,000,000; $5,900,000,000; $7,600,000,000; $9,200,000,000; $11,200,000,000. This is something serious for prospective railroad pensioners to think about.

The Social Security Board estimates the I O U's that will be required to keep the social-security account "solvent" may ultimately reach a figure of $92,000,000,000.

It is my understanding that the I O U's in the civil-service account are expected to reach a figure of approximately $5,000,000,000 before they level off.

It should be noted that the civil-service employees occupy a favored position. They have a great advantage over the other groups. The Government's (taxpayers') share of the civil-service annuity taxes is 8 percent while that of the employees is only five.

Then there are the $7,500,000,000 of I O U's in the unemployment railroad insurance and the State unemployment insurance activities accounts. No one can know how much higher this debt will go.

Taking a somewhat intermediate figure at which the railroad retirement I O U account might be expected to level off, if the Crosser bill passes, say $6,000,000,000, and adding it to the above would total $110,000,000,000. This colossal debt would serve as a financial foundation for the railroad retirement system, social-security and old-age survivors insurance and civil-service annuity plans.

Security for aged railroad employees based on a $110,000,000,000 permanent Government or nonproducing debt.

With all deference to the thinking of those who contrived this scheme, to me it appears so fantastic and irrational that I cannot conceive how it was possible that it ever saw the light of day.

Human slavery can be founded on Government debt, social security never.

To be sure, the argument runs that the Government merely borrows these funds from railroad and other employees coming under these retirement plans, that if it did not borrow from such employees it would be compelled to borrow from the general public. So we are told the indebtedness of the Government would be the same in either event.

Do those who argue this way also contend that the Government would borrow from private investors in perpetuity, as it does from the retirement accounts? Hardly.

How can it be said this money is borrowed when there is no intention of ever paying it back, when, in fact, it is basic to the scheme not to do so; when indeed the Government repudiates in advance the principal of the debt!

This is plainly a deception. The Government does not borrow this money at all. It just takes it and spends it for general operating purposes exactly as it does other tax receipts.

The so-called interest which is paid by the public on the I O U's is a subterfuge. It is an artifice to supplement the taxes collected from employees and employers by levying a general tax upon the public.

Since railroad and the other employees coming under these retirement plans pay a major portion of the general taxes, they must bear a corresponding share of the tax burden for providing this additional revenue. "We owe it to ourselves" and we pay it to ourselves.

To say the Government would borrow from other sources if it did not from these retirement accounts is, aside from the fact that it does not really borrow, a specious argument and can come only from an unwise and improvident personnel in control of the Government, from one that is forever running it in debt. The very idea of deliberately planning to create a permanent public debt of $110,000,000,000 in and of itself conclusively proves this, in my judgment.

It should be borne in mind that the war had nothing to do with the planning of this debt. It was planned when the Railroad Retirement and Social Security Acts were passed, which was years before the war.

Of course, those railroad employees who happen to be old enough to retire and to exercise their pension rights during the earlier part of this retirement plan will seemingly fare pretty well. This aspect of the system is very deceptive. The impression is given that future benefits will be the same as they are now. This is altogether out of the question. As time goes on the net returns to retired railroad employees must necessarily continuously diminish.

Even those who are already on the retired list are not as well off as it might appear. They are finding it difficult to make ends meet with the income they derive from the retirement system. The cost of living is constantly rising. The dollars which were paid into the retirement plan have been, since the start of it, steadily losing in value or purchasing power. The tax dollar collected from railroad employees for the retirement fund during the first few years after the plan was put into operation will purchase no more than 60 cents' worth of what they did then.

This loss of purchasing power of the dollar will obviously have an important bearing upon future retirement benefits. How much more the dollar will lose in buying power before it becomes stabilized there is no way of telling. Present indications are that it can and probably will lose considerably more. This will strongly operate to further reduce the net benefits accruing to railroad employees under their so-called retirement system.

We should pause here for a moment to meditate on why the dollar is losing its purchasing power. We need not go into details. The steady loss of purchasing power which the dollar is undergoing is directly caused by the Government's policy of financing Government deficits with printing-press money. The banks alone hold more than $100,000,000,000, in the form of deposits, of this printing-press money. There is very much more in existence. It is this enormous volume of Government printing-press money which really constitutes inflation. Rising prices are but a symptom of inflation.

This ought to explain why some Members of Congress have worked so hard to stop deficit financing and make the men in control of the Government live within the income they derive from taxes. Here is to be found the reason why those men believe they are on the side of the working people and the poor—when they insist upon economy in Government spending.

After all the financial structure of the Railroad Retirement System can be no sounder than that of the Government itself. Inevitably, also, the finances of the Government can be no sounder than the dollar. Printing-press dollars are not sound dollars.

To make the picture more complete it should be mentioned that farmers, self-employed, and others not covered by any of these Federal retirement systems, help to pay, in the form of consumer taxes, the contributions which railroads and other employers contribute to the accounts of such plans. They must likewise also help to pay the so-called interest on the several I O U accounts.

But the help covered employees get from this source is not enough to overcome their loss.

To put these groups under social security, as the bureaucrats propose, would help nobody but the bureaucrats. It would only enlarge their field of exploitation.

It is important for railroad employees to realize that the Crosser bill provides for an increase of 1.5 percent to make up the deficiency which experience has shown exists under the present act; that is, to make the plan which the present law provides "solvent," railroad employees and employers will be compelled to pay an additional 1.5 percent of their pay roll into the retirement account. The actuaries for the committee bill claim the deficiency is twice that amount, or 3 percent. This should cause railroad employees to do some serious thinking. After the system has been in operation only 10 years it is discovered that the rate of taxes which they paid was much too low, that they and their employers should have paid annually from $45,000,000 to $90,000,000—on the basis of a three billion pay roll—more in pay roll taxes than they did to make the system solvent.

What further deficiencies will turn up in the future? Where will be the end? How long would an insurance company last if it did business in this way?

Beginning in 1947, railroad employees under the Crosser bill will have to pay approximately 64 percent more in payroll taxes than they are now paying. By 1952 this will be stepped up so that they will have to pay about 78 percent more. Such an extra burden as this cannot be taken lightly, especially when it is realized that a large portion of the additional funds which they must pay into the retirement account will not go into any real trust fund but will be permanently sunk into nonproductive and destructive political projects of one kind or another.

Railroad employees have no real reserve or trust fund in the Treasury, as they have been led to believe, and cannot have under the present system. The law provides that the politicians in control of the Government shall spend for general operating purposes that portion of the taxes collected from the employees and employers which is not needed to meet current pensions and other benefits.

In the last analysis the Railroad Retirement System is part and parcel of the social-security plan. Both plans are the same financial structure. The same crowd manages both and similarly profits from both.

All things considered, oncoming beneficiaries of the Railroad Retirement System can have no hope whatever that they will receive over the coming years anywhere near the pensions and other benefits in terms of the necessaries of life that the politicians have promised them, or what they will actually cost them.

It was indeed a sad day when the politicians got their fingers into the pay envelopes of the working people.

More and more the proposition resolves itself into one where railroad employees will owe it to themselves and will have to pay it to themselves, so that real returns must inevitably become less and less as time goes on.

Forcing railroad employees to pay the additional tax provided in the Crosser bill will only further darken the picture, as will also all additional future raises in their pay-roll tax.

Seeing the situation as I do, and realizing that a large part of this increase in pay-roll taxes will not be devoted to pensions and other benefits, but will go to swell the coffers of the politicians and bureaucrats, I believe I would be doing railroad employees a grave wrong by lending my support to this measure.

It is not with any pleasure that I have made this analysis of the operations of the Railroad Retirement Act and arrived at the conclusion herein set forth. I have done this only because I believe it to be my duty to find out the truth and state it as best I can. This I believe I owe to my constitutents in general and to the railroad employees of my district in particular.

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will history later record the present-day persecution in Palestine as another of the dark pages of world history that was hatched at Yalta?

What has become of the conscience of mankind as we witness small nations and small groups of people, one after the other, ground under the heel of empire, or under totalitarian despotism?

Even though the existence of an Atlantic Charter has now been denied, is there to be no meaning nor any life to the principles of the Atlantic Charter?

Under leave to extend my remarks I submit herewith a copy of a resolution unanimously adopted at an emergency mass meeting of the Jewish community of South Bend and vicinity held in South Bend, Ind., on July 3, 1946.

This resolution restates the unhappy plight of the Jewish people of Palestine and throughout the world.

Whereas at the cessation of hostilities in Europe in the summer of 1945, the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, dispatched Mr. Earl G. Harrison, dean of the Law School of the University of Pennsylvania, to Europe to investigate the condition of the displaced persons in Europe; and

Whereas the said Harrison after duly investigating the situation reported in detail to our President the plight of the Jews in devastated Europe and said report recommended that a minimum of 100,000 Jews be permitted to enter Palestine immediately; and

Whereas our President then recommended to Great Britain that these unfortunate victims of Nazi persecution be given dignity and security in Palestine; and

Whereas immediately thereafter His Majesty's Government refused the request of our President and suggested that a committee composed of representatives of the United States and England be appointed to investigate the situation (despite the fact that 16 investigations of little Palestine had theretofore been made); and

Whereas thereafter the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry was formed, composed of an equal number of British and American representatives, and said committee conducted a thorough investigation and after 8 months of deliberation found, among other things, that our President's original request that 100,000 Jews be permitted to go to Palestine was imminently necessary; and

Whereas our President immediately expressed his willingness to use his great office to the end that this humanitarian act be carried out; and

Whereas the British Government then insisted upon conditions that would make impossible the implementation of our President's request; and

Whereas the latest act of Great Britain, the arrest of Jewish agency leaders in Palestine, constitutes an act of open warfare against the Jewish people of Palestine and results in further delay of the transfer of the 100,000 Jews from the DP camps of Europe to Palestine: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sincere and earnest feeling of the Jewish citizens of South Bend and vicinity at this mass meeting assembled that Great Britain has committed an act of treachery against the Jewish people; that she has broken covenants and promises heretofore by her duly made to the Jewish people and the governments of the world and that by these tactics she is delaying the rescue and rehabilitation of the suffering survivors of Nazi tyranny; be it further

Resolved, That because of the aforementioned acts of Great Britain the Jewish citizens of South Bend and vicinity express their strong indignation and urge the cessation of these hostile acts on the part of Great Britain against Jewry; be it further

Resolved, That we urge our duly constituted representatives and the British Embassy to use their good offices to the end that the Jewish leaders now under arrest be released immediately so that normal conditions may be restored in Palestine, and that the request heretofore made by our President be fulfilled, that 100,000 Jews be taken from Europe to Palestine where they may lead lives of decency and of dignity; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, to our Representatives in Congress, to the United States State Department and to the British Embassy.

Chairman of Mass Meeting.

This Changing World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Constantine Brown from the Evening Star of July 9, 1946:

THIS CHANGING WORLD

(By Constantine Brown)

Austria and Hungary are paying today for the courage of their citizens in going to the polls some months ago and electing representatives according to their own wishes.

The wholesale confiscation and deportations in the Russian zone in Austria and the ultimatum presented by the Soviet military commander to the Budapest Government to disband all Catholic organizations and particularly the "dangerous Boy Scouts" under the pretext that they are Fascists are regarded by the State Department in Washington as payoffs for the free elections in both countries.

The Austrian people voted according to their own conscience. The result was that the Communist Party received less than 5 percent of the total vote. The Austrians felt that they could freely exercise their voting power because their country had been regarded as a special case since 1943 when the Big Three foreign ministers met at Moscow and established a common political front. At that conference, which was described in this country as the crowning success of Secretary Hull's political career, it was decided that Austria had been coerced into the Nazi zone of influence and would not be held responsible for the crimes of the Germans. The usual easy-going Austrians did their utmost to cooperate with the Allies to undermine the Nazi resistance when the Red armies arrived at the gates of Vienna. The decisions reached in the fall of 1943 at Moscow by Hull, Eden, and Molotov were further confirmed at the next meeting of foreign ministers at Vienna.

On the basis of these formal assurances given by the representatives of the greatest powers in the world, the Austrians actually believed they would be allowed to administer their country according to their own lights. And they went cheerfully to the polls electing a truly democratic government in spite of the efforts to the contrary of a handful of Moscow-trained Communists such as the minister of education, Hans Fischer. Eventually, however, the Austrians were made to feel that they had been "mistaken." The treatment of the Austrians in the heavily barred Russian zone was not what should have been expected from a friendly army which claimed to have liberated these people from Nazi tyranny. But since communization of the population made no progress, Moscow decided to adopt the strong method and last week it started wholesale confiscation of Austrian property and mass deportations of the Austrian populations which proved particularly refractory to the Communist way of thinking. In the past months only "government property" was transferred to Russia. Since last week private property suffered the same lot as that of the Nazi citizens in the Russian zone in the Reich. The Russians don't care about becoming popular. So long as they can establish their domination by terroristic methods they are satisfied.

In Hungary the situation is even worse. The western allies have no voice in the administration of that country. The American and British military and diplomatic missions are permitted to remain in Budapest so long as they keep perfectly quiet.

Marshal Voroshilov, who commanded the large Russian armies in the country soon after Hungary's surrender, permitted "free elections." The result was disappointing to Moscow since the Small Holders' Party—a democratic organization which has opposed the Nazis throughout the war—won at the polls.

Voroshilov, the benevolent dictator of Hungary, is now back in Moscow. The new commander of the Red army, Lieutenant General Sviridov, has decided to put an end to the existing "untenable situation" by presenting the nominal Hungarian Government with drastic demands to purge the remainder of the Nazis, such as the Hungarian Boy Scouts, several Catholic organizations, and the dismissal from government service of a number of high officials whose presence is irksome to the left wingers in that country.

While the reports from Austria and Hungary are spectacular, they are not surprising. They follow the pattern of Russia's activities in the other countries behind the "iron curtain" and are in keeping with Russia's overall policies, which have prompted Foreign Minister Molotov to request that the peace conference demanded by Byrnes, Bevin, and Bidault follow strictly a set of rules imposed by the Big Four on the other nations before invitations are issued for them to attend the Paris parley.

Planned Science or Government Philanthropy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS D. WINTER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, I have asked to include in the extension of my remarks an article by Dr. Theodore Koppanyi, professor of pharmacology, Georgetown University School of Medicine, which was published in the March 1946 issue of the American Naturalist.

The position Dr. Koppanyi takes in regard to science legislation now pending in Congress is so wholesomely good for the long-range interest of science that I desire to bring his article to the attention of the Congress and the Nation:

PLANNED SCIENCE OR GOVERNMENT PHILANTHROPY?

(Dr. Theodore Koppanyi, professor of pharmacology, Georgetown University School of Medicine)

I am glad to accept the invitation of the editors of the American Naturalist to contribute a few lines on the recent science legislative proposals, particularly about S. 1720. This is the revised version of the original Kilgore and Magnuson bills, and was introduced into the Senate on December 21, 1945, by Senators KILGORE, JOHNSON of Colorado, PEPPER, FULBRIGHT, and SALTONSTALL, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs (is Minerva going to take Mars as her lawful, wedded husband?).

In the winter issue of the Bulletin of the American Association of University Professors,[1] I had the opportunity to comment on the original Magnuson-Kilgore bill. At the same time Lord Brabazon of Tara,[2] Minister of Aircraft Production in the Churchill Cabinet, himself a pioneer in aeronautics, published a letter on the freedom for scientific research in the British magazine Nature. These publications, both critical of propositions of "planning" fundamental research, expressed apprehensions as to the effect such science legislation may have directly or indirectly. The readers of the American Naturalist may forgive me if I discuss the S. 1720 in the light of this apprehensive but not unfriendly attitude.

I agree with Lord Brabazon, and trust that many of your readers will agree with him too, that any attempt to plan fundamental research or to instruct anyone as to what they are to study, ipso facto imposes ad hoc research upon scientists. The Senators and the scientists favoring S. 1720 undoubtedly deny that the bill has any such intentions. The point at issue is not whether or not the authors of the bill desire scientific orthodoxy or regimentation of science along certain utilitarian lines. Granting that it is their honest conviction that no such thing will occur after the enactment of this bill, human nature, the uncertain times, and the changing political and economic philosophies may put this bill to a use not intended by its sponsors and supporters.

One must admit that S. 1720 is a great improvement over S. 1297 (Kilgore bill) and S. 1285 (Magnuson bill). The new bill no longer states in the preamble that the National Science Foundation is to promote a national policy for scientific research and education ("the horrible threat that science was no longer to be international has been protested against, very rightly, by all that is best in the United States, Britain, and elsewhere"—Lord Brabazon). It is no longer stated that scientific research is to be initiated and prescribed for by the Foundation. It states more modestly that the bill is to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, to secure national defense, and to advance national health and welfare. It proposes to accomplish that by entering into contracts or other arrangements with organizations for the support of research and development activities. At least 15 percent of the sum appropriated by Congress for the Foundation must be spent for research in national defense and the same amount for research in public health and medical sciences. Not less than 25 percent of the money to be appropriated must be apportioned among the States in their tax-supported and land-grant colleges and universities and an additional 25 percent in other nonprofit organizations. Each individual institution will retain, according to the bill, the widest latitude in its choice of research and development projects.

So far, so good. As I have previously stated, the appropriation of money by the Government should be impersonal and should go not to individuals but to institutions which in the past have demonstrated their willingness and ability to produce research as evidenced by publications in reputable national scientific periodicals. If it is established that there is a danger of exhaustion of private funds for research, there is no objection to the Government's stepping in to subsidize universities and research laboratories to enable their personnel to continue their research activities. This would eliminate the always unpleasant controversies of the merits and demerits of individual research projects. The administrator and his advisory committees should not be put in the highly embarrassing position of having to pass judgment upon the ability of their colleagues in the field and should not be given the power to make or break budding, or even unpopular mature, scientists. I also argued that "the men at each university or laboratory know each other best and it should be presumed that they are the best judges of what each man in his milieu could do with his test tube or Bunsen burner."

It may be presumed, and presumed unfortunately, however, that in addition to the money appropriated to institutions a large reservoir of funds will be available for individual scientists. In this connection I want to put in a frank and, under the circumstances, a brave word. It would be a highly undemocratic and unscientific situation if the practices adopted during the war were to be continued and the Office of Scientific Research and Development were to survive under the new name of National Science Foundation. I am not criticizing the achievements of the Office of Scientific Research and Development. It has done a marvelous job, very effectively and very expensively. It was justified by a national emergency. However, even then it was true, and I am quoting the former British Minister of Aircraft Production, that "the idea that there should be two classes of men of science, one knowing government secrets and research work, and those outside the sacred fold, was, and is, a very shocking proposal." He might have also stated that it is equally shocking not to be included among the favored ones of a government agency. Let us have none of this in the future.

As I see it, the whole situation boils down to this. Government philanthropy to support needy universities and research laboratories without any strings tied to it except a strict accounting and public statement of the money expended is fine. To grant scholarships and fellowships to deserving but poor young men and women is superfine. Planning fundamental research either by positive direction or by elimination or discrimination of undesirable people or projects or even the possibility of such a thing occurring in the future is not so fine. And I believe that no committees are needed to judge the research men of America but that a National Science Foundation, if one is desired, should confine its activities to the study of university and similar budgets and needs. The Army and Navy will take care of research for national defense. At least that is what I recently read in the papers. Applied research, which the bill calls "development project," can and should indeed be planned, but the older Government agencies and the industries can amply take care of such planning.

Let us close this argument with the fine words of Lord Brabazon, which I trust we all agree upon: "We must appreciate that the pure scientist is a creative artist. No one must boss him. No one drive him. We are lucky in the production of these great men. Certainly arrange that their lives be free of monetary worries, but let us remember that their life interest and pleasure is research, and leave them to carry on undisturbed by the stormy blasts and distractions of a world licking its wounds and quarrelsome after a protracted fight. Do not of all things plan their lives. Some will produce future miracles no doubt, but most perhaps may not be so lucky. That should not worry us; our duty is to have given them the chance, and although many of their names may not be handed down to the future praised by all, yet they will have done good and noble work, for which we should all be no less grateful."

Russia and World Conquest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, every day it becomes more evident that the only hope for a just and lasting peace must be built upon a factual appraisal of the realities underlying the policies of the United States and of the Soviet Union.

So far as the United States has a policy it has been based on a series of defensive measures designed to offset continual encroachment by the Soviet Government into western Europe and eastern and southern Asia. The success of such a defense depends upon the ultimate intentions of the Soviet Union, and whether that Government has, in fact, any limit in its own mind to the area it considers as necessary to Soviet security.

No man in the United States has had a longer and a more complete experience with Soviet designing than has Mr. Max Eastman. His statements on this subject can be regarded as authoritative. For that reason, in view of the need for such information reaching American legislators and citizens, I insert the following series of articles by Max Eastman which have just appeared in the Scripps-Howard newspapers:

RED PROGRAM FOR WORLD CONQUEST TO BE REVEALED BY MAX EASTMAN

Max Eastman hoped he would find Utopia in the Bolshevik revolution. As editor of the Liberator, radical publication, he sent John Reed to Russia. Reed's famous book, Ten Days That Shook the World, was the result. Reed died in Russia and is buried in the Kremlin.

Mr. Eastman went to Russia in 1922. He had no official position but because of his defense in America of the Bolshevik regime he was received into inner circles.

Disillusionment set in before he left Russia in 1924. Today that disillusionment is complete.

He now views Stalin and the Russian dictatorship as a carefully charted plot for world conquest. He says that there is no mystery about Russia's foreign policy. To prove his contention, Mr. Eastman quotes from Stalin's book, Problems in Leninism, which he describes as the equivalent of Hitler's Mein Kampf. It is as explicit, he says, in serving notice on the rest of the world as was Hitler's warning.

Three articles giving Mr. Eastman's views and his citations will be published in the News starting tomorrow.

Max Eastman had been a leading radical for years. In 1913 he became editor of the Masses. He opposed World War I and was indicted and tried twice under the Espionage Act, together with John Reed, Art Young, and other contributing editors of the Masses.

In the first trial he was defended by the famous radical lawyer, Morris Hillquit. His second trial he conducted himself. He addressed the jury for 2 hours and 40 minutes. The day after he was acquitted he got a letter from the district attorney saying it was "one of the greatest speeches ever delivered in a court of law."

SAW IT IN RUSSIA

With Eugene Debs and most of the leading radicals in jail, Mr. Eastman took up the cause of the Bolshevik revolution as chief defender of the regime of Lenin and Trotsky. And then he started out to see utopia for himself.

How his disenchantment developed after he arrived in Russia is told in his own words:

"Lenin was sick, and Trotsky was at the height of his power then. I attended the convention of the Communist Party at which Stalin made his attack on Trotsky and destroyed this member who never attended one of those functions. I was never an organization man—my loyalty to what I consider the truth, or in other words to freedom of thought, being sovereign in my mind.

"After I left Russia in 1924 I wrote a little book, 'Since Lenin Died,' which was the first exposure of Stalin's conspiracy against Trotsky, and I published in a great newspaper in every city in the world the document known as Lenin's Testament, in which he warned the party against Stalin's excessive concentration of power."

STALIN A USURPER

"Up to 1932 or 1933 I was still defending the Soviet regime on the lecture platform. I regarded Stalin as a usurper and an obstacle to the true development of the regime. In 1934 I realized that the cause was lost, and published an article in Harper's, republished as a little book called The End of Socialism in Russia.

"I then began to think of the Stalin regime not as an enemy or an obstacle, but as a result—and moreover, an inevitable result of the action, which had been taken. In short, I realized that the socialist experiment had failed, and that the hypothesis was therefore wrong.

"Instead of emancipating the working class and therewith all society it had enslaved the working class. I stated this change of opinion in an article published in the Reader's Digest in 1941, entitled 'Socialism Does Not Jibe With Human Nature.'

"I never was an orthodox Marxian Socialist. I taught the principles of science at Columbia University for 3 years before I ever became a Socialist, and I knew too much about scientific method to be hornswoggled into thinking that Marx's pretended inside knowledge about the future course of history was scientific. To me socialism was not a philosophy of life, much less a religion, or a solution of all human ills, but merely an economic and political experiment which ought to be tried. I still call myself a radical, although I add the word 'Democrat' after it."

What this man, Max Eastman, writes today is, we think, not only interesting but very important. He is one who has been there and seen. He has followed the Russian "experiment" as closely as any living American. He hoped, and was disappointed, bitterly. To him now the word experiment is a misnomer. It's a clear-cut program, a blueprint of world conquest.

At least Mr. Eastman's point of view is worth reading.

STALIN CHARTS REVOLUTION AND IRON RULE OVER UNITED STATES

(By Max Eastman)

In Mein Kampf Hitler served notice on the world. Few took seriously his cold, clear statement of what he intended to do. Prime Minister Josef Stalin likewise has outlined his program in a book. He has made it cold and clear. Yet we hear constantly about the enigma of Russian policy. We are told that we must try hard to understand Russia. Why not take the Russians at their own word?

There is no iron curtain between us and Premier Stalin's Problems of Leninism, or the other writings and speeches which reveal what Mr. Stalin has in mind for Russia and for us, and for the rest of the world.

We have been handed the blueprint from this dictator just as we were handed the one from Hitler. It charts a future of bloody revolution and totalitarian dictatorship for all of us.

NO RACIAL ARROGANCE

As in Mein Kampf, conquest stalks again. Only this time it is far more dangerous because it is not linked with racial arrogance. It is linked with a fantastic pretense that the conqueror is going to cure all the world's troubles and set all mankind free.

Problems of Leninism, the Russian equivalent of Mein Kampf, is signed by Premier Stalin, currently revised by him and translated by his authorization into all civilized languages. It is sold by the millions and adhered to as a textbook and campaign guide by his followers in every part of the world. It is available to anyone.

Russia's plans, therefore, are no mystery. And we should not be lulled by amiable conferences and soothing words as Neville Chamberlain was lulled by Hitler.

Let's look at the record.

Here is one sentence in the bedrock of Soviet foreign policy—from Problems of Leninism:

"It is inconceivable that the Soviet Republic should continue to exist for a long period side by side with imperialist states—ultimately one or the other must conquer."

BOOK BEING SOLD OPENLY

Imperialist states means us. The book which contains that notification of our doom is being currently shipped about our country in large quantities and sold for 25 cents a copy. It is an excellent English translation. Tie in with that the following from a speech Mr. Stalin made to the American Communists who visited Moscow in 1929:

"I think the moment is not far off when a revolutionary crisis will develop in America that will be the beginning of the end of world capitalism as a whole. It is essential that the American Communist Party should be capable of meeting that historical moment fully prepared."

VIOLENCE CALLED FOR

The two quotations show just what kind of conspiracy we are up against.

As to methods, Premier Stalin says in Problems of Leninism:

"Can such a radical transformation of the bourgeois system be achieved without a violent revolution * * *? Obviously not.

"The scientific concept of dictatorship means nothing more or less than power which rests on violence, which is not limited by any laws or restricted by any absolute rules.

"Dictatorship means unlimited power resting on violence and not on law."

That, in words quoted as gospel from Lenin, is Premier Stalin's plan for the future of our country. And he doesn't want any confusion about it among his American disciples. He doesn't want them to take seriously the hocus-pocus about peace and democracy with which he was compelled to propitiate his bourgeois allies during the war.

TEXTS RECALLED

Therefore, he has his deputy, Andrei Vishinsky, make a speech recalling these uncompromising texts of Lenin's and giving explicit notice that they are still in force. And at the risk of all Americans reading it, he has this speech translated into English and published by the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

All who know the writings of Lenin and Stalin understand the phrase, "smash the bourgeois state apparatus." It means in our country: take over the United States Government offices, purge from them every official, clerk, and clerk's assistant who is loyal to the ideas of free enterprise and representative government.

MEANING OF DOCTRINE

It means: clean out the buildings at the point of the bayonet, disinfect them of democracy by summary executions and prison camps, and establish a ruthless, one-party, totalitarian dictatorship which will take over and run the industry and commerce of the United States.

Mr. Vishinsky expressly emphasizes the necessity of smashing the bourgeois state apparatus when the Communist revolution spreads to other countries.

Where is the mystery in that?

MOVES TO GIVE ATOM TO STALIN CALLED TREASON

(By Max Eastman)

The writings of Prime Minister Josef Stalin on Russia's policy furnished no enigma. They are as clear as Hitler's Mein Kampf. Their essence is world conquest by revolution backed up, where possible, by invasion. The program calls for violence, not law.

A bulletin from the Soviet Embassy November 17, 1945, said: "Lenin purges the teachings of Marx * * * and exposes the sweet-sounding nonsense about a calm and smooth development of bourgeois society into socialism." The revolution must ultimately come about in what the bulletin refers to as the "fires of battle."

Notwithstanding the clear warning that comes from the Russian equivalent of Mein Kampf, many of our officials—though fewer of late—have continued to regard Russia as a friend of peace and democracy, whose queer behavior we must desperately try to understand.

A PROPOSAL OF TREASON

Some of our scientists continue to demand that we turn over the secret of the atom bomb to Mr. Stalin. Our fellow travelers insist that, in return for this favor, Mr. Stalin agrees to accept a loan of $6,000,000 payable at his own convenience. For my part, I think the proposal to surrender our most valued military secret to a tyrant openly pledged to the violent overthrow of our Government is a proposal of treason.

No man trained in Marxism ever starts anything until the conditions are ripe. Therefore, the blueprint of destruction which Mr. Stalin has drawn is not for immediate application in the United States. But it is significant that as long as 17 years ago Mr. Stalin predicted the approaching end of world capitalism by revolution stemming from Moscow and warned the American Communists to meet that "historic moment fully prepared."

Mr. Stalin in his Problems of Leninism distinguishes reform from revolution:

"To a reformist, reforms are everything * * * to a revolutionist, on the contrary * * * reforms served as instruments that disintegrate the regime * * * as strongholds for the further development of the revolutionary movement."

Incorporate those words with these from the same book: "The scientific concept of dictatorship means nothing more or less than power which rests on violence." You will see that there is no mystery about what Mr. Stalin has in mind.

CHAOS IS AIM

That attitude toward reform is basic to the whole Communist technique for bringing the bourgeois world to chaos and then taking over. Until Mr. Stalin gives a contrary directive to his own followers we must assume that he regards the United Nations with the same cynicism with which he regards other reforms. He is using it for purposes of disintegration and as a stronghold for the further development of the totalitarian Communist revolution. His acts so far bear out his pronouncement. He has practiced what he preached.

The thoughts of our statemen are so justly concentrated on the supreme issue of world peace that they find it impossible to conceive of any sane revolutionists. They cannot imagine the state of mind of a zealot who looks upon peace talk under capitalism as mere hypocrisy.

Mr. Stalin and his followers don't want peace. They want chaos in the capitalistic world, and in that chaos they intend to seize power.

CLAP-TRAP ABOUT PEACE

What Mr. Stalin thinks about peace treaties has been stated by him with reckless precision:

"Every time treaties are made concerning the realinement of forces for a new war, these treaties are called treaties of peace. Treaties are signed defining the elements of a future war, and always the signing of these treaties is accompanied by a lot of clap-trap about peace." That, from an address to the all-union Communist Party.

The blandishments of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill dripped back from Stalin's Marxism like ripples from a rock. While palavering in the language of democratic idealism he was preparing to gather in the harvest of another war.

EASTMAN SAYS STALIN WARS ON WORLD

(By Max Eastman)

In the face of Prime Minister Josef Stalin's clearly stated purpose eventually to conquer the globe by revolution and remake it in the Russian image, many of our statesmen still cling to the belief that Mr. Stalin is sincerely joining in an effort to tranquilize the world.

They were astonished when on February 9, 1946, in the midst of their supposedly cooperative effort to prevent wars, Mr. Stalin announced in a speech to his own people that under a capitalistic system of world economy wars are unpreventable. With that by way of introduction, Mr. Stalin based his program for a 15-year development of the Soviet, not on the United Nations—not a word about that—but on the prospect of another war.

That Mr. Stalin wants peace with the great powers for the immediate future is obvious. But it takes a master of self-deception to go on believing that he takes seriously the effort of the United Nations to make future wars impossible.

TWO CAPITALIST POWERS

It must stand clearly in Mr. Stalin's mind that only two great capitalist powers have survived the war. The two armed camps into which he sees the capitalist world dividing can only be captioned by Great Britain and the United States. Russia's diplomacy, so long as it rests on Mr. Stalin's Marxism, will have that constantly in mind. And astute statesmen, American and British, will as constantly remember that Mr. Stalin's wish, whatever his temporary maneuvers, is for conflict between the United States and Britain.

Today, the only Western statesman who seems fully to realize this is Winston Churchill, but I believe it will gradually sink home to others who are aware of the peril to democratic civilization.

Every check we place on England's power is a gain for the totalitarian world order. Not only in the lines I have quoted, but in many others. Mr. Stalin has described both England and America, together with other democratic nations, as "our enemies."

CHAOS HIS AIM

He probably will try to knock off the weaker and more troubled of these enemies first. He will favor the United States as against the British Empire, but only because that is the expedient order in which to take over the "decaying" capitalist world. And his great longing is for as much trouble in all democracies as can be brought about by his borers from within, his Communist fifth column in other countries. Chaos is his aim. That is why he sabotages all efforts to agree on treaties of peace.

Mr. Stalin's position, then, far from being the "supreme conundrum," as Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG called it, is clear. It is not what Mr. Churchill so picturesquely described as "a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma."

It is precisely stated in his own book, "Problems of Leninism," which is the Russian counterpart of Mein Kampf.

Mr. Stalin regards the present situation, which we call peace, as an armed truce between the Soviet dictatorship and its enemies, the western democracies.

EXPEDIENCY HIS TACTIC

In that truce he will jockey for every position both within our country and out which may enable him and his disciples, when the hour strikes, to overthrow our Government and establish a Communist dictatorship here. In this jockeying he will say anything, sign anything, and collaborate on anything that may seem expedient at the moment. That is the way any tough fighter behaves against an enemy with whom he considers himself at war. It is no particular comment on the character of Mr. Stalin. That character is worth studying, but a more important study is the doctrine of revolution in which he believes.

Mr. Stalin often has avowed himself an obedient pupil of Lenin. It is no accident that the bible of his party is a book about Lenin. Lenin taught Mr. Stalin to speak of capitalistic or imperialistic nations as enemies, and Lenin advocated dishonesty in dealing with an enemy as explicitly as Hitler ever did or Machiavelli.

"We must be ready," he said, "for trickery, deceit, lawbreaking, withholding, and coloring truths."

Or again, "We can and must write * * * in a language which sows among the masses hate, revulsion, scorn, and the like toward those of different thought."

BELIEF IN WAR

This thoroughgoing belief in war, and the morals of war, as the method of progress was instilled in Mr. Stalin from early youth. From the days when he robbed banks for the Bolshevik Party to this day when he steals chunks from the capitalist world on the plea of security or distrust of the war mongers, he has been guided by Lenin's subordination of moral principles to the principles of expediency in the grab for power.

It has been expedient so far for Russia to honor business contracts with capitalist nations, and her conduct in this regard has been exemplary. But it has been inexpedient to honor treaties with weaker nations. In this respect the Soviet Union has the worst record in history. As Julius Epstein demonstrates in the New Leader for December 29, 1945, Mr. Stalin's government has violated treaties at the rate of one every 3 months for the last 6 years.

POLICY NO MYSTERY

We can afford, I suppose, to ignore any particular one, or perhaps all of these violations. But we cannot afford to ignore the principles on which they rest, namely, that the Soviet Union is in a state of war, overt or latent, with the whole capitalistic world and that it enters into treaty relations with the capitalist nations only for the purpose of their destruction.

The urgent thing at this moment for our statesmen and our people is to get over the notion that there is some mystery about Russia's foreign policy. It is all plainly written down by Mr. Stalin himself in the Russian equivalent of Mein Kampf—Problems of Leninism. Our policy toward Russia should be based on that book.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address entitled "Catching Up With the 'American Radical'," by Julian S. Myrick, second vice president of the Mutual Life Insurance Co., of New York, and chairman of the board of the American College of Life Underwriters, before the New York Chapter of Chartered Life Underwriters, Hotel Martinique, New York, N. Y., June 11, 1946:

Three years ago President James B. Conant, of Harvard University, wrote an article for the Atlantic Monthly magazine entitled "Wanted: American Radicals," in which he called for an end to "inherited privilege" by legal confiscation of all property once a generation through "really effective inheritance and gift taxes and the breaking up of trust funds and estates."

Shortly after publication of the article I gave a talk before the Boston Chapter of Chartered Life Underwriters, pointing out that the hot breath of Dr. Conant's "radical" article already was upon us; that under then current Federal income and estate tax rates there no longer was an opportunity, starting from scratch, to create a competence for one's family by the standards of yesterday.

As evidence, I quoted Dr. Joseph Klein, one of this country's leading tax authorities, who maintained that to leave a net estate of $100,000 for the protection and security of your wife and children 10 years hence, one would have to earn no less than $85,000 a year, allowing for modest living expenses, a total of $850,000. As further evidence that the "American radical" was closing in upon us, I presented the latest available figures showing the amount required to create a net estate of $50,000. These figures took into consideration the number of years it would take to build the $50,000 estate after allowing for taxes, living expenses, and annual savings.

There was a war yet to be won when these tax rates were in effect, and there was every reason why taxes and more taxes should be levied in order that we might pay at least a part of the bill as we went along—just so long as those taxes weren't imposed for the purpose of social reform and didn't interfere with a man's obligation to leave a fair, living competence to his widow and children.

But today—a year after final victory—the personal-tax picture is substantially unchanged. The Federal income-tax rate has been lowered somewhat, to be sure—and for good reason—but the rates are still so high that it is practically impossible for anyone to build even a modest estate for the support of himself and family in old age or sickness out of earned income. The income tax hits us every year, and is therefore uppermost in our minds—even in an election year. But the Federal estate-tax rate remains as high as ever, for, of course, estate taxes are payable after we're gone and cannot vote. And there has been no change whatever in the gift-tax rate. Even Dr. Conant does not believe in such penalties on the highest type of our citizens.

CREATION OF A $50,000 ESTATE

Number of years to build estate	Net estate desired	Values of estate before payment of estate taxes	Annual earnings before payment of income taxes	Amount of income taxes	Amount required to create estate	Amount available for living expenses
10 years	$50,000	$50,300	$7,500	$1,217	$5,030	$1,253
20 years	50,000	50,300	7,500	1,217	2,515	3,768
10 years	50,000	50,300	10,000	1,949	5,030	3,021
20 years	50,000	50,300	10,000	1,949	2,515	5,536
10 years	50,000	50,300	15,000	3,806	5,030	6,164
20 years	50,000	50,300	15,000	3,806	2,515	8,679

NOTE.—Assumption that taxpayer is married with 2 dependents. Income taxes include Federal income and New York State income.

CREATION OF A $100,000 (OR LARGER) ESTATE

10 years	$100,000	$107,000	$85,000	$51,500	$10,700	$22,800
20 years	100,000	107,000	32,000	13,500	5,350	13,150
10 years	250,000	320,000	600,000	497,000	32,000	71,000
20 years	250,000	320,000	190,000	141,000	16,000	33,000
10 years	500,000	700,000	1,270,000	1,079,000	70,000	121,000
20 years	500,000	700,000	550,000	453,000	35,000	62,000
10 years	1,000,000	1,530,000	2,130,000	1,827,000	153,000	150,000
20 years	1,000,000	1,530,000	1,075,000	909,500	76,500	89,000

NOTE.—Assumption that taxpayer is married with no dependents. Income taxes include Federal income and New York State income.

Now, what conclusions are we to draw from all this? I think they are obvious:

1. The "American radical" is still beating his chest down in Washington with good effect.

2. At the present tax rate—and optimistically conceding no increase in the years to come—he'll probably attain his "legal confiscation" goal in two or three generations from now.

3. At the present income-tax rates the young generation has no chance of accumulating any reasonable capital on which any estate tax can operate.

4. It therefore becomes the duty of all of us (a) to combat his (the radical's) influence through the democratic processes still available to us, and (b) while hopefully awaiting results, to set up the most effective defense possible for the protection of our families.

The best defense I know of at present is adequate life insurance. Until recently, it earned certain nominal tax advantages, such as $40,000 exemption—by reason of the fact that it constitutes indemnity against loss of income due to death. Yet if life insurance is to do its full job of preserving our estates as well—if, in other words, it is to be properly used not only to provide necessary income for our wives and children, but also to provide ready cash with which they may pay those estate taxes—then here, too, it's time for a change.

The social and economic advantages of life insurance in protecting the home, the aged, and the business through its indemnifying feature is of great importance, not only to the individual but to the State and Federal Governments as well. The income, gift, estate, and inheritance taxes, in both Federal and State Governments, should not only give life insurance an even break in comparison with a man's other possessions but should be so fixed and so administered as to encourage the widest possible ownership of life insurance. The States have been more liberal in their approach in this connection than has the Federal Government, which, through its taxing policy, seems to discourage life insurance rather than to encourage it. The more State and National Governments do to encourage men to provide for themselves and their families through the ownership of life insurance, the less such governments will have to pay from their treasuries in relief expenditures in the future.

Specifically, there appears to be a sound basis for the suggestion made by Senator

BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, that a deduction for life-insurance premiums should be allowed in calculating income taxes. For instance, New York State makes an allowance of $150 for life-insurance premiums. Mississippi also allows a deduction for life-insurance premiums. There is great hope among our policyholders and life-insurance people that other States in the 1947 sessions of their legislatures will be wise enough to adopt similar laws. This would give the taxpayer an incentive to build up and maintain a fair life-insurance estate for the protection of his family or for his own protection at retirement—his own, self-administered "social security."

In 1943 in a speech before the American Institute of Accountants, Roswell Magill, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and prominent tax attorney, declared that "the building of substantial estates will be a rarity so long as present income and estate tax rates are maintained." There are many others who believe that the recent exclusion of $40,000 of life insurance from estate tax should be restored immediately, if not increased to $100,000 due to the decrease in interest earnings. Otherwise the Government would be in a position of giving with one hand while taking with the other.

In addition—and this is perhaps the most important of all, in view of the current estate tax situation—the so-called Lonergan amendment, twice passed by the United States Senate would have provided that life insurance specifically earmarked to pay estate taxes, should not be included in the taxable estate. There remains much strong feeling that this measure should be reintroduced and passed by both Houses. Recent encouragement and possible impetus to public interest will be found in the adoption by the United States Chamber of Commerce of a resolution approving this proposal as a part of its legislative program. This would not only help to save our estates from legal confiscation, and thus effectively thwart the American radical, but it would benefit the United States Treasury as well, for it would assure the Treasury of its tax revenue no matter what might be the structure of the estate.

I closed my talk in Boston 3 years ago with a thought that may bear repeating. It was this:

"The progress of this great and enduring country of ours has been based upon one thing and one alone: The will to work and to save and to provide security and freedom for the family. And freedom is not only a right but a hard-won heritage which constantly must be fought for to be preserved. If we, ourselves, are to be denied by law the privilege of providing security for the family, then others must provide it. And every time people accept a guarantee of security from others, they surrender an equal amount of freedom."

In the light of today's social-economic trend and in view of the radical philosophies that are attempting even further to influence our way of life, I believe that thought is perhaps more significant now than ever before.

The Challenge of Today's World to American Women

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent of the House, I am inserting in the RECORD my own remarks made in Cleveland at the recent biennial convention of Business and Professional Women:

THE CHALLENGE OF TODAY'S WORLD TO AMERICAN WOMEN

It is a particularly happy experience for me to come to this biennial conference of Business and Professional Women with two of my colleagues. That Mrs. WOODHOUSE found it impossible to be with us is as disappointing to me as I am sure it is to you. Some of you no doubt know her, many of you have been looking forward to hearing her, and I can assure you she had a most interesting word to give of the economic picture as she saw it last summer and fall in Sweden and elsewhere, and as she sees it here.

I do not need to say much of either of my companions. You have seen for yourselves that both are women of intelligence and charm. I need not tell you that both have the respect of the membership of the House, and that both are adding a fine chapter to the book of women's capacity in government.

This is without question the darkest moment that man has ever seen on earth. Two great continents have been swept by war. The viciousness, the cruelty, the brutality that lies buried within us all has swept up from the caverns into which it had retreated and poured its dark horrors out once again. Nor have we wholly escaped, though our lands have not been burned nor our homes been desecrated and destroyed. But our way of life stands in greater danger today than at any moment since the first pilgrims set their feet upon this new world. Hatreds have built themselves up among us, cruelties exist on every hand, greed and lust walk our streets, everywhere man's inhumanity to man casts its dark shadow over the beauty that destiny gave this hemisphere.

The moment has been with us these many moons when we must face reality, when we must find the courage to look into ourselves and re-evaluate this that is our destiny; to build a country where men and women of all races and beliefs will have equal opportunity to develop those qualities of body, mind, and soul that their peculiar abilities contain.

This is very definitely woman's hour of destiny—especially the American woman's. Everywhere in the war scorched lands of earth it is to America that eyes are turned, and if my experience last fall is any criterion it is to American women that the women of all the world look for hope and faith, even for life itself.

As you may know, last August found me once more in Europe where, the year before, I had come close to war. This time I waded knee-deep into the hideous aftermaths of the fighting war and ran head-on into the no less dangerous war of words, of minds, of ideologies into which VE- and VJ-day plunged us. Make no mistake, this present war—this war of ideologies is endangering all we hold dear, especially we women. It is particularly dangerous because it creeps so subtly into our most sacred precincts, clouding our awareness and tempting our faith. It is a moment when we must strip away all veils and face the very essence of our belief in our American destiny. We must truly believe that we are the incarnation of the freedom principle. Descendants of Magna Carta, freedom to us means that the individual has ultimate importance, that the individual shall have opportunity to develop to the utmost of his capacity, and the responsibility to join with all individuals to secure the most for all.

I was very fortunate as I went from country to country last fall. As a member of a Foreign Affairs Committee subcommittee, charged with the mission to make contact with the nations of eastern Europe and the Near East, I was privileged to talk with government officials, with such press people as there were, with the run-o'-mine citizens. Best of all, I was fortunate in being able to talk intimately with small groups of women. I wish you could have been with me to have heard for yourselves, to have felt their emotions, to have been faced as I was with a deep sense of impotence not from lack of desire, of sympathy, but from the single fact that a wide gulf filled with their agony and suffering lay between us. Who can truly understand who has not participated?

Can we know the deadness of the women living the medieval life of harems, we who play our parts wherever we desire? Can we understand the frustrations of women educated in American colleges of the Near East who are trying to secure for themselves and the uneducated masses better living conditions, and the recognition of themselves as intelligent, constructively functioning members of society? At this point, perhaps, we strike some common ground for we know that even here in America women have a long way to go before they have proven that there is a dynamic place for them beside their men in every phase of human development. We have talked much of our freedom, but so far we have fallen short in the doing. There are many well-equipped women who should be occupying positions of responsibility and power, who are not doing so. We still lack the esprit de corps that would unite us in determined effort to put such women into these places. We still fail to prove our point, viz that women have something to give that is in addition to what men contribute—and that until such giving is a part of national and international living the world will not be in balance, and peace will not prevail. We should unite in the determination to put only the best forward. Each time a woman fails, or does only a mediocre job, all women everywhere find the going harder. Fortunately each time a woman carries the banner high she does take us all forward.

What we do here in America affects women everywhere far more dramatically than most of us ever have a chance to know. In the countries of the Near East I felt the tide of women's awakening as one feels the upsurge of new life in the deep woods, in the pastures, on the hillsides in spring. The time is past when these women will accept being considered "less than the dust beneath the chariot wheel." They know themselves to be a part of the great universal plan, the very matrix of God's life in earth, the guardians of the future. Quietly, purposefully, they are moving into wider living with clear recognition of greater responsibilities. In Teheran I found them working in the spheres of health and education. In Baghdad the young Queen Mother, still veiled on the streets, encourages groups of women to work toward health, toward schools, toward opportunity and counsels with her brother, the Regent, in all matters of vital concern. In Egypt a group of Red Crescent women volunteered for emergency malaria service under the Red Cross. Another group under the original leadership of the now dead Madame Zagloud Pasha is the heart of the progressive movement. Turkish women sit 26 strong in the Parliament, but find themselves estopped at many corners by tradition and man-made laws. Without exception the pattern of America is the one they all are following.

This is very natural, for almost countless numbers of both men and women of these Near East lands are graduates of the American University at Beirut, or of the American colleges at Istanbul and Cairo. Eager, alert, and imbued with the American doctrine that it is the individual that matters, that the small state is important, they are deeply disturbed by what they feel is our failure to champion the small countries in their effort to establish freedom within their own borders. As I went from capitol to capitol there was a crescendo upon one common note, "Does America no longer believe in the right of the individuals, in the rights of small countries? Does she no longer believe that freedom is an essential of constructive living? Can we no longer look to America?" These were difficult questions—they still are.

What could I say except to admit that our knowledge of their lives was all too vague to give us a vivid sense of their struggle towards equality of both action and responsibility, but that we are eager to know, eager to understand. At every point I found an almost overpowering eagerness for contact with us, for certainty that we would respond to that contact.

The challenge of the Near East was a very vivid experience; but it was in Eastern Europe that these questions took on a poignancy that cannot be expressed in words. Here, where the iron heel of armies had ground all decencies into the bloody dust, I talked with women such as you and I. We spoke of war and then sat silent. What they had to tell was too terrible to be spoken, the dark horror of it they can never forget, nor can we ever truly understand. Once I had looked into the unspoken agonies of their courageous eyes, I knew beyond all possibility of doubt that no matter how sympathetic we American women are, no matter how much we try to understand, the fact is that only those of like experience can truly know. I was swept by the sense that it might have been we whom the war had so scarred save only that through so much disaster with everything still to give.

Again the questions came: Why is it that America makes no effort to prevent the compulsion of the small countries, does she no longer believe in freedom? If so why does she not protest the clamping down of the iron curtain of police government? Her representatives on the Allied Control Council, why are they but puppets?

What could I say, for I had talked with our men and knew what everyone now knows that in very truth they were quite powerless, that they suffered humiliation daily—proud men and soldiers of a proud land. Fortunate for all that our policy has begun to swing away from appeasement, that the State Department is developing a firmer attitude. Even a little stiffening of our policy will be an encouragement to all the agonized people of the little countries who have been released from one tyranny only to find themselves under the domination of another.

Do the women in America know what we have suffered? Do they know our need? Do they care? Such were their questions. As I listened, as the tide of their despair swept over me, I realized that ours is a stewardship for which one day we shall have to account. I felt indescribably humbled by the magnificence of their womanhood as I realized that their suffering is not over, as I recognized the tragic fact that it is these very women and their children who are still suffering from the imposition of tyranny. It is these women who are still living in constant hunger, in daily fear, in agony of body, mind, and soul, it is these same women who are looking toward America for a last ray of hope, for to them as to all the world we are the light upon the mountain top, the beacon toward which they aspire. To them we are freedom.

As in the Near East, so in eastern Europe, women asked me, "Do American women know what it is that we have lived? What it is that we still must live? Do they care?" As I tried to give them the assurance of our sympathy, of our desire to understand, I promised myself that whenever opportunity was given me to come before such groups as yours, made up of women of superior intelligence and experience in realistic living, I would try to spread these questions out before them, certain that we must lay aside the garment of our selfishness and our inertia, and take upon our shoulders the uncomfortable cloak of a passionate certainty that we keep only what we truly give. That even this that we call our freedom is not really ours unless we keep it clean and strong and shining for all women everywhere.

Your convention theme holds so much that is directly applicable to this need. You are seeking the means and ways by which women can be made to recognize their responsibilities, and once recognized, take hold of them and bring them to fruition. These responsibilities begin right in our own homes, in our communities and States, they concern our Nation—but they reach out into all the world as well, where women everywhere are asking—Do American women understand? Do they know? Do they care?

Extension of Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed another case of New Deal perfect timing.

Many times during the past 14 years we have seen the New Deal delay important legislation until the eleventh hour and then come in with the plea that there is an emergency and ask for a continuing resolution or emergency action.

From the success the New Deal has had with this procedure it is little wonder that the bill to extend the price control law was not passed until time for Presidential action on the bill to reach Congress on the last legislative day before the law expired. This skillful timing presented a perfect setting for a continuing resolution which was presented on June 29.

The fact is that the New Deal has a majority in both branches of Congress and a majority on each committee as well as the chairman of each committee. Through this majority the New Deal is able to determine what proposed legislation will be considered and when it will be considered. In other words the New Deal has the knife and it has the cheese and it cuts it as it pleases.

Everyone knew the price control law expired on June 30, that there would be no price control after June 30 unless Congress enacted additional legislation on the subject. The majority leadership of both branches of Congress knew this. The chairman and the members of the committees to which this legislation was referred knew this. Still final action on the bill to continue price control was not had until this late date although the House passed the bill on April 16. This was one of the best examples of timing so as to present a case for emergency action we have ever seen.

Some may say all this was accidental but it looks very much as if it was "planned that way" and to make it more sensational we were told on last Saturday that Chester Bowles had resigned and that his resignation had been accepted. Apparently this also was timed so as to present another reason why a continuing resolution should be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, the question of continuing price control is serious. Price control during the war was a necessary evil but the evils of the OPA were wholly unnecessary. The price-control law could have been administered so as to accomplish great good if competent persons had been administering it. The difficulty we have had was not caused by the law but rather by the way it was administered. I question if all history can match the great volumes of technical rules, regulations, and directives formulated by an army of 2,700 OPA lawyers, many of which did not make sense and could not be understood or explained by those making them.

The way the price-control law was administered curtailed production, created shortages, distorted normal distribution channels, and created enormous black markets. Many believe this was done deliberately in an effort to make price control perpetual and to ultimately play its part in an effort to set up complete regimentation and a planned economy directed out of Washington, by bureaucrats appointed by the President; bureaucrats who are not and could not be elected to any office by the people.

Be that as it may, the fact is that OPA has done a miserable job of administering this law. It has not held the line. The hold-the-line order was broken by the action of the President and the OPA and they are directly responsible for the inflation we have. They started us on the spiral of inflation despite the payment of about $2,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money annually in subsidies.

Under OPA price increases the cost of living has increased over 35 percent. Every price increase before July 1 was ordered by the OPA. It has made over 500 price increases since March 1. By its action our people have had to pay high prices for inferior merchandise. All of us have had this experience. Let me cite just one example. For years I have been wearing Arrow shirts which cost $2.50. The company manufacturing these shirts asked OPA for a small increase in ceiling price on account of increased costs of production. The OPA refused to grant the increase. Result: no Arrow shirts. In my recent automobile accident, most of my shirts burned and I needed shirts. In order to get shirts I was compelled to pay $4.50 for shirts made by a company I had never heard of before and these shirts were of a very inferior quality. Had the OPA granted a small increase for the Arrow shirt, plenty of Arrow shirts would have been available at a slightly increased price. Therefore, I was compelled to pay an exorbitant price for inferior merchandise.

A few days ago I saw newspapers of April 1919 which was after the First World War, in which appeared many advertisements of food and clothing. There were no shortages then and the prices were lower than they are today under OPA ceilings. Of course there was no OPA to curtail production then. Whether price control should be continued is a debatable question but if it is to be continued it should be administered so as to permit production. Production is what is needed and if our people are permitted to produce, it will not be long before supply will equal demand and competition will then do more to hold the line, yes, to bring prices down, than OPA ever will. It was the action of the President and the OPA which broke the line and forced our present inflation. It was the veto of the President that ended price control on June 30. Therefore, if there are any evil results because of no price control, the responsibility rests squarely on the President.

Price control should not be considered as a political issue. The New Deal has attempted to becloud the issue in order to cover up its own mistakes and shortcomings and is trying to put the blame on the Republicans.

Let us be realistic and stop shadowboxing. There are 239 Democrats in the House and only 192 Republicans. In the Senate there are 56 Democrats and only 39 Republicans. The majority party has a substantial majority in both branches of Congress and has the responsibility for carrying out its program. It has the votes to do as it pleases, and the attempt to blame the minority for the majority's failures or lack of program will fool no one.

The President appoints the head of the OPA, who must do as the President wishes or be removed. It was the blunders of OPA that curtailed production, including building materials, which has caused the great housing shortage and prevented veterans from being able to secure houses.

Our Nation has become a land of scarcity instead of a land of plenty. Almost from the beginning of our Nation we were known the world over as a land of plenty and the land of opportunity and freedom. People from all over the world wanted to come to this country of plenty, of opportunity, and of freedom. So many people came that immigration laws were passed in order to limit the number we would permit to come.

We had a Constitution under which we were governed and the rights and privileges of everyone were fully protected. We produced an abundance of agricultural and manufactured products. We were able to supply our needs and to export enormous quantities and one of our problems of past years was the disposal of our surpluses. Several years ago the New Deal embarked on a program of scarcity and killed little pigs and plowed up crops and began paying people not to produce.

Now all this is changed and on every hand we find a shortage. During the war we fully demonstrated our productive capacity. We demonstrated that under our free-enterprise system we could outproduce all the rest of the world and at the same time recruit, train, and equip the best and most powerful army and navy in the world.

The war ended without any of the mills, mines, or factories of our Nation being destroyed or damaged. They are all intact and capable of production. The manpower which made this production possible is still here and capable of continued production. Many millions who were in the armed forces are now discharged and are anxious to get employment, to join in the great production force of our Nation, but in spite of all this, we have a scarcity of almost everything.

We did not change from a nation of plenty to a nation of scarcity by accident. This change did not just happen. There had to be a cause. It was brought about because the New Deal "planned it that way."

Our Nation grew great and strong and prospered under our system of personal initiative and private enterprise under constitutional government. For the past several years we have seen this American system of government under which we grew and prospered, being slowly but surely discarded and replaced by a new system which would destroy personal initiative and private enterprise, and supplant it with a system of government "planned economy" directed by bureaucrats out of Washington.

The wisdom of Thomas Jefferson has been proven. Jefferson said, "Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread." Jefferson apparently recognized and anticipated the ambitions of some members of society, and he realized the disastrous effect if these ambitions were ever permitted to gain control of our Government.

Jefferson's advice was not heeded and as a result, we have scarcities of practically everything, when we should have plenty. The planned economy theory of the New Deal has not worked successfully, which is exactly what Jefferson predicted.

What's wrong? Again I say this did not just happen; there must be a reason, and I think everyone who has given the matter any thought knows this reason. Those of the majority party who have been in control of our Government cannot dodge responsibility. The New Deal has had complete charge and they have made a miserable mess of things.

Whether price control is continued or not is important, but from the experience we have had it is apparent that we must have a change of administration before we can have production and prosperity.

Remember, we have changed riders, but it is the same horse and the same stream, and we are still in the middle of it.

Markers for Families of Deceased Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a resolution which was passed unanimously by the American Legion, Department of New Hampshire, at its convention in Newport, N. H., June 27 to 30, 1946:

Whereas the United States has appropriated $350,000,000 for the return of veterans' bodies and whereas the majority may not request the return of bodies where possible and whereas there are many whose loved ones were lost at sea or in action on land or in the air whose bodies cannot be returned: Now be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of New Hampshire, convened at Newport, N. H., June 27 to 30, 1946, take action to provide that part of that money be used to produce a marker (which will be nationally recognized) to be presented to families of servicemen who lost their lives. This marker to incorporate information regarding the death of the veteran and to be used on cemetery lot or lawn (as may be desired) to hold flag or other tribute on Memorial Day or any time desired.

Thus, allowing families regardless of circumstances to have some visible symbol along with others who have bodies returned so they will not have a feeling of being left out or forgotten while others are observing memorial services.

Advantage of this marker is that it may be moved from cemetery lot to lawn or taken whenever the family may be called to go, even to another town, State, or country.

Thus, always having a visible symbol to use when they wish to pay tribute to the loved one who has been called.

OPA—An Expensive $12

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bristol (Pa.) Courier of July 9, 1946:

OPA—AN EXPENSIVE $12

Certain New Deal economic schemes are strongly similar to the spirit of a once-popular joke.

A storekeeper whose business had been poor advertised dollar bills for 90 cents each. Naturally, his store was crowded.

"Whatever are you doing that for?" asked his astonished friends. "Think of the money you lose. You'll go broke."

"Perhaps that's true," was the reply, "but think of the turn-over."

A few days ago a news story appeared in which OPA food officials asserted that the Government's subsidy program had saved the average consumer $12 a year.

This statement is one of those pet catch phrases apt to mislead many persons, but quite as illogical as the idea of the merchant in the story that the turn-over, and crowds of eager customers, might somehow make up for his heavy losses.

In the first place, OPA made no effort to explain exactly how the $12 was saved. The apparent basis for its calculations was to divide the total amount of subsidies by the total number of population.

If this were a logical method, then the moral would be obvious. It brings to mind another ancient story about the man who, seeking a stove "guaranteed to save half the fuel bill," decided to buy two and save it all. If the savings claimed were really savings, then it would be a matter of simple arithmetic to raise the subsidies high enough to save all of everybody's food bills.

Unfortunately for such logic, the savings are not savings at all. The subsidies come from somewhere (unless someone swallows the inflationary idea that the Government simply prints money). Actually, they come from one of two sources, either current Federal taxes, or from Government borrowings—which means the taxes of the future.

The $12 per capita "savings" claimed are at the expense of at least $12 per capita in taxes. What the average family "saves" through the subsidy program it pays on its tax bill.

But that is by no means the extent of the taxes required to operate the subsidy program.

OPA alone ran a Federal pay roll of 33,000 persons, and it is but one of many agencies which are needed to supervise subsidy programs. The salaries of those needed to operate a $2,000,000,000 subsidy program are part of the overhead. This means a considerable boost in the needed taxes. Already the "saving" in food bills is shown to be a net loss when taxes are considered.

But there are other losses involved. Tax collection itself has an overhead. Likewise, the share of the subsidies which goes on the national debt has to draw interest and other carrying charges.

Counting all these factors adds up to the fact that the man who sold his dollars for 90 cents may really have been driving a better bargain than the bureaucrats are getting for the American people in the subsidy program.

But still that is not the whole story. The OPA restrictions, including those involving subsidies, have fostered the black markets. Illegal prices, which would not have been possible if the Government had kept its fingers out of the supply and demand conditions of an open market, have unquestionably taken at least as much out of the average American's pockets as the subsidies have "saved."

Put it this way: To "save" $12 apiece, we have accepted a program which has cost us considerably more than $12 apiece in taxes, and then gone into the black markets with another $12 to buy the things which the program drove off the counters.

Without exception, subsidized items have fled from the legitimate channels. Butter, subsidized roughly 15 percent, "to keep it available at a low price," vanished from most stores, but could be found elsewhere at a mark-up of from 200 to 300 percent.

These points show the $12 per capita saving to be a most expensive piece of business.

But more than money—whether prices or taxes—is involved. There is the broader question of the type of economy which relies on subsidies. Only one kind of government has ever attempted to inject subsidies into the day-to-day purchases of an average family, and that is a government in which the officials wish to take over management of everything.

Price controls, and similar interference with production and markets, are an important link in the drive for the national socialization of the United States.

Since the OPA has put its claim of "savings" in the terms of the average American, let's see what this larger bureaucratic program is doing to him.

The average American is asked by President Truman to pay $200 in Federal taxes this year, and the President plans to spend $250 of his money—going "in hock" for the balance. This type of Federal financing already has put the average American under a national debt mortgage of $2,000. The rise of the debt has caused a currency inflation which has lessened the true value of the average American's savings by about 75 percent in the last 12 years.

To make it just a bit harder than ever to get out of this hole, the Government is busy with both hands turning the average American's money over to foreign governments, where much of it will be used to try to capture the job on which he lives, and end his income. Already the Government has arranged to spend $70 of his money in this fashion, and the total may double.

These doings are the excuse for a national pay roll three times as large as really is necessary. These extra political jobs are costing the average American about $35 a year.

Lastly, while it is impossible to put a capital value on freedom, the loss of liberty and of the right to run his own government is the most important of all the costs involved in the $12 saving of which OPA is so proud.

Kansas Comments on OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I have just been reading the weekly newspapers from my congressional district. These papers contain some very interesting comments on the OPA. I am sure that they give the general reaction of the people in my district on the subject. I have selected the following clippings as being typical of the sentiments expressed. They represent different views and opinions, all of which I am sure are honest and sincere. I believe that Members of Congress and others who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be interested in reading these comments. For that reason I have asked unanimous consent to insert them in the Appendix of the RECORD.

[From the Syracuse (Kans.) Journal]

LET'S WAIT AND SEE

It is too early at this time to get a clear picture of the effects on our national price structure caused by the ending of OPA controls. Probably the net result will be somewhere between the extremes of skyrocketing prices forecast by those who favored the OPA, and plentiful merchandise with small price increases expected by those who wanted to see Government price control removed.

Butter alone of all goods seems to have taken a big rise. The consumers can cure this by stop buying butter for a few weeks. In any event what are the advantages of a price system which pays a butter subsidy, raised by taxes, over paying the extra money directly over the counter?

Congress should not be in too big a hurry to enact more laws of the OPA nature. Let's wait and see how things work out. There is time to reenact the same law, or revised laws when or if it becomes apparent that unscrupulous persons are taking advantage of shortages of necessities.

So far, the reaction of most merchants and manufacturers has been praiseworthy. They are promising every effort to keep prices within reason, not only because they fear the effects of inflation, but because they want even less the return of OPA rules.

One other factor should be considered in the new "let 'er buck" price system, and that is the innate good sense of the American people. With the single exception of shelter (and there should be rent protection), there are no items which in an extremity the citizen cannot go without, or substitute for. The recently deceased OPA seemed to have the idea that the American people are a bunch of morons who will buy at any price, and thus be robbed without its guardianship. Such is not the case. Most people are pretty shrewd shoppers, and if they think they are getting gypped, they'll leave the merchandise on the store shelves until it comes down to the price they think it is worth. At least such was the case before OPA, and about the same people are still doing most of the buying today.

[From the Ulysses (Kans.) News]

OPA IS FINISHED AND THROUGH FOREVER, WE FERVENTLY HOPE

When the end finally did arrive it proved that the OPA could only be matched in unpopularity by Mrs. Meany. Everywhere on the streets Monday morning the comment was, "There it is, let it lay."

People of all classes, farmers, businessmen, professional men, and housewives were almost unanimous in the opinion that the net result would be favorable.

Universal, too, was the expression that some prices were going to rise and rise fast. But everyone also conceded that production was the key, and the demise of the OPA was the finest contribution that could be made toward full production.

Hidden deep in the resentment of the lately deceased is the fact that most American people believe they are capable of taking care of their own pocketbook. Encased in all the propaganda for the late Federal agency was the idea that the people needed someone to tenderly guard them. Having been about and around a bit, as one might say, this idea was not received with favor.

With everyone so agreeable and affable, the only argument arouser was whether President Truman did it on purpose or not. When that question was approached the sidewalk philosophers immediately fell into their normal grooves of Republics and Demos and "fit" it out.

[From the Kiowa (Kans.) News]

OPA END IS MET WITH HOLD-PRICE PLEDGE

With the exception of the grain businesses in Kiowa the expiration of OPA passed without any notable difference in the business-as-usual policy of Kiowa. Practically everyone with whom the expiration was discussed stated that prices would remain the same on present stocks, and no radical mark-ups were expected on future merchandise which is to be received.

Those present at a called meeting of the Kiowa Chamber of Commerce pledged themselves to hold the line on prices.

Few seemed to believe that the passing of OPA, and the resumption of the system of supply and demand as a price-governing agency would make any appreciable difference in the economy of the country. Many outrightly expressed themselves as believing that it would mean more merchandise. A few believe that inflation will result.

Affected here immediately and greatly are the grain and milling business. Reports of the rapidly shifting prices of wheat and wheat products have made it almost, if not impossible to do any kind of business, managers report.

The fact that no one wants to buy at higher figures on wheat while no one wants to sell at the ceiling right at the present moment has made it difficult to get milling wheat.

The general feeling among the businessmen seems to be that if present stocks are moved at present prices, and every effort is made to prevent profiteering conversion from OPA control to supply-and-demand control will be orderly, and uneventful with the American people doing the right and sensible thing.

[From the Johnson (Kans.) Pioneer]

JOHNSON TO HOLD LINE ON PRICES

That American businessmen and industrialists, and certainly those of them in Johnson, will make every attempt to hold the line against inflation by voluntary control of costs and prices, although allowing a legitimate profit in business, was evident with the death of OPA. The attitude reflected in advertisements by several merchants in today's Pioneer is that of most American industry.

Merchants in Johnson said there was no increase in merchandise prices of any kind. Two grocers, Paul Cheatham, Co-op store manager and LaVerne Roark of the W & R store, advertised that they would hold food costs to a minimum in which they were joined by Leonard Payne at the L & M cafe.

Caves' Gas Service received this wire Monday from its distributor, Home Appliance Co. of Wichita: "Pending clarification make no sales at higher than OPA ceilings," and Tuesday the company sent a letter, saying in part:

"The surest way for business to force the return of drastic price control is for profiteering to break out on a widespread scale. The consumer would rightly rise up in arms and demand even more drastic controls than were proposed.

"All appliances have always been sold at nationally advertised prices. No factory can afford to permit higher-than-list-price sales by its distributors or dealers.

"In the final analysis the only way that inflation can be beaten is to increase production on scarce articles. If profiteering raises the prices before production can be increased after the recent strikes, then wild inflation is a sure thing and everyone loses."

Mr. Cave pointed to it as sound, sensible business and a matter of fairness to everybody, and he joined other Johnson merchants in an announcement that his prices will remain where they are until he has to raise them.

Others showed confidence in the people and in business and industry to do a more equitable job and just as effective in holding prices down than ever was possible by Government regulation.

"Don't buy it unless you need it, and then don't pay too much for it," is one man's formula.

[From the Coldwater (Kans.) Western Star]

THE OPA IS OFF AND OUR FOLKS LIKE IT—WITH CEILINGS REMOVED, WHEAT, CATTLE, AND HOGS ARE ADVANCED

Temporarily, at least, the OPA price control on most everything except sugar, has been removed.

The reaction in Comanche County is, on the whole, very favorable.

The majority of our citizens believe that if all the controls are removed and production is thus stepped up, within 6 months the open competition which has caused the United States in 170 years to far exceed the progress of any other nation in 1,000 years will result in a speedier recovery.

Indications are that in this county the merchants and dealers will continue selling their goods at former levels as long as goods cost the same. No big jump in prices is expected here.

Of course, there are instances in which people have more money than judgment, and they will pay any price asked in order to get what they want right now.

In Los Angeles there is already a buyers strike on in real estate, people refusing to pay the fabulously high prices asked by real estate agents and property owners. Congressman CLIFFORD HOPE says that the best thing for people to do is to refuse to pay far more than an article is worth.

The Government price of $1.70 for wheat went off June 30 and the price of wheat, based on the law of supply and demand, went up to $1.85 in Coldwater the next day. Thus it would seem that the Government has been buying wheat from our farmers for export at 15 cents less than it is actually worth at this time, and the wheat grower has been the loser.

Cattle prices went up 1½ to 2 cents per pound and hogs from 2½ to 4 cents per pound.

What people want now is production instead of scarcity. The economy of scarcity, invoked about 12 years ago, seems to be not a part of normal American life.

[From the Kansas Bulletin, Sterling, Kans.]

END OF OPA FINDS STERLING FOLKS BEWILDERED—LOCAL MERCHANTS INTEND TO HOLD THE LINE IF POSSIBLE

Sudden demise of the OPA brought mixed reactions from Sterling residents, but for the most part businessmen and housewives alike admitted they were scared, at least bewildered. Fearful of what Monday's markets might develop, grainmen and bankers worked up mild cases of nervous indigestion, but were relieved to find business proceeding normally on the local scene as the day progressed. The initial apprehension faded to a wait-and-see attitude.

Sterling grain buyers continued to purchase wheat as usual on Monday at Saturday's price of $1.72. There was no trading on wheat or rye options in the principal grain markets, and local buyers had nothing on which to base a new price.

The Sterling Co-op and the Arnold Mill announced yesterday afternoon they would buy wheat at $1.85 as long as cars are available for shipping or until the OPA is returned and grainmen find it necessary to roll back prices. The $1.85 price cannot be guaranteed for any length of time.

Manager Abraham Charbonneau, of Bowersock Elevator, said his bins were full and for this reason he could not buy any grain until his storage situation is relieved.

Local retail merchants were unanimous in their pledge to hold the line on prices unless the wholesale prices are advanced.

Inasmuch as Sterling is not in an OPA rent-control area, little fear was expressed over rent advances here.

To give a few personal opinions of the man on the street:

Banker Floyd Ross said he believed additional inflation could be avoided unless consumers begin bidding against each other for merchandise. In that case it will be hard for a retailer to turn down exorbitant offers. "He will be in the position of the hunter who shot a pheasant out of season—it flew in his face and he shot in self-defense."

Architect Marion Heter expressed the opinion that the idea of the OPA might have been O. K., but that as yet no one has been smart enough to fight the law of supply and demand.

George Baker, farmer, believes that controls should have been left on some items.

Remembering a tussle with the OPA over tires, L. J. McKelvy said he believed he could "get along without the OPA."

Red Proffitt says, "If everybody keeps his head, we can get settled down in 6 months."

Druggist Olen Laughlin is not alarmed. He cites the case of toilet water, on which the ceiling was recently removed. Only two brands went up, one 5 cents and one 10 cents, he explains.

Charley Farrell says the matter should be checked back to the manufacturers, the boys who clamored for the scalp of OPA. They promised to hold the line, now it's up to them to do so.

George Fulkerson, sage of the North-End Coffee Club, who has had previous ideas about the OPA, sums it up this way: "They have given every man a chance to run his own business again. I hope we prove worthy of the trust."

[From the Stafford (Kans.) Courier]

BULL-HEADED BOWLES IS TO BLAME

The sudden ending of all OPA controls is likely to have bad effects. What is needed is a gradual elimination of price controls. It should have been possible to work out a program of that kind.

But Chester Bowles would listen to no suggestion for relaxing price controls. He demanded a complete continuation of all the rules and regulations with authority to make still more of them. This, in spite of the fact that we are having inflation and growing black markets even under complete OPA control.

Congress was aware that most people want some reduction of OPA dictation. Price ceilings mean nothing when the public can't find the merchandise. It was evident we were going from bad to worse, and some relaxation of price regulation was worth trying to see if it would not increase production. Members of Congress knew that people felt it was time to try it.

If Bowles and his group had been willing to accept some restricting of their authority, and tried to work out a compromise plan with Congressmen, we would probably still have OPA, but in a modified form. But Bowles was so bull-headed that he fought every suggested change. For 12 years the Washington bureaucrats have been telling Congress what it must do. They have come to expect the elected representative of the people to pay no attention to the folks back home but to come across with whatever the bureaucrats want. They are sure they know what's good for the people and don't want anyone else making suggestions.

Probably the bill passed by Congress and vetoed by the President had many serious faults. But many of them could have been avoided if Bowles had been willing to compromise and give up some of his authority. He could have shown Congressmen the most-needed features to be retained and they would have been willing to give up some of their ideas if they had found a corresponding disposition in Bowles. But his arbitrary stand only aggravated the situation and strengthened the opposition to OPA.

Radicals and left-wingers will try to blame everything that happens on Congress, because Congressmen haven't been too friendly to a lot of their socialistic ideas. The fact is that Bowles is to blame for the OPA debacle.

[From the Meade County (Kans.) News]

IT'S UP TO YOU AND YOU AND YOU

It is strictly up to you, and you and you, the general public of the United States, as to whether you wish to return to OPA's grasping and unweildly management of the everyday affairs of this country, or whether you wish to enjoy your freedom.

That freedom of restraint in trade must be maintained by you and you alone, if you wish to enjoy it. There is bound to be some rise in prices, especially those farm products that have been subsidized, and in some products that have been processed wherein the processor was subsidized.

But if the country starts on a hog-wild spree of raising prices OPA will be suddenly revived and possibly plenty of teeth placed therein to make everybody wince.

With the death of OPA the black markets were all killed too. These leeches subsisted on the body parent of OPA. Without OPA they too curl up their haunches and expire.

No one wants inflation. You will find that the merchants of Meade are willing to do their part in holding price levels. There will be some price raises. These few raises cannot be helped, but no merchant in Meade contemplates a general price rise.

Some people who have a little more cash than they ever had in their lives before will probably offer exhorbitant prices for some articles that they could secure reasonably by just a little more waiting. These people are bringing the house down upon their heads. Doing this is the most certain way to bring back OPA and rationing of the scarce commodities.

Some commodities will remain scarce, and no doubt there will be some manipulation of prices in these commodities, but on the whole there should not be a general, overnight upward shift of prices.

Think it over! If you want freedom you must fight for it. If you want to be left alone by the OPA use a little common sense in your purchases. That old law of supply and demand cannot be beaten.

Supply and demand will level off prices. With more cars being rolled off the assembly lines at a little higher price, the demand will drop and there will not be the wild stories of payment of $2,500 for a 1946 Ford. Too, price increase works in itself for the reduction of demand. No better picture can be pointed out than that of butter. Many people are now switching to oleo because the price of butter has gone so high. You will find this same thing happening in other lines in a short time.

Let's keep away from OPA.

Production Is Not Enough

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the statement by Henry Hazlitt, published February 25, 1946, is logical and sound.

Under unanimous consent, I am inserting Mr. Hazlitt's article in the RECORD:

PRODUCTION IS NOT ENOUGH

(By Henry Hazlitt)

In a telegram on January 29 to John Snyder, the Director of Reconversion, Henry Ford 2d wrote: "Nobody wants run-away inflation, but if we continue to stifle American industry's ability to produce, that is exactly in my opinion what we are heading for. Inflation exists when there are too few products for people to buy with the money they have. Inflation grows out of scarcity."

Spokesmen for the administration have not attempted to refute this contention. On the contrary, Mr. Snyder, replying on February 1 to Mr. Ford's telegram, said: "I agree with you that the ultimate answer to our inflationary pressures is production." President Truman, in the statement accompanying his new wage-price order of February 14, remarked: "Production is our salvation. * * * Production will do away with the necessity for Government controls." And Chester Bowles, finally, in the course of his testimony before a congressional committee on February 18, declared: "Production is the only answer to inflation."

One might feel disposed, at first glance, to welcome this evidence of agreement between the administration and the industrialists on a highly important point. The difficulty is that the point, in the extreme form in which Mr. Bowles at last states it, is not true. It is at most only a half-truth.

If production were the only answer to inflation the cure for mounting prices would be simple. The excuse for price controls would, at best, end for each commodity the moment the production of that commodity reached its prewar level. (This might in any case very well be one of the limitations put on further price control if the controls are to be extended beyond June 30 of this year.) But no one who understands the situation seriously believes that even when production in each line catches up with prewar production prices will fall to prewar levels, or even remain under present ceilings.

For prices are determined not only from the side of supply, but from the side of demand. In a free market, supply and demand together determine prices like the two blades of a pair of scissors. Demand is now far greater than it was before the war because money incomes are far greater. And money incomes are greater principally because the supply of money and bank credit has been almost tripled since the outbreak of the war. The Federal Budget is still unbalanced; a further deficiency is estimated even for the fiscal year 1947. As long as this condition exists, together with excessively low interest rates brought about by governmental policy, money and bank credit will continue to mount. They will continue to push up demand and to push upward against prices.

It is often said that we can cure inflation by a flood of production. The element of truth in this statement is that the fullest possible production is essential for keeping prices down, and that we ought to put no obstacles in the way, particularly the obstacles of price fixing so tight that it discourages or cuts off production. But the statement overlooks the fact that it is impossible to increase physical production as easily as it is to print more money and create more bank credit. In December 1945, according to official indexes, physical production was actually 64 percent greater than the average production from 1935 to 1939. If we assume this estimate to be reasonably accurate, why, in spite of this, were prices higher than in 1935–39 and pressing higher still? The answer lies in the still greater increase in money and bank credit, reflected, for example, in the increase of money income payments in December 1945 to a level 134 percent above the average level in 1935–39.

The solution to the problem of high prices, in brief, is not production alone. It is the production of more goods combined with the cessation of production of more money and bank credit. And this illustrates what is wrong with the OPA's assurances that it will end price fixing "as soon as production catches up with demand." For Government price fixing itself discourages and delays production, and present Government fiscal policies keep increasing monetary demand. It is a losing race for production. Inflation can be cured only by bringing to a halt the governmental policies that produce it.

Support Urged for Anglo-American Palestine Committee Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, the Associated Jewish Organizations of San Francisco, comprising all major Jewish organizations and groups in that city, recently held a mass meeting to discuss the importance of the Anglo-American Committee on Inquiry on Palestine. I desire to direct the attention of the Members of the House to a resolution, unanimously adopted at this mass meeting, which has been sent to me by Mr. Jefferson E. Peyser, president of the Associated Jewish Organizations of San Francisco. The resolution follows:

Whereas the Anglo-American Committee on Inquiry on Palestine has made its findings and report; and

Whereas it contains recommendations which, if carried cut, will permit the immediate admission of 100,000 suffering and displaced Jews to Palestine; abrogate the discriminatory provisions of the 1939 British white paper, including the restrictions on land purchase; promote the Jordan Valley irrigation project, and contribute in other significant ways to the upbuilding of Palestine; and

Whereas the President of the United States has urged the united support of American Jewry in order immediately to accomplish these most hoped-for objectives; and

Whereas the Associated Jewish Organizations of San Francisco, composed of delegates of virtually every Jewish organization in San Francisco, is most anxious that this report receive the unanimous endorsement of the San Francisco Jewish community and also that affirmative action be taken to expedite the accomplishment of these above recommendations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this mass meeting convened by the Associated Jewish Organizations of San Francisco on this 18th day of June 1946, and representing a community-wide attitude and agreement on the part of the Jews of San Francisco, does hereby urge the President of the United States, the Cabinet Committee on Palestine and Related Problems appointed by him, and the alternate members thereof, the State Department, and the Members of Congress of the United States, to implement immediately the recommendations contained in the said report to the end that the above-mentioned objectives be achieved; and be it further

Resolved, That we here assembled pledge every aid toward facilitating the implementation of these recommendations; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to those above named.

Delaware River Bridge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following news item broadcast over Station WILM, Wilmington, Del., July 8, 1946:

Philadelphia, the City of Brotherly Love, isn't so brotherly tonight—not when it appears that Delaware is likely to receive Presidential authority to build a bridge across the Delaware River.

Last Friday the United States Senate passed—without a dissenting vote—a bill that had been introduced in the House of Representatives by Delaware's lone Representative, Dr. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR.

This bill would give Delaware's State Highway Department permission to span the Delaware River, from a point near Wilmington, with a four-lane highway. Such a bridge, to be paid for by tolls, would link Wilmington with the rich section of southern New Jersey and would eliminate the slow, cumbersome ferry system.

The bill is now before the President for approval, but already a storm is being stirred up in Philadelphia.

Philadelphia has always objected to a Delaware River bridge from near Wilmington. And now, in a final round to prevent such a crossing, a special committee representing Philadelphia business and commercial interests has forwarded a report to President Truman, asking him to veto the Traynor bill.

Philadelphia claims such a bridge would be a menace, of course, to the port of Philadelphia. And Philadelphia is saying that Delaware ought to construct a tunnel—though Philadelphia realizes that a tunnel is not as practical as a high-level bridge.

Philadelphia interests claim they were ignored when the Delaware River bridge was discussed at committee meetings in Congress.

Philadelphia is also holding to the argument that a bridge would endanger river traffic.

However, proponents of the bridge say the World War has shown that destruction of bridges does not impede river traffic.

The proposed bridge would cost about $25,000,000 and would be financed through bonds to be issued by the Delaware State Highway Department.

New Jersey has also come out in favor of the bridge, and has voted to construct highway approaches to the eastern terminus of the span.

Lt. Gen. Eugene Reybold, formerly head of the United States Army engineers, and one of the world-wide authorities on such matters, is in charge of the bridge project, having been employed for that purpose by the Delaware State Highway Department.

Soon after President Truman signs the bill, if he does sign it, Resident Judge Frank L. Speakman, of New Castle County, will appoint a commission of five men to ascertain the value of the Delaware-New Jersey Ferry Co., which operates the ferries between New Castle, Del., and Pennsville, N. J.

And the highway department will buy out the ferry—its stock, equipment, and inventory. This is in accordance with the bridge bill that had been passed by the General Assembly of Delaware at its last session.

However, the purchase of the ferry company, just as the construction of the bridge, will not cost Delawareans anything in taxes, nor will it mean money from the public treasury.

It is all to be financed by a bond issue, and the bonds are to be paid off by the income from tolls to be charged for the use of the bridge.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRENT SPENCE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to authority granted me to extend my remarks, I herewith insert a telegram which I have received from Hon. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and a letter from Walter W. Van Kirk, secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 8, 1946.

Hon. BRENT SPENCE,
Member of Committee,
Washington, D. C.:

British loan was specifically approved in a resolution on "international cooperation," adopted at last annual meeting of American Farm Bureau Federation by voting delegates elected by farmers in 45 States. This loan is vital to restoration of world trade and establishment of sound economic foundation for an enduring peace. As Britain is best customer for our exports, this loan is good business for the American farmer and for our Nation. Respectfully urge your support of British loan agreement.

EDW. A. O'NEAL,
President, American Farm Bureau Federation.

THE COMMISSION ON A JUST AND DURABLE PEACE INSTITUTED BY THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA.
New York, N. Y., July 9, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. SPENCE: The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America holds to the view that a just and durable peace will be enoromously advanced if the Congress of the United States will support the proposal for an extension of credit to Great Britain.

The official representative of the denominations related to the Federal Council of the Churches, meeting in Columbus, Ohio, March 4–7, 1946, unanimously adopted the following statements:

"We urge that generous material aid be given by the United States to help countries impoverished by the war to rebuild their economic life. We recognize that the proposal for an extension of credit to Great Britain, now before the Congress of the United States, represents the kind of practical assistance which is imperative for world order."

It is my considered judgment that the great majority of the membership of our Protestant churches desire favorable action by the House of Representatives on the proposed credit to Great Britain.

Respectfully yours,

WALTER W. VAN KIRK,
Secretary.

Fertilizer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 28, 1946

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the Southern States have their full share of "pore land"—in some sections heavy cash outlays are required every year to buy enough fertilizer to produce a crop. The farmer must pay out this money, do all the work, and take all the risk on weather and prices. The fertilizer companies charging big prices and getting easy money. Congress tried to relieve this situation and meet the Nation's need for explosives in the First World War by undertaking to build the Muscle Shoals power and nitrate-fixing project in the South, but before the plant could be completed a change in administration gave the Power Trust and the Fertilizer Trust an opportunity to step in and block the plan which hung fire until President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Senator Norris came to the rescue with the Tennessee Valley project, a program that has brought prosperity to the Southern States where these Government plants are operated. Once again plans are under way to provide cheap fertilizer for poor lands of the South, but it seems the fertilizer interests are again at work to protect their profitable trade with Franklin Roosevelt and Senator Norris out of the way. For the information of my colleagues, there is inserted a letter from the National Fertilizer Association and my reply thereto:

THE NATIONAL FERTILIZER ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., July 10, 1946.

To Members of the Congress:

Very shortly you will be asked to vote on a measure which would provide funds for a TVA fertilizer plant at or near Mobile.

Representing American citizens, who are interested not only in the preservation of one of the basic industries of the country, but also in the kind of government this Nation has long stood for, I respectfully urge that you read the enclosed pamphlet, More Government in Business? It answers, I believe, the questions you naturally ask about the fertilizer industry—what it has accomplished and what it plans to do, if allowed to carry on.

Please note these fundamental facts:

In 1945 total production of all grades of superphosphate calculated to a basis of 18 percent was 8,038,519 tons, while practical operating capacity of normal superphosphate plants of private industry, as announced by the WPB, was 11,486,125 tons on the same basis. This does not include private industry capacity to produce some 400,000 tons of concentrated superphosphate basis 45 percent phosphoric acid, equivalent to 1,000,000 tons of 18 percent. Whenever materials, labor, and other items are available, this capacity can be fully utilized.

New capacity is being developed, particularly in areas of recently increased demand as rapidly as industry can secure equipment, materials, and labor for such construction. This new capacity includes concentrated superphosphate facilities.

For the year ending June 30, 1945, TVA reports their cost of concentrated superphosphate production at $92.07 a ton of phosphoric acid. During this same period commercial producers were selling their products at $74 a ton or less.

Before you vote, we trust you will consider these facts and others in the pamphlet. We feel such action on your part would contribute toward an understanding of a basic public issue.

Thank you very much.

Sincerely yours,

MAURICE H. LOCKWOOD,
President.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11, 1946.

Mr. MAURICE H. LOCKWOOD,
President, National Fertilizer Association.

DEAR MR. LOCKWOOD: I suppose you know that the people on the poor lands of the South have been reduced to dire extremities by the overcharges exacted for fertilizer; in many cases the fertilizer people getting more out of the crop than the man who raised and marketed it.

In this case I would suggest that the fertilizer interests direct their propaganda to more receptive ears.

Sincerely,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

Address by Hon. Harley M. Kilgore, of West Virginia, to West Virginia Rural Letter Carriers' Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] on July 5, 1946, to the convention of the West Virginia Rural Letter Carriers' Association.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, guests, it is a great pleasure for me to be here this evening and join with you in celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of rural free delivery.

Due to the pressing legislative schedule, I did not know definitely until this afternoon whether or not I would be able to attend this convention.

It is indeed fitting that the rural carriers of West Virginia should gather here for the golden jubilee celebration of the establishment of rural routes, for the rural free delivery service was pioneered in our own State.

The first experimental rural delivery service was established at Charles Town in 1896, and later routes were established at Halltown and Uvilla, W. Va.

The remarkable growth and success of the rural delivery service since its meager beginning 50 years ago is a great tribute to the far-sighted men who pioneered this service.

They stood up and fought for rural free delivery even though their critics did everything possible to discredit them in the eyes of the public.

Up until, and even shortly after, the first rural route was established at Charles Town, the proponents of rural free delivery were denounced as wide-eyed dreamers. They were called unpractical men who would wreck the entire economy of the Nation if their idea became a reality.

The April issue of the Postmaster's Gazette points out that just slightly more than a half century ago the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives took up the proposal to establish rural free delivery. The plan did not receive a very good reception.

One member of the committee declared that the idea of the Government sending a man with a horse and wagon up and down the highways of all the rural districts of America for the purpose of collecting and distributing mail was so ridiculous that it not only would make a "laughing stock" of the postal service, but it also would bankrupt the Government.

Despite this severe criticism, the far-sighted men who believed in rural free delivery—the men who had a deep insight as to what it could do for our country—continued to crusade for the establishment of this service.

Gradually they won many friends, and in 1896 the Postmaster General, William L. Wilson, established the first experimental rural delivery service at his home in Charles Town.

From that meager beginning, the rural free delivery service has grown to the point where it touches the homes of many millions of Americans.

This service has played a vital role in the development of our country.

It also is living proof that progress is made not by the cynics, but those who have the courage and fortitude to carry out their plans in the face of great odds.

This has been true in many fields of endeavor in our great land.

Cynics and scoffers have appeared in each generation, but, fortunately, in most every case, people of vision have secured progressive reforms despite the ridiculing from the sidelines.

Today no one can question the value of rural free delivery, and no one can say that in the next 50 years it will not make as much progress as it has made in the last 50 years.

We can and will go ahead to new heights in the rural mail delivery service as well as in other fields—commerce, science, industry, and government.

As in the past, Congress is not unmindful of its responsibility to assist you in every possible way.

Looking back on the legislative record of the past 6 years, you will find that Congress has been aware of your problems and it has endeavored to help you by drafting constructive measures to aid postal workers.

During 1941, my first year as a Member of the United States Senate, the Seventy-seventh Congress passed two major bills benefiting postal employees.

On July 30, 1941, the Congress enacted a law to adjust, on an equitable basis, the salaries of rural carriers on heavy routes. Because of the difference in density of population on rural routes, carriers on those routes with frequent stops were at a disadvantage because the rate of compensation is based upon mileage rather than the number of patrons.

This law corrected, to some extent, that inequity.

The Seventy-seventh Congress also enacted Public Law No. 411, a measure to liberalize the Civil Service Retirement Act, and, to increase some annuities and reduce the age for voluntary retirement. This law made it possible for postal employees to retire at their own option after 30 years of service and 60 years of age. It also provided that annuities be computed in such a manner that after 35 years of service, postal employees could retire with annuities equaling one-half their average salary for a 5-year period.

The Seventy-eighth Congress passed four forward-looking constructive measures to aid the postal employee.

On April 9, 1943, Public Law No. 25 was enacted into law. This law increased the salaries of all postal employees $300 per year. It was effective until June 30, 1945.

In September of 1943, the Seventy-eighth Congress granted a temporary increase in the equipment allowance of the rural letter carriers. As you know, rural carriers are allowed a fixed sum per mile for maintenance of their equipment. This law gave them a temporary increase of 1 cent per mile because of the war emergency.

In March of 1944, the Congress took up another problem of the postal employee. This related to military service.

Specifically, this measure authorized payment for postal service rendered after induction into the armed forces. As you probably recall, during the early days of the war it was customary to furlough men inducted into one of the military branches until actually called for duty. Many of these men returned home to work in post offices, but, later they found that they could not be paid for this service, because of the dual job law. This new law enabled the Federal Government to pay these men for the postal service they rendered after they were inducted into military service.

The Seventy-Eighth Congress, in March, 1944, passed Public Law No. 271, established a system of annual salaries for fourth class postmasters. Until enactment of this law, fourth class postmasters were paid a percentage of receipts of their respective offices, and, this worked a hardship on many of them. A scale of annual salaries corrected this situation.

The Seventy-ninth Congress, now in session, has taken considerable action on postal legislation.

In fact, I think our most important postal employee improvements, in recent years, have been written into law by the Seventy-ninth Congress.

Last July Congress passed Public Law No. 143, to reclassify salaries of postal employees and provide for a minimum increase of $400 in basic pay.

This act reclassified the salaries of all postal employees and provided for an immediate increase of $400 or a 20-percent increase for hourly or per diem workers. This law went into effect July 1, 1945, replacing the previous act which expired June 30, 1945. It also provided that overtime shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half instead of straight time.

This law made a marked improvement in your salary checks.

An important retirement act also was passed by Congress last year. This law, which went into effect last November, clearly stipulated that any employee of the Federal Government who was inducted into the armed service should not be considered as separated from the Federal service for retirement purposes. Previously the Comptroller General had ruled that Federal employees who were inducted into the armed forces and were disabled and unable to return to duty, were declared ineligible for retirement benefits. This act provided that such employees shall be considered as on leave and not separated from Federal service, thus giving them the right to receive retirement benefits.

A month later—in December 1945, the Seventy-ninth Congress acted on another important phase of retirement.

The Congress passed a bill to provide that employees shall receive credit for service in the armed forces for retirement purposes without any deductions from their earnings. In other words, Federal employees received credit for the time they spent in the military service without contributing to the retirement fund.

This year Congress has passed two major laws benefiting you and your coworkers throughout the Nation.

Public Law No. 137, enacted in March, is designed to restore credit for past substitute service, to restore the right of sick leave and vacation pay to war service substitutes and to adjust the pay of substitute rural carriers.

For more than 20 years the law provided that upon promotion to regular positions, postal employees would receive credit for all service as substitutes in establishing their salary grade. The Classification Act of July 6, 1945, failed to provide that credit. This new law restored to all substitutes on the pay rolls of June 30, 1945, credit for all past substitute service.

Last, but I am certain you will agree with me that it is by no means least, the Seventy-ninth Congress granted all postal employees a new increase in wages. President Truman signed this measure last month. It gives postal employees an increase of $400 per year in base pay.

It gives hourly employees—the substitutes—a 20-cent-an-hour increase, and it gives fourth-class postmasters a 20-percent increase in pay.

All of these increases, which were effective as of January 1 of this year, make a well-earned adjustment in basic pay and they offset the loss in take-home pay due to the elimination of overtime work.

These laws have helped improve our postal service.

This great service shall continue to grow in the future and it shall ever continue to bring the cities and towns, the States, and the nations closer together.

The great improvements in our postal system in the past have earned for this great service the slogan: "Enlarger of the common life."

The postal service in the past has been one of the greatest instruments of trade and industry, and as the carrier of news and knowledge, it has helped tremendously in keeping democracy a living and working form of government without peer.

Better communications means a better world.

Every American should be proud of our wonderful postal system and the faithful employees who have made it possible.

Although relatively new in years, rural free delivery has been one of the strongest links in our postal system.

I wish to congratulate you on the progress that has been made in the first 50 years of rural free delivery, and express the hope that the next 50 years will be just as fruitful for our democratic government.

Anglo-American Financial Agreement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRENT SPENCE
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to authority granted me to extend my remarks, I herewith insert a letter which I have received from Hon. John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, July 10, 1946.

Hon. BRENT SPENCE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Currency, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPENCE: As you know, the hearings before your committee on the Anglo-American financial agreement were almost concluded when I became Secretary of the Treasury. In view of the able expositions of my predecessor in office and other administration officials, I did not believe it necessary to seek an opportunity to express to your committee my similar views with respect to the agreement. Recent developments, however, have convinced me that it is desirable and, in fact, incumbent upon me as Secretary of the Treasury to express my profound conviction that the approval of the agreement with Britain is a matter of utmost importance and urgency.

Testimony of witnesses before the respective committees of the House and Senate as well as the debate on the floor of the Senate have, in my judgment, set forth with admirable clarity the basic economic and financial reasons why the approval of the financial agreement with Britain is important to the future well-being of this country and the world. These discussions have, I think, afforded an exceptionally clear and intelligent basis for decision. Unfortunately, however, this original clarity has been partially dispelled in recent days by the introduction into the debate of extraneous issues. There has been a tendency on the part of some, I think, to forget the broad foreign economic policy of the United States and to be influenced by issues which should be settled separately.

I think that in the interest of all of us, a decision to approve or disapprove the proposed credit to Britain must be based exclusively upon those considerations of economic stability and world peace which the financial agreement was designed to foster. World trade expansion and the elimination of economic warfare are the twin objectives of our foreign economic policy. They cannot be achieved in a world of currency restrictions, discriminatory trade practices, and economic blocs. I am convinced that the Anglo-American financial agreement is necessary to the achievement of our objectives. If we are serious about our intentions to lead the world to peace and prosperity, we cannot in my judgment reject this opportunity to take the initial step.

The financial agreement with Britain is a sound economic and financial deal for the United States. It was soundly conceived and expertly negotiated. It is my fervent hope that the Congress will not, at this juncture, be diverted from the major objectives toward which much of its legislation has been directed in the last few years, but will give its approval to the Anglo-American financial agreement.

Very sincerely yours,
JOHN W. SNYDER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Just Peace for Italy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I enclose herewith resolution adopted by the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island, Order Sons of Italy in America, and other organizations, at a meeting held in the city of Providence, R. I., on June 23, 1946:

Whereas a just peace settlement with the new democratic Italy and her restoration to freedom, self-respect, and contentment are indispensable to world stabilization and a lasting peace;

Whereas by finally overthrowing fascism in 1943, 2 years before the end of the war, the people of Italy struck a mortal blow to the Axis and thus tremendously helped the cause of the Allied Nations; and thereafter, during the decisive phase of the war Italy was no longer an enemy but a cobelligerent with the Allies, rendering an invaluable moral and military contribution to the victory over the common enemy;

Whereas the late President Roosevelt and former Prime Minister Churchill affirmed coram populi in the Atlantic Charter their most solemn engagement that in the post-war settlement the United Nations would seek no territorial aggrandizements; and the Allied Powers promised to the Italians their peace treaty would take in full consideration Italy's great contribution to the defeat of Germany;

Whereas a self-respected, laborious, and democratic Italy, as mother of western civilization for 2,000 years, will be a strong bulwark against the advancing ideologies of bolshevism;

Whereas Trieste and the Istrian Peninsula claimed by Yugoslavia; South Tyrol, which is on this side of the Alps, claimed by Austria; the valleys of Tenda and Briga in the Maritime Alps claimed by France; are geographically the natural borders of the Italian Peninsula since the time of creation; and politically an integral part of the Italian Nation, because of more than one century of struggle for the unification of Italy which culminated with the redemption of Istria and Tyrol during World War I, when Italy was our ally and sacrificed 600,000 dead and 1,500,000 wounded;

Whereas the Italian colonies in north Africa, now under British military rule, were developed by Italy at great sacrifices years before this war and fascism, and the most appropriate solution would be to revert them temporarily to Italy under the aegis of the United Nations until the world problem of colonial empires, many times richer and larger than Italy's, would be solved by an international covenant, applying the same principle to all colonies and to all countries;

Whereas the economic resources of Italy are at the lowest ebb, and to become an element of peace and progress Italy needs loans and not the burden of reparation, of which she has already paid some in various forms to various Allies;

Whereas the people of Italy are bound by many ties of affection and admiration to the people of the United States;

Whereas the United States of America, more than any other country, won the war: Be it

Resolved, That we, Americans of Italian origin, representing the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island, Order Sons of Italy in America, and many other fraternal welfare organizations, assembled here in Providence, R. I., on the 23d day of June 1946, do hereby affirm our conviction that Italy does not deserve a punitive peace, and should not be humiliated nor mutilated to satisfy the revengeful and imperialistic appetites of any country; and we voice our faith and confidence in the wisdom and good will of President Truman, and in the initiative and ability of Secretary of State Byrnes, so that at the Paris conference now being held there will be agreed a treaty of peace with Italy worthy of the traditions of the United States, which will be signed by the representatives of America without the remorse of having compromised with principles of justice in the face of unjust and arrogant pretensions; neither of having failed the vital interest of western civilization, in which is rooted our American way of life, nor of having frustrated the longing of free people everywhere for an enduring peace.

Copies of this resolution to be sent to President Truman, Secretary of State Byrnes, Governor Pastore, our Senators and Congressmen at Washington.

L. SCALA,
Grand Venerable, Grand Lodge of Rhode Island, Order Sons of Italy in America.

Rural Missouri and the CIO-PAC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAT ARNOLD
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, the question that confronts us in the approaching congressional election seems clearer day by day. Should we send men to Washington who will speak and vote as their conscience dictates, on the basis of principle, ever bearing in mind what will assure maximum happiness and welfare of our free liberty-loving people, or will the men we send to Washington betray the confidence of the people by knuckling down to the unscrupulous labor leaders, and vote as the CIO-PAC dictates.

As indicated by recent statements in the press, certain Members of this Congress, including myself, have been placed on the blacklist and branded by the CIO-PAC. Of the 22 Members of the House and 10 Members of the Senate on this list, four of us come from Missouri. These men have been singled out and marked for defeat by the CIO-PAC for two principal reasons.

First. We have steadfastly refused to vote for measures that would fritter away to the four winds of the world the wealth and resources of the United States. By tremendous propaganda campaigns and the use of huge slush funds, the giving away and dissipation of our wealth has been popularized in certain quarters. It appears to me that those of us who have voted to conserve American resources, thus assuring us of strength and prosperity among our own people have voted truly American. Our people are big-hearted and are ready and willing to help others to a certain degree but to give and loan our resources to such an extent as advocated by the New Deal Communists would mean a weakened America. Surely we love our neighbors, but, after all, does not charity begin at home?

The second big reason why a few of us have been singled out as special targets by the CIO-PAC-New Deal crowd is that we have consistently voted against attempts to regiment our people; we have blocked measures tending toward state socialism, and we have fought for an economy of abundance rather than scarcity. We have opposed the controlled, planned economy under which we now struggle for existence and which creates one shortage after another, which is retarding reconversion and beating us down to less and less of material goods. We have voted for free enterprise in business, for a restoration of competition and the free market. We have upheld democratic capitalism as against communistic totalitarianism. We have objected to administration policies favoring big cities as against the farmers and producers of the Midwest, a glaring example being the $2,000,000,000 per year food subsidies which is included in the OPA bill.

These subversive, left-wing elements are fighting us with all their might because we insist upon retaining our traditional, representative American form of government. We have voted for the kind of an America our forefathers dreamed of when they revolted from the oppressive tyranny of the king, for the kind of an America that was visualized by George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, as set forth in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States—an America where opportunity would abound, where individual initiative would flourish and where freedom and liberty of the individual would never be crushed.

Those of us who are on the blacklist of the CIO-PAC are threatened with all kinds of smear attacks. Their campaign is to organize local groups which call themselves "independents"; they will use the "livery of the Lord to serve the devil"; they will call themselves "independent voters," the purpose of course being only to fool the voters. They will work both openly and under cover. In Missouri each candidate for Congress must file a sworn statement of his campaign expenditures, which must not exceed an amount approximating $3,500 per each congressional district. The CIO-PAC has brazenly announced that they would spend $90,000 in four congressional districts in Missouri this time.

Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honor and distinction to be singled out as one of those four. If the time has come when I as a Member of the United States Congress must bow to the dictates of the radical CIO-PAC rather than do the bidding of the people of the First Congressional District of Missouri whom I represent and to whom I am responsible, then I am ready and willing to be defeated; for if the people of Missouri are so passive as to let them get away with this, representative government is at an end.

It is difficult to distinguish between the New Deal and communism. It is hard to tell where one begins and the other leaves off. The American people have been hoodwinked and caught napping. Under the Democratic Party label subversive elements have flourished and are wrecking our republican form of government. Our one big hope is that the Republican Party can meet this challenge, that it can prove to be the strong, effective agency to which we may turn in confidence in this hour of crisis. Inasmuch as the Republican Party has not yet become tainted by left-wing influence, it represents our one big hope of keeping America American.

Mr. Speaker, Congress is the last remaining bulwark assuring our people against the loss of their freedom. America will be as strong as the collective strength and integrity of the men we send to Congress. If the people's representatives compromise with their consciences and become political opportunists, selling their soul, so to speak, for a few votes, if our citizens are willing to put up with moral weaklings, ever-ready to bow down to the dictates of labor racketeers, then continual decay and a backward march to medieval times can be expected. Only by independent thinking and voting can the future independence and integrity of Congress as an institution be maintained.

George S. Penson, president of Harding College, has so aptly said:

If I were a powerful Communist, trying to destroy American freedom and paralyze its prosperity, I would concentrate on three aims which ultimately will reduce any country to serfdom.

First. I would foment strikes and create just as much industrial confusion and uncertainty as possible.

Second. I would scatter biased propaganda, misrepresenting businessmen and destroying faith in business. I would try to prove private enterprise a failure.

Third. I would boost all wasteful appropriation bills in Congress and teach people to expect something for nothing from government—this to weaken the Nation's financial structure.

These three activities, carried on persistently and long enough would wreck any democracy—any republic.

Office of Price Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I have personally called attention frequently to the need of extending OPA in the interest of the American consumer. By this time the public must recognize the fact that the powerful interests, industrialists, and producers, such as the livestock growers, aided by the packer's combination and the Meat Institute, the dairy industry, the grain growers and, in fact, all other food growers and producers, have and are using their great influence to kill the OPA.

This can result only in increasing the prices of their products above the price that the consumer can afford to pay, disregarding the danger they are facing and the burden that will be theirs and the country's if we are beset with inflation. Nothing that I may state can add to the editorial appearing in the July 9 issue of the Chistian Science Monitor of the possible effect of the nullification of price controls upon the general welfare. The editorial is most timely and under the leave given me I insert it in the RECORD:

POLITICAL PRICE BOOSTING

Unless the American people can make it clear to Congress that the general welfare must come ahead of special interests, any new price-control legislation will be a mere pretense. For pressure groups of producers who want no control of their commodities are starting the old log-rolling game. They are beginning to trade votes to riddle the substitute OPA bill with exemptions.

Senators from States having many producers of meat, dairy, and poultry products will be urged by those interests to support the Wherry amendment to take controls off them. Senators from the oil-producing States will be high-pressured by oil interests to exempt petroleum and its products from price ceilings. Senators from the States that grow cotton had already pretty well tied OPA's hands on cotton; now they will ask that cottonseed be exempted.

Other blocs will join the happy parade. Each will seek exemption for one product, but each will vote for the others' exemptions in exchange for votes for its own pet. The result can be a combination of exemptions which would largely nullify price controls.

The total effect may be to increase prices of a dozen commodities—or a hundred—in order to raise the prices of one which is important enough in a given State or area to command the votes of Senators from that area. Consumers as a whole in that area—and in the Nation—may be injured far more than the special interest is aided. But Senators and Congressmen figure that each consumer's interest is small compared with that of the producer, so that consumers will not know or will not care enough to penalize their representatives in Congress for misrepresenting them.

This combination of producers' interests seeking price increases has been the constant enemy of OPA. In some cases producers had legitimate complaints against unduly low ceilings or against OPA red tape. And many producers could not fairly be asked to pay higher wages without raising prices. But considering the price increases that have already taken place, the public is entitled to feel that most of these pressures today are far more concerned with the special interests of various producing blocs than with the general welfare.

The OPA bill which President Truman vetoed plainly showed the marks of such political price making. The Wherry and Taft amendments in the new Senate bill retain many of the same faults. And if the new amendments seeking exemptions are logrolled into the bill, it will represent the purposes of those who wish to destroy price controls, not of the public which wishes to maintain some barriers against inflation. The public ought to understand this fact clearly and to make its wishes known.

Aims and Purposes of Amvets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by Mr. J. H. Leib, who is a representative of the American Veterans of World War II, setting forth the aims and purposes of that organization.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE AND HOUSE JUDICIARY SUBCOMMITTEE APPROVE CONGRESSIONAL CHARTER FOR AMVETS

(By J. H. Leib)

Yesterday, the full Senate Judiciary Committee and a Judiciary Subcommittee of the House favorably reported S. 2326 and H. R. 6719, respectively, to incorporate the Amvets—American Veterans of World War II.

Amvets throughout the Nation are grateful for this endorsement and approval by the Judiciary Committees of both Houses of the Congress.

Amvets activities and public statements have now been favorably commented upon by Members of Congress from every State in the Union. We have labored tirelessly and steadfastly for this enthusiastic support and public encouragement. Therefore, we sincerely hope that Congress will grant Amvets a congressional charter as soon as possible.

Amvets is dedicated to the following purposes:

1. To preserve for ourselves and our posterity the great and basic truths and enduring principles upon which this Nation was founded.

2. To maintain a continuing interest in the welfare and rehabilitation of the disabled veterans of World War II and to establish facilities for the assistance of all veterans and to represent them in their claims before the Veterans' Administration and other departments without charge.

3. To dedicate ourselves to the service and best interest of the community, State, and Nation, to the end that our country shall be and remain forever a whole, strong, and free Nation.

4. To aid and encourage the abolition of prejudice, ignorance, and disease. To encourage universal exercise of the voting franchise, to the end that there shall be elected and maintained in public office men and women who hold such office as a public trust administered in the best interest of all the people.

5. To advocate the development and means by which all Americans may become enlightened and informed citizens and thus participate fully in the functions of our democracy.

6. To encourage and support an international organization of all peace-loving nations, to the end that not again shall any nation be permitted to breach their national peace.

7. To continue to serve the best interest of our Nation in peace and in war.

8. To develop to the utmost the human, mental, spiritual, and economical resources of our beloved Nation.

9. To perpetuate and preserve the friendships and comradeship born on the battlefront and nurtured in the common experience of service to our Nation during time of war.

10. To honor the memory of those men and women who gave their lives that a free America and a free world might live by the creation of living memorials in the form of additional educational, cultural, and recreational facilities.

11. To operate as a corporation not for profit, and that no part of the income or assets shall inure to the benefit of any of its members, or officers, not be distributable thereto otherwise than upon dissolution or final liquidation; and that such corporation is organized and shall be operated exclusively for charitable, educational, patriotic, and civic improvement purposes.

At this point I would like to recapitulate a few of our statements that have appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from time to time, as introduced by the following members of Congress:

The American Veterans of World War II, by Hon. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER, June 1, 1945.

Principles Adopted by Amvets at National Meeting in Chicago, by CLYDE DOYLE, November 6, 1945.

American Veterans of World War II (Amvets) Principles, Constitution and Bylaws Adopted at its First National Convention, Chicago, Ill., October 1945, by Hon. CLYDE DOYLE, November 6, 1945.

History and Program of Amvets, by Hon. CLYDE DOYLE, December 3, 1945.

New York Amvets Hold First State Convention, by Hon. W. STERLING COLE, January 15, 1946.

Amvets Promote Veterans' Hospital Educational Program, by Hon. MELVIN PRICE, January 17, 1946.

Representative MANASCO Assists Amvets in McLean Housing Project, by Hon. LUTHER PATRICK, January 16, 1946.

Testimony of American Veterans of World War II in Support of Senate Bill 1592, by Hon. ALLEN J. ELLENDER, December 18, 1945.

Veterans' Problems, Amvets Resolutions, by Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN, February 4, 1946.

Amvets Fight for McLean Gardens, by Hon. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER, February 20, 1946.

The President Joins the Propagandists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States, in a recent speech, sought to stir up the fears of the American people by stating that the price of washing machines would increase approximately 30 percent overnight directly due to the elimination of the Office of Price Administration and its ceiling prices. This of course was purely propaganda. I would not even reply to it were it not for the fact that the Blackstone Corp. which manufactures a high-grade washing machine is located in my district. This industry has had no idea of raising the price of its washing machines and it is regrettable that the President of the United States should stoop so low in an effort to impress some hysterical people that the death of the OPA would overnight raise the price of washing machines, as to single out washing machines for mention. The one person who has done more to bring on inflation in this country than any other has been our Chief Executive. I would suggest that he exercise a little judgment in appointing men to administer the laws of this country.

If there were any increase in the price of essential products in this country it will be due to the inept leadership of our Chief Executive who has certainly set an example of how to arouse baseless fears as well as to break the hold-the-line formula.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting some advertisements which appeared in the Jamestown (N. Y.) Post-Journal of Wednesday Evening, July 3, 1946, which I think fully answer the inaccurate as well as inflammatory statement of the President of the United States with reference to washing machines:

WE ARE HOLDING THE LINE ON PRICES FOR ALL UNFILLED ORDERS

The following letter is being sent to our dealers:

"The merchandise you have on order was sold subject to prevailing prices at the time of shipment. However, there will be no change in prices for this merchandise as a result of the termination of OPA. Our prices always were competitive before price control was enacted and they will continue to be now that the law is no longer in force. We feel sure you will also be able to sell this merchandise at your present mark-up to assure continued good volume to the buying public in accordance with price policies already publicized by most retail stores.

"Yours very truly,

"CRAWFORD FURNITURE MANUFACTURING CORP.,
"CLYDE CRAWFORD,
"President, Crawford Furniture Manufacturing Corp.
"JAMESTOWN, N. Y."

As manufacturers of a basic commodity which vitally affects the entire economy, this company pledges that so long as it has the cooperation of labor and its suppliers we intend to hold the line.

JAMESTOWN MALLEABLE IRON CORP.

PRICE INCREASES NOT CONTEMPLATED

The Blackstone Corp., believing that price increases of major household appliances are unwarranted at the present time, has requested its 10,000 distributors and dealers by the following telegram to adhere without exception to present price schedules until further notice:

"No price changes are contemplated on any Blackstone Corp. products. We shall expect all our distributors and dealers to rigidly adhere to present schedules and to immediately advertise this fact to the public. Our neighbors are our customers and we will treat them fairly regardless of legislative actions. We believe in free enterprise for America."

Blackstone therefore is proud to be among the first to announce its intention to refrain from any exploitation of the present situation. Blackstone will continue to provide better merchandise at fair and equitable prices.

Minimum-Wage Bill

REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, as the session of Congress apparently is coming to a close, there is one particular item of legislation in which a great many of us are interested that seemingly is not going to be reported to the floor from the Committee on Rules. I refer to the minimum-wage bill, an essential part of the President's program as announced last January. The secretary of the 92 cosponsors of that particular bill, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER], has placed upon the Speaker's desk discharge petition No. 34, and as chairman of the cosponsors I urge and invite all of the Members of the House who are interested in this legislation to sign discharge petition No. 34. Let us at least bring this vitally important measure to the floor for discussion.

Rising Prices—Whose Fault?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, many of us who voted to extend the Office of Price Administration in spite of the President's veto did so rather to protect those who pay rent and have to buy groceries out of fixed incomes and low wages rather than from any confidence in the manner in which that bureau has been administered.

That this lack of confidence is felt by many of the very ones that OPA was designed to assist is shown in the following article by Will Allen, which appeared in the July 1 issue of Justice, the official weekly paper of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union:

INSIDE WASHINGTON
(By Will Allen)

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Realists in politics have said time and again that there is nothing more fundamental in public relations than meat on the table, a shirt on your back, and a roof over your head. That's why some observers here are convinced that what Congress did last week will be the main campaign issue next November. If that reasoning is true, then it should follow that a lot of Congressmen committed political suicide when they cut the throat of the OPA.

There is no doubt that Congress has paved the way for an inflation that will make the average worker's wages worth less and less as each month goes by. Actually, the real authority over price control has been shifted from the OPA to Secretary of Agriculture Clinton Anderson, who for 3 years has been the willing tool of the dairy trust, the food processors, and the meat packers in pushing for higher and higher prices. The new OPA extension act not only protects profits but increases them. The answer to that comes out in higher prices.

It is this matter of higher prices and declining purchasing power of the American people that will resound as a campaign issue. Next November you'll be hearing a lot about whose fault it is.

Before the baloney starts getting sliced next November, it might be appropriate to review here what happened to the OPA—and who did it.

The review begins on December 23, 1941, when the late President Roosevelt worked out an agreement between the Government, industry, and labor. That agreement was aimed at freezing wages, prices, and profits so that the war would not be fought for the purpose of creating a new set of billionaires. Out of that agreement came a three-point program, as follows: The War Labor Board would keep wages fixed, the OPA would keep prices frozen, and the new tax bill would recapture all excess profits.

That agreement was never kept.

Five months later—in May 1942—labor complained that it was the only one adhering to its promise. Wages had not risen but prices had. The cost of living already had gone up 15 percent. As a result of that complaint, it was agreed to increase wages 15 percent. That was the Little Steel formula. And it was further agreed that the line would be held at that point and that no further increases of either prices or wages would be allowed.

But that agreement was not kept either.

In October 1942, President Roosevelt asked for and got from the Congress the Economic Stabilization Act, which required all prices to be stabilized at the level of September 15, 1942. Prices which had gone beyond that level were to be rolled back. The law empowered the President to order this done and required him to carry it out.

That law was as completely ignored as if it had never been passed. Prices were neither rolled back nor held at the designated level. President Roosevelt never ordered its enforcement. And that provided the basis and the beginning of the present inflation which has been slowly tightening its grip on the throat of the people.

Leon Henderson was OPA Administrator at that time and blame for the rising prices and the nonenforcement of the law was placed on him. Labor had gotten pretty angry at Henderson. Just before he lost his job as OPA Administrator, he called a meeting of labor people in Washington and pleaded for their support. He wanted to remain as OPA Administrator. When the labor people asked why they should continue to back him, what had he done about holding prices down, Henderson replied that it was not his fault. He swore that from the day he was appointed he had been waiting for the green light from the White House to enforce the law—and it never came. Then Prentiss Brown succeeded Henderson, and the same thing happened. He also swore that his hands had been tied because the White House had failed to give him the green light to go ahead and enforce the law. Eventually, Chester Bowles took over.

Not a single one of the three OPA Administrators enforced the Economic Stabilization Act of 1942. Bowles has not even pretended to do so.

On the contrary, Bowles has consistently followed the policy of appeasing the war profiteers. Toward the end of 1943, your correspondent discovered that the OPA had secretly been making a series of war profit studies, showing that the war profits of middlemen were ranging from 400 to 1,000 percent above prewar levels.

When Justice published these revelations, what was the result? Bowles suppressed the war profits studies in order to appease the war profiteers who were angered by having the spotlight played on them.

In an interview with Bowles at that time, your correspondent asked him why he had ordered the suppression of the war profit studies. He said that if he hadn't done so, Congress would cripple the OPA.

So Bowles did it his way. And what happened? Congress has gone ahead and crippled the OPA anyway.

In the meantime, the interplay of wage and price factors has become so complicated that it is now almost impossible to disentangle them. In 1942, the line could have been held with fairness to everybody. Today, it is almost impossible to draw a line at any point without doing an injustice to somebody. Today, the inflationary spiral is moving so fast that it would require heroic measures to achieve the fairness and balance that it would have been easy to maintain in 1942.

Whose fault is it? That question is bound to come up in November.

Here, in rapid summary, is the record.

From that record, it is fairly clear that the fault lies initially with the appeasement policies of the administration, of Chester Bowles and his predecessors in OPA. Secondarily, it is the fault of the kind of Congress we have. There are too many representatives of profiteers and the profit-minded in Congress—and not enough representatives of the plain, hard-working people of the country.

And, come next November, don't let any weasel-word artists kid you out of this plain truth.

Library Demonstration Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I include the following column by Malvina Lindsay on the library demonstration bill, introduced by me in the House and by Senator HILL in the Senate. This column appeared in the Washington Post of July 11, 1946:

RACE AGAINST IGNORANCE

(By Malvina Lindsay)

FOUR-YEAR PLAN

Can mass production of knowledge, now needed more urgently than motor cars or refrigerators, be stepped up?

Can approximately 80,000,000 American adults and near adults be informed sufficiently to make the grave decisions on public affairs they face in the next 5, 10, or 20 years?

One attempt to answer this is the effort to get more funds, Federal and State, spent on education. Another is the widespread campaign organizations and individuals are carrying on to prepare Americans for their greater public responsibilities. Still another is the library demonstration bill now in Congress.

Representative EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS, of Illinois, who introduced the bill in the House, Senator LISTER HILL, of Alabama, introduced it in the Senate, was led to do so after pondering the question: Would history have been different after World War I if the American people had had greater access to knowledge?

An ardent campaign for disarmament and international cooperation was carried on immediately after the other war. But not enough solid effort was put into inciting people to think for themselves—and to keep on thinking. Representative DOUGLAS, who still remembers with a shudder the regimented chant of Hitler's youth she heard in Germany in the late 1930's, was determined that oncoming Americans should be encouraged to use their own minds, and should have information on which to whet their thinking.

She discovered that in 1920, about 60,000,000 Americans—57 percent of the populace—had no access to public libraries. But she also found out that today there are still 35,000,000 Americans—one-fourth of the entire population—to whom public reading services are not available, and that more than 600 counties (about one in five) are without a single public library. What a threat that had held for democratic government, dependent on public opinion.

Yet it was evident that Americans were hungry for books. In the last 16 years the use of books in 6,000 public libraries in the United States had doubled, and in many libraries books were being worn out faster than they could be replaced. Librarians no longer had to advertise their wares and lure the public. First the depression and then the war had turned a people toward its free libraries, sent them seeking light from wiser minds on the problems they faced.

The library service bill provides for a 4-year library demonstration project, with Federal aid enabling States to take library services to citizens in need of them. The project will function as a laboratory for studying needs and methods for possible services in the future. A cooperating State will receive a minimum aid of $25,000 a year, and up to an additional $50,000 if it matches that amount.

State libraries will conduct the service according to their own plans, which might include branch libraries in villages or country stores, traveling bookmobiles for rural areas, documentary films for churches and farmers' meetings, books for the bedridden, story hours for children, book discussion groups for adults.

A Senate Subcommittee on Education and Labor thought so highly of the bill following its hearings on it that it extended the service provision from 4 to 5 years, and raised the maximum Federal aid to $75,000. The House Committee on Education, which has had the bill since March, has not yet held hearings.

That many Americans today are as zealous for books as was young Abe Lincoln has been demonstrated in those States that have taken library service to remote areas. The spread of rural electrification has also increased the demand for books, as has been evidenced in the seven TVA States.

Naturally it is not expected that people having their first contact with libraries will start in reading about politics and economics. The greatest demand is for the self-help books, as those on cooking, nutrition, canning, health, homemaking, farming, child care, and hobbies. Westerns, detective stories, and romances are always in demand. But occasionally a novice reader takes to the classics, or to books on science and politics.

As these readers are increasingly exposed to books, their tastes usually expand, their interests enlarge. They are less likely to make their decisions by instinct and prejudice. Some of them may even develop into community leaders—if not Abe Lincolns.

Terminal-Leave Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of July 11, 1946:

TERMINAL-LEAVE PAY

There can be no quarrel on grounds of equity with the bill to pay veterans $2,750,000,000 in terminal-leave pay. Up to this time such payments have been made to officers, but not to enlisted men. Certainly this is an area where full equality of treatment is desirable. The major criticism of this proposal has been that the addition of such a large volume of cash, as approved by the House of Representatives, would add substantially to the inflationary pressures at a time when they are already intense. In this connection, it will be recalled that the payment of the 1936 bonus to veterans of the First World War was reflected in a short-lived boom in business activity.

The proposal by the Senate Military Affairs Committee that these payments should be made in 5-year nonnegotiable interest-bearing Government bonds helps to overcome the inflation argument. While it is undoubtedly true that some veterans have immediate and pressing needs to meet, the addition of such a large volume of spending inevitably would raise prices still further. Such a price increase would reduce the purchasing power or the real value of the payments received. It also would affect adversely and severely many other veterans who are living on pensions and who would not benefit from these new payments.

Undoubtedly the receipt of these bonds will induce greater spending by some veterans, but there will be a small offset because of the inclusion of officers in the plan, with the consequent reduction in the net spendable income they receive upon leaving the service. By deferring the payments and spreading them over several years the impact upon the price level will be reduced and the veteran will be assured of obtaining more real goods and services for his money than otherwise would be the case.

Another Mission to Moscow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Washington Star of Sunday, July 7, 1946:

COMMERCE OFFICIALS REACH SOVIET WITH WALLACE TRADE PLANS

Moscow, July 6.—Two United States Commerce Department officials arrived here today to present to the Russian Government Secretary Wallace's proposals for a stabilized import-export trade between the two countries which may total $500,000,000 annually by 1950.

E. C. Ropes, chief of the Soviet Union Division of the Commerce Department, and Lewis Lorwin, departmental economist, who will remain here for 60 days, said a healthy trade could be carried on between the two nations regardless of the fate of the American-Soviet loan proposal.

The pair will meet Monday with the Russian ministry of trade.

Mr. Ropes said the Commerce Department believed that, because of the postwar needs of the two countries, contracts could be drawn providing for American exports to Russia totaling up to $400,000,000, while Russia exports to the United States should amount to $100,000,000 annually.

"We can offer them machinery and industrial 'know-how,'" Mr. Ropes said. "They can offer us all kinds of raw materials."

"Right now," he added, "the United States is getting furs and such things as horse manes and tails and Arctic hare hair. We could use more of such things as timber, pulpwood, chromite, and manganese."

Present trade under the 1935 commercial agreement, Mr. Ropes said, amounted to $113,000,000 in United States exports to Russia during the first 3 months of 1946, while Russia during the same period sent to the United States $31,000,000 in goods, mostly furs.

American exports at the present rate would total about $500,000,000 yearly, but Mr. Ropes said this current figure was due to a backlog of $280,000,000 in nonmilitary orders placed during the war years. New commercial contracts will have to be written this year or the total will drop sharply, he said.

It should be noted that lumber and pulp imports to the United States from Russia are to be encouraged by the United States Department of Commerce.

Up to this time imports to the United States from Russia consisted largely of furs. Wisconsin produces 60 percent of the fur of the United States.

It is now reported that the so-called "World Economic Conference," where a few men were to sit around a table and give away American jobs and American markets, has been postponed until after the fall elections.

Inflation is one problem, but if the plans of Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Commerce, are carried out, consideration had better be given to the consequences to the hourly wage rates and jobs of the people in this country working in the pulp and paper mills and the pottery- and glass-manufacturing establishments.

Under legislation enacted last year, President Truman was delegated the power to reduce the duties on imports by 50 percent. Members of Congress who supported that legislation might well check with the pulp- and paper-mill workers and the glass and pottery workers, as well as the other millions of American workers in other industries to obtain the results of this reduction of import duties.

In 1939 over 10,000,000 Americans were without jobs and other millions had only part-time jobs. What wealth has been added to the national resources of our country since that time or what conditions warrant the consideration of additional imports of commodities to compete with American labor?

Servants at Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES G. FULTON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, it is a sincere and real pleasure today to ask unanimous consent of the House of Representatives to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the president's address entitled "Servants at Law," delivered by John G. Buchanan, Esq., the honored president of the Pennsylvania Bar Association, a member of the Allegheny County bar from Pittsburgh, given before the annual convention of the association at Atlantic City, N. J., on June 27, 1946.

We in Pittsburgh are proud of our eminent counselors at law and hold in high esteem the recent presidents of the Pennsylvania Bar Association from Pittsburgh, John G. Buchanan, as well as Gifford King Wright, my former partner, who have contributed so much through the association to the raising of all legal standards.

May I point out to the Congress by way of introduction and emphasis, a point made by this eminent jurist in his address, namely, that—

In the case of the new World Court, as in the case of the old, only two great powers have failed up to the present time to submit themselves to the jurisdiction—Russia and the United States. Are we to follow the precedent of Russia rather than that of Great Britain, France, Canada, Australia, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway? Besides, who knows but that evidence on the part of the United States of a peaceful disposition and a desire to settle controversies by legal judgments rather than by force of arms may not be the means of bringing Russia into wholehearted cooperation with the other members of the family of nations?

More than 100 years ago Alfred Tennyson asked a question which we have still to answer:

"Ah, when shall all men's good
Be each man's rule, and universal peace
Lie like a shaft of light across the land,
And like a lane of beams athwart the sea,
Thro' all the circle of the golden year?"

In this brief address I shall relate the stories of three epochal efforts of lawyers to meet the challenge of the question. Two of them were successful and one hangs in the balance.

I

There was doubtless a time when the good old rule sufficed our ancestors—

"The simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can."

But in Britain that time must have been more than 1,300 years ago, after the last Roman legions had left the island in 407 and before the earliest Anglo-Saxon code of which we have record, that of Aethelbert, King of Kent, was promulgated about the year 600.

I shall not dwell on the methods of trial by ordeal of fire and ordeal of water, which were in vogue not only before but after the Norman Conquest, but content myself with referring to the wager of battle, which is believed to have been introduced into England by William the Conqueror in 1066. It was doubtless an improvement over the unregulated family feud, which probably preceded it and which existed in some parts of the United States within recent years. Was it not better for David to accept the challenge of Goliath than to have a thousand Hebrews and a thousand Philistines lose their lives in deciding the issue of the day?

In criminal cases the accused and the accuser had to fight in person, except in the case of men past 60 years of age, men who could plead mayhem (which, significantly, included the loss of front teeth), women, and, after 1176, when the benefit of clergy arose, clerics.

In civil cases a champion could be hired, and the business of the champion became a lucrative one, even though, in order to put in an appearance, it was commonly necessary for him to perjure himself by claiming to be a witness, or that his father on his deathbed bade him to bear witness, as to the truth of the cause.

It must be remembered that there were no lawyers in England when trial by battle originated. The Conqueror, however, brought with him so-called serjeants or servants of the King, and sometime during the Norman period an order arose, styled the serjeants of the king at law, servientes regis ad legem. From these servants at law were later recruited all the judges of the realm.

From Normandy had come to England also the inquest, a valuable part of the king's governmental system. Domesday Book was compiled out of verdicts of inquests. But it was not until the reign of Henry II, about a hundred years after the Conquest, that this institution was utilized as a means of deciding lawsuits. In this reign the assizes were "thought out and invented in many vigils," as the great Bracton said in the next century, and were legalized by royal ordinances. In the assizes, trial by jury instead of trial by battle could be had as a matter of right.

Circuit rolls in the reign of Henry III, selected at random by Pollock and Maitland, disclosed 81 cases determined by verdicts, two by other peaceful methods of trial, and none by wager of battle. The servants at law had done their work so well that the administration of justice according to the course of the common law, with negligible exceptions, has been peaceable and orderly for seven centuries.

II

Let us pass over six of those centuries. In 1786, 3 years after the treaty of peace by which the independence of the United States of America was recognized, John Jay wrote to Washington, "I am uneasy and apprehensive, more so than during the war." And a hundred years later John Fiske, the great historian, wrote ("Critical Period of American History," p. 65), "It is not too much to say that the period of 5 years following the peace of 1783 was the most critical moment in all the history of the American people." There were disputes about trade. There were even graver disputes about territory. Let it suffice to tell the story of one of them, as related by Fiske.

In 1782 a controversy between Pennsylvania and Connecticut as to the sovereignty over the Wyoming Valley was decided in favor of our State by a court of commissioners selected by lot from persons named by the Continental Congress. Two years later, during a great winter flood, when the settlers in the valley were starving, John Dickinson, President of Pennsylvania, urged the legislature to send relief. But the members of the legislature said that if the accursed Yankees had stayed in Connecticut, where they belonged, they would have kept out of harm's way, and the desolation of the valley was said to have been contrived by the Deity with the express object of punishing these trespassers. A scheme was devised for driving them out and partitioning their lands among a company of speculators. A force of militia was sent, ostensibly to assist in restoring order in the valley, but the soldiers stole what they could find, dealt out blows to the men and insults to the women, until their violence was met with violence in return. The militia then attacked the settlement, turned some 500 people out of doors, burned their houses to the ground, drove the wretched victims, many of them women, old men, and little children, into the wilderness at the point of the bayonet, and told them to find their way to Connecticut without delay. Many died of exhaustion or furnished food for wolves. The sheriff of Northumberland County was sent with a posse to protect the settlers. The commander of the militia disobeyed the sheriff and kept up a guerrilla warfare. All the Connecticut men flew to arms, and men were killed on both sides. A regiment was then sent from Philadelphia under Colonel Armstrong, who persuaded the Connecticut men to lay down their arms, assuring them that they should meet with no ill treatment and that their enemy should be disarmed also. But the Connecticut men were forthwith treated as prisoners, and 76 of them were handcuffed and thrown into jail at Easton or Northumberland. Great was the indignation in New England when these deeds were heard of. A war between Connecticut and Pennsylvania might easily have grown out of the matter, but was averted through a singular feature in the Pennsylvania constitution. The Council of Censors, which was assembled once in 7 years in order to inquire whether the State had been properly governed, held its regular meeting, engaged in a hot controversy with the legislature, and awakened public sympathy for the sufferers, so that the legislature finally disavowed the acts of the militia and ordered restitution to be made to the persecuted settlers from Connecticut.

Three years later the Constitutional Convention assembled in Philadelphia. I suppose that no other body of men of equal ability has ever met upon this continent. George Washington was there, and Benjamin Franklin, the two greatest Americans of their day. They were not lawyers, but the servants at law were there in large numbers. If my count is correct, 35 of the 55 delegates in attendance were members of the bar. Madison of Virginia, chief author of the large States plan; Paterson of New Jersey, author of the small States plan; Ellsworth and Sherman of Connecticut, proponents of the compromise which prevailed, all were lawyers. Every one of the 12 States represented sent at least one lawyer. Among them were Langdon of New Hampshire; King of Massachusetts; Hamilton of New York (one of the greatest lawyers that our country has ever produced); Wilson and Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania; Dickinson, once of Pennsylvania but now of Delaware; Luther Martin of Maryland, afterward leader of the bar of the United States, who opposed the adoption of the Constitution; Wythe and Randolph of Virginia; Alexander Martin of North Carolina; John Rutledge, Charles Cotesworth, and Charles Pinckney of South Carolina; Few of Georgia.

Nowhere was the handiwork of the servants at law in the Convention more notably successful than in article III, section 2, of the Constitution, which provides that the judicial power shall extend, among other cases, to controversies between two or more States, and that in cases in which a State shall be party the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. An examination of the United States Reports discloses no less than 65 cases where jurisdiction has been sustained in the Supreme Court in controversies between States from 1799 until the present years.

A large variety of subjects is dealt with in the cases between States: The title to land which had been the subject of grants by both parties; the determination of boundaries; compacts between the parties as to boundaries and bridges over boundary rivers; extradition; obstructions to navigation; the disposal of sewage; the use of water of streams; foreclosure on property held as security and judgment for the balance; the apportionment of a State debt between a mother State and a State carved out of its territory; interference with interstate commerce in natural gas; flooding; the domicile of a decedent for inheritance-tax purposes; the drainage of surface water; the drainage of the waters of the Great Lakes into the Mississippi; specific performance of a contract to build a bridge; the dumping of garbage into rivers. In short, matters involving health, property, obligations, sovereignty, disputes of almost every character have been submitted to the arbitrament of the Supreme Court in the exercise of a jurisdiction that is made mandatory on the States by the Constitution.

In 157 years of the history of the Government under the Constitution, war between the States, which was threatened in more than one instance before its adoption, has been averted except for a period of 4 years. The servants at law in the Constitutional Convention performed their function well.

III

Let us pass over another 130 years. The First World War is ended. The League of Nations is established. The Council of the League, in February 1920, invites 10 distinguished jurists to frame a plan for a World Court. Five of them are nationals of great powers and five are representatives of small nations. Among the former is Elihu Root, Secretary of War, Secretary of State, United States Senator, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, leader of the bar, soon to become the founder and honorary president of the American Law Institute.

The Committee of Jurists proposed to the League of Nations the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice, which was adopted by the League on December 13, 1920. The Court was given jurisdiction "in all or any of the classes of legal disputes concerning:

"(a) the interpretation of a treaty;

"(b) any question of international law;

"(c) the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;

"(d) the nature of extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation."

The fifteen members of the Court were to be elected by the Assembly and by the Council of the League from a list of persons nominated by the national groups in the Court of Arbitration at The Hague. If more than one national of a state should be elected, the eldest only should be considered as elected.

The great servants at law from 10 different nations constituting the Committee of Jurists offered to the world a tribunal by which disputes that nations could not settle amicably could be determined without recourse to war.

Fifty-seven states, including the United States of America, signed the protocol of the Court by their plenipotentiaries at various times from 1921 to 1936, and the governments of 50 of them ratified it and accepted the jurisdiction of the Court. All the great powers except Russia and the United States submitted themselves to its jurisdiction. The United States Senate voted in favor of ratification by 52 to 36, seven less than the requisite two-thirds, on January 29, 1935.

In spite of the fact that the United States failed to adhere to the Court or to contribute to its support, nominees of our country always sat among its members: John Bassett Moore, Charles Evans Hughes, Frank B. Kellogg, Manley O. Hudson.

This World Court rendered judgments in 32 cases, involving 24 nations, and gave advisory opinions to the Assembly or the Council of the League of Nations in about the same number of cases, in which a similar number of states were represented before the Court.

To take a few examples, the judgments of the Court dealt with the right of Germany to refuse access to the Kiel Canal to vessels of Great Britain and France; the liability of Bulgaria to Greece for acts committed outside Bulgarian territory; the liability of Great Britain as mandatory in Palestine for granting concessions which might cause loss to a Greek subject; the legality of expropriations by Poland of German property in Upper Silesia; the legality of criminal proceedings in Turkey against a Frenchman in connection with a collision on the high seas of a French steamer with a Turkish steamer; the interpretation of a German-Polish convention concerning schools; the payment in gold of Serbian and Brazilian loans issued in France.

I wish to emphasize that, just as in the case of the suits between States in the Supreme Court of the United States, all manner of questions affecting the sovereignty of the parties have been peaceably settled by the judgments of the World Court. In no case has the losing party failed to comply with the judgment.

The American Bar Association urged upon the San Francisco Conference that the United Nations should adopt the Permanent Court of International Justice as its judicial branch. The Conference did not do so in form, but in substance chapter XIV of the Charter of the United Nations, establishing the new International Court of Justice, follows almost exactly the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice. The 51 nations which signed the Charter by its terms became ipso facto parties to the Statute of the International Court.

The Charter was ratified by the Senate of the United States last July, with only two negative votes. It became effective on October 26 last. The judges of the Court have been elected by the Assembly and the Council of the United Nations. Among them is the Honorable Green H. Hackworth, legal adviser to the Department of State of the United States. Seven European countries, including Russia, Great Britain, and France, one Asiatic country, one African country, and six American countries are represented in the Court. The President of the earlier Court, Señor Guerrero, of Salvador, has been elected President. Declarations by Great Britain, France, Canada, in fact by a large majority of the United Nations, have been filed which recognize as compulsory the jurisdiction of the Court in relation to any other member of the United Nations. Senator MORSE has introduced a resolution to recognize the jurisdiction of the Court as compulsory for a period of 5 years in relation to any other state accepting the same obligation, and Congressman HERTER has introduced a joint resolution to a like effect in the House of Representatives. The State Department has expressed the opinion that either measure would furnish a satisfactory legal basis for acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court. The President has expressed himself as in favor of the principle of the resolutions. Why, then, do not the Foreign Relations Committees of the two Houses report the resolutions? There is every reason to suppose that they would be passed by large majorities.

In the case of the new World Court, as in the case of the old, only two great powers have failed up to the present time to submit themselves to the jurisdiction—Russia and the United States. Are we to follow the precedent of Russia rather than that of Great Britain, France, Canada, Australia, Belgium, The Netherlands, Norway? Besides, who knows but that evidence on the part of the United States of a peaceable disposition and a desire to settle controversies by legal judgments rather than by force of arms may not be the means of bringing Russia into wholehearted cooperation with the other members of the family of nations?

The American Bar Association at its meeting in Cincinnati last December and this association at its meeting at Hershey in January adopted resolutions strongly urging the President and the Senate to take appropriate action at the earliest practicable time to deposit a declaration recognizing as compulsory for 5 years the jurisdiction of the Court in relation to any other state accepting the same obligation, without prejudice to the right of the parties to have timely recourse to other methods for the peaceable settlement of disputes. No action of these associations, no action on the part of any body of lawyers, can be more timely than this or should command more fully the support and influence of members of the bar.

Most disputes between individuals can be settled out of court, but if there were no court to which they could appeal, could their disputes be settled without violence? Most disputes between nations can be settled out of court, but if there is no court to which they can appeal, can their disputes be settled without war?

Nearly eight centuries ago servants at law substituted trial by jury for trial by battle in the settlement of disputes between subjects of the realm and between the king and his subjects. More than a century and a half ago servants at law substituted trial by the Supreme Court of the United States for interstate fighting and incipient anarchy. Shall not servants at law prevail now in substituting the arbitrament of the International Court of Justice for the "arbitrament of swords" between nations? It is as true now as it ever was, that "all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." By the substitution of trial by jury for trial by battle, "the doubtful event of the duel" and "the severe punishment of an unexpected and premature death * * * or at least the opprobrium of a lasting infamy" were avoided. By the substitution of trial by the International Court of Justice for war will be avoided the premature deaths not merely of champions but of millions of innocent noncombatants.

The verdict of a jury may be wrong, but it is to be accepted rather than the verdict of a duel. The judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States may be wrong, but it is to be accepted rather than civil war. The judgment of the International Court of Justice may be wrong, but it is to be accepted rather than a world war of atomic bombs. Let us awake, "stretch every nerve, and press with vigor on" to bring about submission to the jurisdiction of that Court. There can be no peace and order in the world if the greatest nations are exempted from the power of the law of nations.

Resolution of American Flint Glass Workers' Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Whereas thousands of our members have been deprived of their opportunities for much-needed employment and additional thousands are threatened with loss of their jobs, due to a lack of soda ash, an essential raw material used in the production of glassware; and

Whereas this condition, we understand, is due to the use by the Department of the Interior of its governmental misuse of having first call on the only available supply of soda ash, that which is under the control of the War Assets Administration; and

Whereas this soda ash, acquired by the Department of the Interior, supposedly for governmental use, is not used by or for the Government but has been turned over to glass manufacturers in Puerto Rico; and

Whereas we believe this to be a direct and brazen misuse of the authority in the law, which has for its plain purpose and intent the granting to governmental agencies of first call on goods or articles under control of the War Assets Administration for governmental use: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the American Flint Glass Workers' Union of North America, in convention assembled, vigorously protest against a continuation of such a brazen perversion of the privilege granted to the Department of the Interior to acquire Government surplus stores of soda ash, and we insist that such stocks of soda ash now in the control of the Department of the Interior and of the War Assets Administration not to be used directly for governmental use be made available to the American glass manufacturers so badly in need of this material that their plants have closed down or are threatened with having to close down; and such necessary stocks of soda ash made available to these glassware manufacturing plants will provide thousands of much-needed jobs for our members; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be telegraphed to Hon. John Krug, Secretary of the Interior; Hon. Lewis Schwellenbach, Secretary of Labor; Hon. Rohn Small, Director of Civilian Production Board; Hon. John Steelman, Director, Stabilization and Reconversion; Hon. Harry S. Truman, President of the United States; Administrator of War Assets Administration, Hon. Louis E. Graham; Hon. JOHN TABER; Hon. R. B. WIGGLESWORTH; and Hon. THOMAS A. JENKINS, all Washington, D. C.

Twelve OPA Regulations and 325 Amendments on Meat and Livestock

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, recently I heard a speaker say that OPA had issued 12 regulations on meat and more than 100 amendments. I was inclined to discount the story until I got a letter from a small packing plant saying that it was impossible to operate their business and keep up with changes in the law. So I wrote the Office of Price Administration and asked them to give me a list of the price regulations which had been issued and the number of amendments thereto.

To my surprise I find that there had been issued since the fall of 1942 nine regulations at the wholesale level with 204 amendments.

At the retail level three regulations had been issued with a total of 96 amendments.

In addition to this there have been regulations on live hogs and live cattle with a total of 25 amendments thereto.

With the permission of the House, I place in the RECORD the letter from the Office of Price Administration. People have been perplexed by the absence of meat and they will be interested in seeing how complicated is the problem of regulations as indicated by this statement:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1946.
The Honorable FRANCIS CASE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CASE: In your letter of June 8 you asked for the number of meat regulations which have been issued and the number of amendments to each.

Since the fall of 1942, when specific dollar-and-cents ceilings were written on meat products, the following price regulations have been issued:

RMPR 148: Dressed hogs and wholesale pork cuts; number of amendments, 34.

RMPR 169: Beef and veal carcasses and wholesale cuts; number of amendments, 72.

RMPR 239: Lamb and mutton carcasses and wholesale cuts; number of amendments, 26.

RMPR 156: Canned meats; number of amendments, 13.

MPR 286: Certain sausage products for war procurement agencies; number of amendments, 8.

MPR 389: Ceiling prices for certain sausage products at wholesale; number of amendments, 25.

MPR 398: Variety meats and edible by-products at wholesale; number of amendments, 15.

MPR 334: Rabbits; number of amendments, 3.

Note.—Rabbits have been decontrolled, and this regulation is no longer in effect.

MPR 367: Horsemeat; number of amendments, 8.

The above meat price regulations are at the wholesale level. In addition to these, we have the following retail meat price regulations:

MPR 336: Retail ceiling prices for pork cuts and certain sausage products, number of amendments, 33.

MPR 355: Retail ceiling prices for beef, veal, lamb, and mutton; number of amendments, 38.

MPR 394: Retail ceiling prices for kosher beef, veal, lamb, and mutton; number of amendments, 22.

In addition to the above regulations affecting meat, we have in effect MPR 469 (live hogs) and MPR 574 (live bovine animals). These regulations set prices on live hogs and live cattle and calves. The live-hog regulation has 20 amendments, and the live-cattle regulation 5 amendments.

In the case of most of the regulations, the order first provided for specific prices on the basic commodities. As additional information was obtained we issued amendments to set dollar-and-cents prices on additional items. However, most of the amendments to the regulation have been issued to provide price changes, particularly with reference to Government purchases, or to make adjustments as new situations arose. In issuing these amendments we have attempted to keep our regulations on a workable basis and provide as little hardship as possible to the industry. In many instances the number of amendments could have been reduced had we postponed action on certain items until several changes were necessary. This would, however, have caused hardship to particular operators, consequently, amendments were issued as the need arose.

This office has in effect, in addition to the price regulations listed, control order 2, a regulation which places certain limitations on the volume of slaughter. This regulation has one amendment.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL A. PORTER,
Administrator.

An Open Letter to Mr. Attlee by Philadelphia Jewish Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

JULY 10, 1946.

The Right Honorable CLEMENT R. ATTLEE,
Prime Minister of Great Britain,
London, England.

DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER: This letter concerns British policy with respect to Palestine. It is about a serious moral and humanitarian issue on which millions of Americans, Jews and Christians alike, now have a very strong opinion. So strong is this opinion and so disturbed are these Americans that only an immediate change in British policy, proclaimed not by mere words but by definite action within the next several days, will prevent serious damage to Anglo-American economic relations.

This newspaper is a responsible publication. We are liberal and progressive, but certainly not radical or extremist. Our readers represent a good cross section of Philadelphia Jewry, the third largest Jewish community in the United States. We have carefully considered the contents of this letter for a long time. It is our honest belief that it is exactly the kind of letter practically all of our readers would like to send you, except that most of them would be less temperate in their language.

We will speak plainly and straight from the shoulder. Our State Department would write according to protocol; not we or our readers. We don't know how and we don't care to know.

As official head of a professedly democratic goverment, you should be interested in what people think. As Prime Minister of a country which depends so much, in war and in peace, upon American support, you owe your country the duty of listening to us.

We Americans like the British people, but we don't like the Government it has chosen. If the British people suffer from our hostile response to some of the policies and actions of that Government, let the people call its Government to account.

We don't like the long line of broken pledges to the Jews made by Great Britain with reference to Palestine.

We didn't like the way your Labor Party lost no time, as soon as it came into power in 1945, breaking its solemn pledge on Palestine embodied in its many strong pro-Zionist resolutions and in its party platform.

We don't like your Government's cruel and murderous policy of do-nothing for the "liberated" Jews stagnating to death in the concentration camps of Europe. We didn't like your rejection of President Truman's humanitarian request that 100,000 refugee Jews be permitted to enter Palestine at once and your stalling counter-proposal that an Anglo-American Committee be appointed to investigate a situation to which all the world except you and your Government knew the answer.

We don't like the brazen manner in which you and your Government have refused to accept the unanimous recommendation of your committee for immediate admission of 100,000 displaced Jews into Palestine, after the British Foreign Minister, Mr. Bevin, had assured members of the committee that their recommendations would be implemented forthwith if they would be unanimous. We didn't like Mr. Bevin's recent vulgarity.

But now we are horrified and shocked beyond human endurance at the brutal and cowardly war which your Government declared on the Jews of Palestine at dawn of the Jewish Sabbath on June 29, 1946. Just as the villainous Japs suddenly attacked Pearl Harbor on Sunday, December 7, 1941, when the Christian Sabbath was being observed, so you had your "brave" soldiers strike on the Jewish Sabbath, which is legally recognized in Palestine as a day of rest.

Your D-day, Mr. Attlee, will live in infamy, too. Does it reassure you of British strength to know that your men were able to batter and force 71-year-old Rabbi Judah L. Fishman, acting chairman of the Jewish Agency Executive, to desecrate the Sabbath by entering a car on that day? Are you reassured by the brutal Gestapo methods used by your military on the members of the Jewish agency and on the Jews of Palestine? Do you really think the world will accept your ludicrous explanation of alleged necessity for these actions?

We pray and hope that Haganah and all members of the Jewish Resistance Movement in Palestine, which includes every able-bodied Jew there, will have the strength—we know they have the courage—to teach you and the British Government a much needed lesson.

We Americans behold with horror and disgust your Nazi-like, contemptible actions. We feel a moral indecency and a sense of shame in continuing our various associations with you and the rest of the British Government. World security requires that our two nations continue political and diplomatic relations. But it does not prevent us from trying to preserve our own self-respect and dignity of spirit by using every moral and economic sanction we know to make you change your course. Mere protests are not enough.

Accordingly, by publication of this open letter, we call upon all liberty-loving Americans who believe that this is really one world, in which we ourselves become personally contaminated by the British disease now devastating Palestine and threatening the world to demand postponement of the British loan, and boycott all British made goods, until your Government reverses its present policy in Palestine.

We realize that we may benefit economically by the proposed loan to your country. But how can we expect this loan to be paid back by a government whose pledged word seems so worthless? Remember also that much of this American money was contributed by the millions of us who do not wish to support with our money an anti-Semitic and barbarous government. We can't sell our soul and self-respect for economic profit.

We have already communicated this demand to our Representatives in Congress. We urge others to do likewise. And if Congress does approve the loan we trust that the President will withhold his approval of it until your government changes its Palestine policy.

And until your policies do change we will boycott. Whenever we see a label "Made in England" we will remember that betrayal of Zionist hopes, murder of thousands of European Jews by exclusion from Palestine, and the infamous day, June 29, 1946, were also "Made in England."

Very truly yours,

THE PHILADELPHIA JEWISH TIMES.

Labor Disputes and Their Solution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the old adages, "Too many cooks spoil the broth" and "Absentee ownership is a curse," might well be kept in mind by the parties to labor disputes.

Knowing nothing of the merits of the two situations referred to in the news articles hereinafter quoted, nevertheless commit the unpardonable political sin of referring to a situation which I might well ignore, thus saving myself some opposition in the coming November election, but which nevertheless points so clearly to a needed amendment of the National Labor Relations Act that I just cannot refrain from stating the facts.

From the South Haven (Mich.) Tribune of July 5, 1946, comes the news story of some 300 employees of the S. E. Overton Co., who have been on strike since May 15, and whose union had demanded arbitration but refused to arbitrate when the company finally agreed to arbitration.

The president of the company, according to the press, stated that such refusal made it necessary for the company to consider one of three moves. I quote from the statement:

1. Transfer of equipment to one of its affiliated plants out of town.

2. Close down indefinitely.

3. Or reopen the plant here for all employees who wish to return to work.

He said:

"The amount of wage increase and the date it is to take effect are the two issues keeping us all from going back to work.

"After union and company officials failed to reach agreement, the United States Department of Labor Conciliation Service recommended submitting these issues to a Government arbitrator to be named by the United States Wage Stabilization Board, the decision to be binding on the company and the union.

"The company agreed (June 25) to the Department of Labor proposal.

"The union (Local 273) at their meeting Wednesday night, July 3, voted against arbitration.

"The company has made every effort toward fair negotiation and a just settlement of our differences. We will continue these efforts and will meet with the union committee at any time."

The same issue of the same paper carried the following editorial:

WHY KILL THE GOOSE WHEN WE WANT EGGS?

The A. F. of L. union at the Overton plant Wednesday night voted against submitting its dispute with the company to impartial arbitration. After having closed the plant for 5 weeks by a strike, the union caused the company to offer to submit to binding arbitration. That was a bitter pill for any company to swallow. The unwillingness of the union to now arbitrate smacks of cockiness and a determination to humiliate the company. It isn't a pleasing spectacle. Why should the union hesitate to submit its case to a Government arbitrator? Hasn't it any faith in the fairness of its demands?

We feel fairly certain that the men had a reasonable case for a substantial increase in wage rates. Before the company offered to arbitrate it had proffered an increase of 15 cents an hour. The union held out for 18 cents. They were not so very far apart. The question of retroactive pay was at issue, and neither side would budge. Both of these points at issue could be satisfactorily settled by arbitration.

In the meantime hundreds are out of work. A fine industrial plant which should be a big asset to any city is paralyzed. It doesn't make sense. The ruination of the S. E. Overton Co. is not a proper objective for the union to pursue. The securing of a living wage, and a little more besides, is a laudable endeavor. The direction in which the union is now drifting is killing the goose that lays the eggs. Why kill the goose when we want eggs?

We'd like to see the head of the international union journey here from Indianapolis and give his boys and girls some mature advice.

From the Sturgis (Mich.) Journal of the same day. I quote the following:

DARLING CO. CLOSES DOWN PERMANENTLY

BRONSON, July 5.—The H. A. Darling Manufacturing Co. has announced that its plant here, which has been closed by a strike since April 10, will be shut down permanently and nearly 300 strikers find themselves without jobs.

However, the administrative office work of the plastic division in Coldwater will be continued in the plant's office here.

The strike was called nearly 3 months ago when the CIO-UAW demanded a closed shop and a flat 18.5-cent increase for all employees. The management had offered to increase the employees' pay, but on a sliding scale; that is, different rates for different types of work. The union rejected the plan repeatedly, and after the management made a public explanation of all of the facts involved, it announced that the plant will remain closed.

The picketers are still on duty and must remain at their posts until the State CIO board gives them permission to cease picketing.

Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in calling attention to these two situations is to point out that, in each case, it is more than probable that, if the men and women who actually work in these two plants were not influenced by outside propaganda; if they were free from pressure exerted by international organizers, by men who live in other communities, and if a secret ballot had been taken, a settlement might long ago have been reached which would have been satisfactory to the management and stockholders of the company, to the members of the union.

South Haven is a comparatively small city. Bronson is still smaller. Industrial strife is not conducive to progress or prosperity. Where workers own their own homes, as many of them do in these two cities, and where employment is limited, every possible step should be taken to settle labor disputes, prevent controversies.

I know nothing of the ability of the Overtons or of the stockholders in their company or of the owners of the Bronson plant to go on vacation or to live in comfort without further business profits during the remainder of their lives, but it may be assumed that the closing of either factory will have a less drastic effect upon the stockholders and the management, than it will have upon those who are dependent for their livelihood upon the continuation of a job.

In my humble opinion, the National Labor Relations Act should be amended so as to insure to local unions exclusive control over the right to begin or to end a strike; to bargain collectively through agents of their own choosing.

Local unions should be free of the arbitrary orders and regulations of an international union controlled by someone or by some group of officials who do not live in the community, who own no property there, who have no personal stake in the question of whether industry continues to exist or whether it goes out of business.

An amendment to the National Labor Relations Act, giving local unions complete jurisdiction over their own local affairs, will be pressed by me in the coming days of Congress.

Issuance of Plate and Die Proofs of Postage Stamps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the several million citizens of this Nation who collect postage and revenue stamps either as a hobby or as a livelihood feel that they do not have equal protection under present laws with their fellow collectors of coins and medals.

The Essay Proof Society, on behalf of a number of groups of philatelists, urges the enactment of a corrective measure to bring the issuance of plate and die proofs of governmental printings into conformance with the issuance of proof coins and medals, and in conformance with the best international practice governing such collectors' items.

Pursuant to this aim, I have today introduced a resolution which reads as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized to furnish and issue to the public at the Philatelic Agency of the Post Office Department full-size die proofs and plate proofs in approved design and color on white paper different from regulation stamp paper, of postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards issued during the calendar year of issue only, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

2. The cost of manufacture of such die proofs and plate proofs shall be paid from the proceeds of such public sales, and prices shall be fixed at face value plus a service charge to be determined by the Postmaster General.

3. An annual detailed account shall be kept and published in the Annual Report of the Postmaster General of all proofs printed, of all delivered to the Philatelic Agency of the Post Office Department, and of all proofs sold or destroyed by the Philatelic Agency. All profit accruing from the sale of proofs, after reserving a fund sufficient to cover the manufacture and sale costs, shall be paid into the general fund of the Post Office Department.

4. Experimental essays or proofs of proposed designs or paper for new postage stamps for official use may be printed upon written request of the Postmaster General for a specific number of proofs in the colors desired. Experimental essays or proofs in designs and colors not approved by the Postmaster General shall not be sold, nor shall they be evidence of prepayment of postage. A statement of the number and colors of experimental essays and proofs printed, with the identification of the subject and face value of the designs, shall be kept and published in the Annual Report of the Postmaster General.

5. All previous laws conflicting with the purpose of this resolution shall, upon the passage thereof, be rendered null and void.

Resolution Condemning Statement of Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin, of Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 27, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the Council of the City of New York, June 25, 1946:

Resolution 188

Resolution condemning statement of Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin, of Great Britain

Whereas Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin, of Great Britain, is reported in the public press as having made the following statement: "Regarding the agitation in the United States, and particularly New York, for 100,000 Jews to be put into Palestine, I hope it will not be misunderstood in America if I say, with the purest of motives, that that was because they did not want too many of them in New York"; and

Whereas the city of New York has a population of approximately 8,000,000 persons who, or whose ancestors, came to the United States of America from various parts of the world to escape persecution and enjoy the blessings of liberty; and

Whereas these peoples from many lands and of many races and religions have dwelt in harmony, peace, and contentment; and

Whereas the demand that a Jewish Commonwealth be established in Palestine is not confined to New York City, nor is it based upon the fact that "they did not want too many of them in New York," but, on the contrary, the establishment of a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine is and has been the desire of all of the people throughout the United States, as evidenced by the following facts:

1. In March 1919 President Wilson stated: "The Allied Nations, with the fullest concurrence of our Government and people, are agreed that in Palestine shall be laid the foundations of a Jewish commonwealth."

2. In 1922 the Congress of the United States unanimously adopted a joint resolution approving the Jewish National Home pledge.

3. In 1924 the Anglo-American Convention set out in full the terms of the mandate for Palestine, and recorded American assent to British administration in Palestine subject to those terms.

4. In the 1944 Presidential campaign the two major parties adopted planks favoring the opening of Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization and, in the words of the Democratic platform, "such a policy as to result in the establishment there of a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth."

5. On October 15, 1944, the late President Roosevelt, speaking of the establishment of Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth, made the following statement:

"I am convinced that the American people give their support to this aim, and, if reelected, I shall help to bring about its realization."

6. On April 20, 1945, President Truman authorized the issuance of a statement that he intends to carry out President Roosevelt's policy in regard to Palestine, with which he is fully familiar.

7. Within the past 2 years, 33 States, representing 85 percent of the population of the United States, have, through resolutions of their State legislatures, gone on record in favor of the Zionist objective, and 40 State governors have joined in a petition to the President favoring the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish Commonwealth, all of which shows the unanimity of opinion of the people of the United States and their chosen representatives, and

Whereas in May 1945 the executive committee of the British Labor Party, which is Mr. Bevin's own party, issued the following statement: "There is surely neither hope nor meaning in a 'Jewish National Home' unless we are prepared to let Jews, if they wish, enter this tiny land in such numbers as to become a majority. There was a strong case for this before the war. There is an irresistible case now, after the unspeakable atrocities of the cold and calculated German Nazi plan to kill all Jews in Europe. * * * The Arabs have many wide territories of their own; they must not claim to exclude the Jew from this small area of Palestine, less than the size of Wales": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the council of the city of New York, the duly elected representative of 8,000,000 people residing therein, hereby denounces the utterances of Mr. Ernest Bevin and demand that he retract the statement made by him as aforesaid; and be it further

Resolved, That the council of the city of New York hereby request Mr. Bevin to take immediate action to preserve the honor and integrity of the British Empire and the British Labor Party by putting into effect the report of the Anglo-American Commission and by redeeming the aforesaid pledge of the British Labor Party; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin of Great Britain, the President of the United States of America, the Secretary of State, and Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate from the State of New York.

THE CITY OF NEW YORK,
Office of the City Clerk, ss:

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a resolution passed by the council of the city of New York on June 25, 1946, on file in this office.

Iowa Comments on OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, approximately 70 weekly newspapers published in the Eighth Congressional District of Iowa which I represent, reach my office each week. Since the demise of OPA, they have contained some very interesting comments relating to this subject. I am sure they reflect the sentiment of a large number of the people in my district. I have chosen the following clippings as being typical of the sentiments expressed and insert them herewith as a part of my remarks:

[From the Sioux City (Iowa) Journal]

AN OPA RESURRECTION

Bureaucrats in Washington, some of them in Congress, wish to perform a legislative miracle for the resurrection of the Office of Price Administration. Paul Porter, who succeeded Chester Bowles as the OPA director, has called upon Congress with, of course, the approval of the President, to draft another bill extending the agency for another year. If this were done as Mr. Truman wishes, with the provisions such as he wanted before when Congress passed the extender, he would sign it and commodity price control would be back.

There will be strong resistance in both Houses to a revived, or, rather, resurrected OPA. Senator BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, a Republican leader, already has indicated the minority party would oppose it. Mr. Porter had asked the Senate Appropriations Committee for $106,000,000 with which to operate the agency. Senator BRIDGES properly pointed out that this could not be done for the reason that OPA legally was dead and that no appropriation for it as a going concern could be made. The New Hampshire Senator is right. OPA no longer exists, and since it cannot operate it is in no need of funds. It is understood that the OPA machinery is being retained—it had an enormous staff, and perhaps Mr. Porter is making a plea to insure the salaries of personnel. Actually the only legitimate use of Government funds now in connection with the Office of Price Administration would be the payment of salaries due and settlement of such accounts as result from winding up the defunct agency's affairs.

The congressional effort to put through a resurrection bill is not justified in view of the Nation-wide sentiment in favor of control by business itself. Various business enterprises in many lines already have announced their policy as one of "holding the line." So far there has been nothing more than localized price increases, and if the line is held generally competition will take care of that.

The wise thing now seems to be for Congress and the administration to wait and watch developments before taking any further action on price control. If an untoward situation developed, or even threatened, Congress could act to meet the emergency and prevent hurtful inflation. Business, large and small, knows that could be and probably would be done, hence will act accordingly to hold down prices and get production under way for honest, competitive trade. Legislation for an OPA resurrection is not required in the circumstances. It is regrettable that Washington bureaucrats won't agree that the poor thing should be permitted to stay decently buried.

[From the Storm Lake (Iowa) Pilot-Tribune]

WHODUNIT?

Although rigor mortis has not yet set in, appearances indicate that the OPA is dead. Almost time to begin to establish the corpus delicti.

Who killed it? That promises to become a mystery as great as who killed Cock Robin.

Some will blame Congress for compromising on a law that many declare was unworkable. Others will blame President Truman for vetoing what his democratic advisers assured him was the best we will get. No one seriously blames Chester Bowles for resigning as OPA Director in a peeve. But there is a group that will put the finger on Congress for not overriding the President's veto.

Oh dear! Such a business!

So far as ye editor is concerned, he is willing to stick his neck out and prophesy that the killing of the Office of Peculiar Activities will in the long run be beneficial. For awhile we may have price jumps. The people will refuse to be stampeded into buying at exorbitant figures.

Then Old Man Competition will step in. Before we know it that greatest of all laws, supply and demand, will be doing its stuff. And you'll find business on a more even and satisfactory basis than it has been during bureaucratic bungling from inexperienced administrators at Washington.

The trouble with OPA has been that it has been regulated—if that is the right word to use—by those with little, if any, business experience. By men who never had to meet a pay roll on Saturday night. The problems of the employer who seeks to remain in business or of the employee who has to make both ends meet with his pay check are as remote to past OPA Administrators as the Einstein theory.

One straw in the ointment is the rapacious landlord. Storm Lake has not been under rent control—although many folks in The City Beautiful think it should have been for the protection of returning GI's and unfortunate renters.

But in the larger cities, owners of apartment houses and rental properties have taken advantage of the situation already. Shame on them! Governor Blue's proclamation that rents must not be increased is timely.

In the meantime, investigation shows that Storm Lake merchants are not going to gouge their customers. They's too smart to permit runaway prices to prevail in this community. They join with business concerns in other towns in holding the line as though OPA price control is still in effect.

We predict once more—within a short time business, no longer ham-strung by Government meddlers, will be back on a business basis where it ought to be!

[From the Spencer (Iowa) Times]

IT'S UP TO US

A cartoon appearing in the Washington, D. C. Star, Monday, summarized the chaos in Congress over the OPA in which Republicans and Democrats each are attempting to blame the other for the death of the OPA bill Sunday night. In the cartoon it showed Cock Robin OPA with his breast pierced by two arrows, one labeled compromise bill and the other veto.

President Truman, bow in hand, says to the quaking figure of John Q. Public, "Now do you know who killed Cock Robin?" "Not exactly, sir," says John Q. Public.

But in our opinion the bow should have been placed in the hands of John Q. Public with the cartoon showing him as having fired both arrows. For it was really the people of the United States rising in wrath over Washington bungling that actually sounded the death knell of Chester Bowles' OPA.

Just what will happen is a hard matter to predict at the moment. The American people have the greatest opportunity at their command since January 1932 to return to the American way of life without Government interference. Whether or not they will take advantage of that opportunity is a matter entirely in their own hands. If the greedy and avaricious boost prices out of reason then the protests of the average American citizen (not the crackpots and rabble rousers) will reach the ears of Congress and another price control bill will be passed.

However, we believe, that outside of the adjustments on prices which were entirely out of line to such an extent that the retailer or the jobber was losing money on the sale of the item but which had been held at that particular level to satisfy the PAC and the CIO, that prices will never sky-rocket out of reason. There will probably be a general rise and a period of readjustment but in the long run there will be nothing drastic.

The people of the United States prospered without price control before World War II and now that the war is over they should be able to continue in the same orderly manner, Mr. Bowles and his hosts would have us believe otherwise * * * but they have their jobs to maintain. (Had in the case of Mr. Bowles.)

We can see another trend coming to light in the congressional action that took place and in President Truman's veto of the OPA. That Congress and the President are beginning to learn to judge clearly between the mimeographed post cards and pseudo telegram messages drawn up enmass by the "special interests" group and given to their cohorts to distribute to non-thinking and the true messages coming from those who actually believe what they can write.

[From the Lyon County Reporter, Rock Rapids, Iowa]

ON ITS WAY OUT

Somewhere between the advocates of the OPA and those opposed to it lies truth. Truth as to whether it was holding up our progress or whether it has been the savior of the Nation.

Personally we believe that the OPA did a good job for a long time—and that then power went to the heads of some of its officials and they started acting like a bunch of unbridled despots. They seemed to think nothing of "fining" some small merchant from $50 on up for a minor violation, but the real black-market operators have gone right along and never seem to have been disturbed.

The OPA is not the American way. It was necessary for a long time; we hope that the need for its existence is past. The way things go from now on will tell the real story of OPA.

Now that Congress and the President have failed to agree on OPA legislation and the agency is dead—at least for the time—it is up to the American people to constitute and enforce by public opinion their own OPA.

No business can continue unless it has the support of the people. If you think some businessman is "clipping" you on price, don't buy. This is the quickest and the most efficient and the most satisfactory way to enforce price control. There isn't any question about that method—it is sure to work.

Revive OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, the rapid and unreasonable rise in prices of commodities and rents and the thousands of eviction notices served by landlords upon tenants since the price-control law expired on June 30, have been so drastic that people from every part of the country are crying for prompt reenactment of the price-control law that has expired.

The American people are fully aware that without some price control the economy of our Nation will be ruined within the next few years, and they can see coming an inflation that will reduce the value of their dollars to such a point that they will not be able to purchase the necessities of life. They realize that unless the value of the dollar is sustained so that they may purchase the commodities and other necessities producers and manufacturers will have to curtail their activities and thereby throw workers out of employment with the ultimate result that a severe depression will again be visited upon us.

I join with my many constituents in urging the Congress to take prompt action and enact into law an effective and workable price-control bill without delay.

I have received, like all of my colleagues have, a large number of communications on the subject of continued price control and an analysis of these communications show them to run about 40 to 1 in favor of price-control extension. I am submitting, as a part of these remarks and ask that they be printed herewith, three different petitions that have come to my office within the past few days and to which were attached 292 signatures.

I invite the attention of my colleagues to this urgent demand for prompt reenactment of an effective and workable price-control law:

To Our Representative of We, the People:

Since the long-anticipated and well-planned "kill" is on, and with chaos and financial disaster staring us straight in the face, we can no longer sit by while our "sincere" lawmakers have seen fit to discard OPA so as to give rent "gougers" and others the opportunity to overshadow the evils of the black market and plunge our country into a serious dilemma.

We, the undersigned, deem it necessary that immediate steps be taken to enact legislation to control prices of merchandise and rents, and to make this legislation retroactive to June 30, 1946.

Food and other necessary essentials are being hoarded awaiting high prices. We deem it necessary that you give immediate thought of plans to force supplies out of warehouses, Government seizure if necessary, pay the "gougers" a reasonable sum to release their merchandise, then allow goods on the market for public consumption.

As a Representative of we, the people, heed our complaints. They are well founded and evident. Discuss these serious matters among yourselves. Unless immediate steps are taken, our country will be in serious jeopardy.

The birth of a political party so completely radical may result in the breakdown of law and order. We earnestly do not wish for this to happen for the responsibility will be upon the shoulders of our political leaders. Our complaints do not stop with the death of OPA and runaway prices, etc.

We are well aware of the national, State, and town financial situation, and the existence of grafters and many political parasites. Our patience is limited. Our desire to progress is great. In plain language, we the people, ask "Our lawmakers, get your house in order." Our patience is beginning to wane. Do this before the effect of the poll is lost.

To Our Representative of We, the People:

We, the undersigned, emphatically demand that immediate legislative steps be taken to restore price and rent control. The elimination of OPA has clearly shown partiality towards small pressure groups and utter disregard for the welfare of the people as a whole.

We feel that inflation has been combatted successfully thus far, and we certainly do not intend to see our small savings, war bonds, life insurances, and so forth, shrink away through the lack of foresight on the part of legislators in this direction.

Manufacturers' inventories have been mounting and evident scarcity of commodities show that they are withholding goods from the market pending price increases. We urge that they be forced by governmental action to release their stores at once at fair prices. Strictest measures must also be taken against black market racketeers and their like to weed out these termites of our economic structure.

The fact that you are unaware of the people's feelings and opinions in these matters caused us to confront you with this criticism and we expect you to carry on the fight in our interest.

To Our Representative of We, the People:

Due to chaotic conditions developing since the expiration of OPA, we feel it necessary to call upon you, as our representative, to immediately pass legislation reinstating rent and price controls.

The seriousness of the price situation accentuated by the lack of homes, merchandise, and foods items available to the public leads us to further prompt that inventory stocks be forced out of warehouses through Government buying and resale if necessary.

We further feel that, unless immediate steps are taken to correct the present chaotic conditions, a new political party, which is foreign to our form of government, may spring into being. It is well within the imagination that by run-away inflation law and order may be seriously impeded.

As our representative in the Congress of the United States, it is our request that rent and price controls be reinstated immediately retroactive to midnight of June 30, 1946.

Report on Food Shipments for Famine Relief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARLE C. CLEMENTS
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call to the attention of the Members of the House a statement, which follows here, released today by the President of the United States expressing his gratification—and his thanks to the American people—over the fact that we as a Nation have made good to date and are current with our solemn pledge and humane obligation to the famine-stricken peoples of the world.

Following the President's statement is a detailed report submitted by the Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Clinton P. Anderson, covering the 1945–46 famine relief food shipment.

In my opinion, one item in this report is especially noteworthy: our original commitment to this program was 225,000,000 bushels of grain, which subsequently was revised upward to 400,000,000 bushels; the report shows that up to June 30, last, 401,000,000 bushels of grain were shipped overseas for famine relief.

Let us hope that this report will allay and put to shame the false and malicious rumors that a few irresponsible and thoughtless people have seen fit to spread regarding the inadequacy, and even failure, of the famine-relief program. This report should confound the critics, both at home and abroad, of this program:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

Every American can take pride in the record of accomplishment in shipping food for relief as shown in the attached report which I have received from Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson.

Only by cooperation and determined effort on the part of everyone has it been possible to make good on our promises—and, in the case of food grains, to exceed our commitments. The public generally, food producers and handlers, transportation companies, organizations, and Government agencies all have helped to make this impressive record possible.

Only by continued cooperation among all of us can we as a nation do our full share in the months to come to relieve the hunger that still exists in the world.

The importance of this effort in relieving human suffering and establishing world peace cannot be overestimated.

REPORT TO THE PRESIDENT ON 1945–46 FAMINE RELIEF FOOD SHIPMENTS BY CLINTON P. ANDERSON, SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, JULY 8, 1946

The United States exported more than 16,500,000 long tons of foodstuffs during the year which ended June 30. The great bulk of these shipments went to war-devastated countries were starvation threatened. These exports from the United States were by far the greatest contribution made to the world's hungry during this first year of reconstruction.

The 400,000,000-bushel bread grain export commitment for the year was met by June 30. Wheat and flour exports (10,336,000 tons), plus the corn and corn products shipped after May 1 from stocks acquired under the corn bonus plan, reached a total of 401,000,000 bushels.

Of the total bread grain exports, 5,556,000 tons were shipped from January 1 through June 30. In addition, enough wheat, flour, corn and corn products was at ports on July 1, ready for ship loading, to bring the total above the 6,000,000-ton (225,000,000 bushel) goal for the half-year period. This means that the full goal totals will have left our shores and be on the way to hunger areas as soon as ships can be loaded and cleared—probably by the middle of the month. During June alone, our bread grain exports totaled about 1,500,000 tons—a record for a similar period.

Meeting this full goal means actual shipment of 417,000,000 bushels for the year. The excess of 17,000,000 bushels above our commitments will not be deducted from the planned export of up to 250,000,000 bushels of wheat during the 1946–47 year.

The real extent of this accomplishment in grain export is brought out by the fact that the amount shipped is nearly double the original requirement for the year which was presented to the Combined Food Board a year ago. At that time, it was thought that we would be called upon to export only about 6,000,000 tons (225,000,000 bushels) for the entire year.

Adding rice, oats, rye, and barley to the "bread" grains of the specific commitments, brings the total of all grains exported during the year to 11,747,000 long tons—by far the largest volume in the total food shipments. Grains, high in calories per unit and easily handled, were the greatest need of the hungry nations.

Second in importance for relief and in the amounts shipped were fats and oils, dairy products, and meats. The totals for the year were: Dairy products, 764,000 tons; meats, 614,000 tons; and fats and oils, 356,000 tons.

In addition to these major commodities, a total of more than 3,200,000 tons of other foodstuffs were exported during the year. These exports included dry beans and peas, potatoes and sweet potatoes, fruits and vegetables, sugar, eggs, and canned fish.

Our great contribution in meeting world food shortages may be measured by the fact that of all food distributed from United States supplies in 1945–46, 1 out of every 6 pounds went overseas. By major commodity groups, we sent foreign countries more than 40 percent of the wheat that was distributed from our supplies during the year, more than 35 percent of the rice, more than 20 percent of the cheese, more than 10 percent of the fats and oils, and about 6 percent of the meat.

THE NEED

It is not necessary to review in detail the needs that prompted us as a country to carry through this tremendous world-feeding program. In your call for emergency action last February 6, and in many other messages, you, as President, outlined these needs clearly. We have all understood that the ravages of war left literally hundreds of millions of our fellowmen in very real danger of starvation. We have known that droughts cut down production in many parts of the world, increasing the demands upon those countries fortunate enough to have continued large crop production. And we have also known that hunger is a fertile ground for anarchy, and not for the building of a stable world and a durable peace.

COOPERATIVE EFFORT

It has been against this background of urgent need that this Government has driven through to reach export quotas. That they have been reached in practically all cases is a tribute to the teamwork of all groups involved. Our farmers not only produced record or near-record crops for one more year, but they also cooperated in getting wheat and other commodities to market when the emergency became acute. The processing, distribution, and transportation industries have all made magnificent records in handling the foodstuffs which were being shipped to foreign countries. Our consumers, seriously inconvenienced at times when their favorite foods disappeared from grocers' shelves, have in general accepted the situation with a minimum of complaint. They have known that the food they could not buy today was on its way to maintain life and health in some war-torn country.

While the Department of Agriculture has had the major responsibility for procuring the food, and for instituting many of the emergency measures which were necessary to make it available, the job could not have been done without the efficient cooperation of many other Government agencies. The Inter-Departmental Transportation Committee directed a coordinated effort which broke grain shipping records during recent weeks. Great credit is due the War Shipping Administration, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Office of Defense Transportation for the work they did in making transportation available. Your Famine Emergency Committee has suggested constructive over-all steps needed in the campaign effort, and has helped materially in informing the Nation of the urgent need for food from the United States.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

Many emergency measures and special regulations were necessary in order to meet our export commitments and complete the programs. The Department of Agriculture ordered set-asides for Government purchase of a number of commodities. It was necessary to limit the use of wheat and other grains in livestock feeding, and to limit the amount of flour available for human consumption. The special bonus programs for wheat and corn were necessary in order to get grain to market in time to meet shipping schedules.

CONTINUING NEEDS

While it can be reported that we are nearing the end of the most urgent crisis for this year, and, that the worst of the immediate dangers of famine have been forestalled, serious food needs abroad will continue for some time. Devastated countries cannot return to normal in a single year. When this year's harvests are completed for the northern hemisphere, we shall know a good deal more about the situation. In the meantime, we must continue relief shipments and be ready to meet at least the minimum future needs.

The Department of Agriculture has already announced that by continuing conservation and wise use of supplies at home up to 250,000,000 bushels of wheat can be made available for export during the 1946–47 year. Tentative plans are also being made for our shipments of other major commodities.

COMMODITY SHIPMENTS IN 1945–46

Grains: A year ago it was indicated that the United States would be called on to export about 225,000,000 bushels of wheat during 1945–46. Later, in the fall, the total was raised to 325,000,000. By December, UNRRA, France, and other claimants had been forced to raise their estimates of minimum requirements several times, and the United States agreed to undertake the export of a record total of 400,000,000 bushels during the year. At that time advance estimates placed wheat and flour exports at 175,000,000 bushels for the last 6 months of 1945. We therefore set a goal of 225,000,000 for the January-June 1946 period, to bring the total for the year to the 400,000,000-bushel commitment.

Later reports show that 192,000,000 bushels of wheat and flour were actually shipped before January 1, leaving only 208,000,000 to reach the 400,000,000 total. We chose, however, to stick to the 225,000,000-bushel (6,000,000-ton) goal figure which had already been announced. In effect, therefore, we have been working against a 400,000,000-bushel commitment for the year, and a 417,000,000-bushel goal. We knew from the first that all we could ship would not be enough to meet all needs, and we therefore have made every effort to exceed the commitment.

We have now passed the 400,000,000 commitment, and will very soon reach the 417,000,000-bushel goal.

Meats: It is estimated that approximately 614,000 long tons of meat and meat products were actually shipped to foreign claimants during the 12 months, not including shipment to United States Territories. This compares with the stated 1946 calendar year goal of 714,000 long tons. During the past 12 months, procurement activities were complicated by such factors as work stoppages in production, and shortages in supply during at least part of the year. The 1945–46 shipments represented 5.9 percent of total United States meat output during the year.

Of the 614,000 total which went for export, approximately 379,000 tons were procured by the Department of Agriculture, while 215,000 tons came from military stocks for such outlets as UNRRA and United States military civilian feeding. In addition, about 20,000 tons were exported commercially.

UNRRA received nearly half the total 614,000 tons shipped to foreign claimants, exports to this outlet accounting for 288,000 tons. Virtually all of the meat which went to UNRRA was for European destinations. Of the total 614,000 tons of meat exported, 588,000 tons went to Europe, including the countries served by UNRRA. The remainder was exported to outlets in the Far East, Latin American Republics, and others.

Fats and oils: High on the list of food products needed for foreign relief feeding and for other essential exports were fats and oils. It was recognized at the beginning of the 1945–46 year that we would be faced with a continuing world shortage of these commodities. Appraisal of the situation after the end of the war in the Pacific indicated little alleviation of the tight supply for some months to come. Sources in that area had been devastated by the war, and reestablishment of supplies has taken more time than had been anticipated. The situation called for the most efficient management of available world supplies, including those from United States sources.

According to our estimates, it is indicated that actual shipments to the outlets for which allocations were established reached slightly more than 356,000 long tons of edible fats and oils. The goal for the 1946 calendar year was set at 347,000 tons, or 375,000 tons, including both edible and inedible products.

Of the 356,000 long tons exported, 268,000 went to Europe, with the remainder going to countries in the Far East, to Latin American Republics, and others. Approximately 73,000 tons, or 27 percent of the total which went to Europe, was for UNRRA. Other large recipients included the United Kingdom and British Services Overseas, France, and French North Africa.

Dairy products: Measured against a tight supply situation in the United States was the pressure of record demand—both from the need for these products in foreign relief programs, and from United States civilians. Tentative plans for exports, implemented by allocations, were drawn up for the 1945–46 year. The products most in demand for foreign use are cheese, and condensed, evaporated, and dried milk.

The estimated export shipments are indicated to be 764,000 long tons. The shipments represent 28 percent of total distribution of these products in the fiscal year.

Of the approximately 764,000 long tons exported during the 12-month period, about 83 percent, or 669,000 tons, went to European countries. Shipments to UNRRA—in the amount of 316,000 tons—made up 44 percent of all shipments to Europe. The United Kingdom and British Services Overseas were the next largest recipients, followed by such countries as France and French North Africa, and Belgium. Relatively small shipments went to the Far East and other outlets.

The following table gives the preliminary report on exports during the year, by major food groups and by destination:

Supplementary Statement—Starving People or American Dollars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN PHILLIPS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a statement on the increasing imports of dates, nuts, and figs. It was suggested that, so far as possible, all available foods produced in or near the famine areas should be used to feed the people of those areas, instead of being shipped to this country, to be sold for American dollars.

A discussion took place before the Committee on Agriculture. The producers were heard, then the salters and importers.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I am inserting the rebuttal statement, submitted on behalf of the producers of nuts, dates, and figs, and the 11 exhibits which were submitted with it.

I will also insert copies of 2 letters, the first is a letter from Mr. Charles F. Brannan, as Acting Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, addressed to the junior Senator from California, Honorable WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, on this subject; and the second is the reply to that letter by Mr. D. R. Bailey, general manager of the California Almond Growers Exchange. The letters are dated June 17 and July 2, respectively:

REBUTTAL STATEMENT SUBMITTED ON BEHALF OF GROWERS OF TREE NUTS AND CERTAIN TREE FRUITS OF THE UNITED STATES

Pursuant to permission of Chairman FLANNAGAN, the following statement is submitted in rebuttal to the testimony presented on July 3, 1946, by representatives of the Imported Nut Section of the Association of Food Distributors, Inc., the Peanut and Nut Salters Association, the National Association of Retail Druggists, the National Confectionery Association and other large users of edible tree nuts.

POSITION OF AMERICAN GROWERS

All of the witnesses appearing on July 3 assumed that the nut growers had proposed the complete prohibition of exports of edible tree nuts by foreign producing countries and a complete embargo on their importation into the United States. No such proposal has at any time been presented.

The general recommendations of the American growers were presented in the testimony submitted by them on May 28, 1946, and specific proposals were incorporated in the form of suggested resolutions which were later submitted for the consideration of the committee as follows:

FIRST PROPOSED RESOLUTION

"Whereas any adequate solution of the world food crisis, and any reduction in the relief burden requires the most effective distribution and use of every available source of food, the world over, including secondary, as well as the relatively more important crops such as grain; and

"Whereas, despite the fact that local food surpluses should be allocated to and channeled into the food-deficit and famine areas, many such food stocks are being exported, even from food-deficit and famine areas into food-surplus areas where they are not needed and where they disturb the domestic markets; and

"Whereas, by way of example, the starving millions of Europe and Asia were deprived of 42,591 tons of shelled tree nuts, dried dates and figs exported from famine and adjacent areas into the United States during the 7-month period ending in March of 1946—this tonnage having an aggregate nutritive value of 180,981,200,000 calories—equivalent in caloric value to 1,850,523 bushels of wheat; and

"Whereas prompt attention to the effective distribution of local surpluses of secondary food products would make a substantial and immediate contribution to the relief of famine-stricken peoples of the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this committee recommends:

"That the secondary and specialty foods as well as the primary staples be allocated in accordance with specific need therefor by the International Emergency Food Council of the United Nations; and

"That surplus foods from either general food-deficit or surplus areas be allocated primarily to food-deficit and famine areas and only to general food surplus areas when the latter do not themselves produce such foods in sufficient quantity to meet their respective domestic requirements."

SECOND PROPOSED RESOLUTION

"Whereas it has come to the attention of this committee, in making a study of world food shortages and disrupted world markets, for the relief of famine-stricken areas abroad, and the orderly distribution of available world foodstuffs, that certain phases of our Government's food distribution policies do not make effective use of world food supplies, and work hardships on segments of our domestic agricultural economy:

"Whereas, due to the present dislocation of foreign exchange rates and the disruption of normal world markets, the present imports of certain edible tree nuts, specifically almonds and filberts, are 325% and 459% respectively of the average rate of such imports for the pre-war base period of 1935-39: Now, therefore, be it Resolved, That this committee recommends:

"That the State Department take immediate steps through formal or informal representations to the principal edible nut exporting countries, to suggest such quantitative restrictions on their exports to the United States, as will limit those exports to the annual averages during the base period of 1935-1939, with appropriate allowance for population increases, and that these restrictions be reviewed quarterly and adjusted if necessary.

"The first proposal of the American growers is simply that the distribution and utilization of the so-called secondary or minor food crops of the world be handled on a common-sense basis that will channel these food crops to the areas where they are most needed. To the extent that need is shown on the part of United States consumers for imported nuts of varieties not grown here, in sufficient quantity to meet consumer needs, such allocations would properly be made by the International Emergency Food Council just as has been done in the allocation of dried fruits by the Combined Food Board.

"The second proposal, in the event the first is not carried out by the International Emergency Food Council, contemplates action by the State Department to secure quantitative restrictions on nut importations—on almond and filbert importations particularly. Again two world-wide purposes would be served; available food supplies abroad for distribution to famine areas would be increased and the domestic markets would be saved from complete demoralization. The disruption of normal markets for Mediterranean nuts has made the United States the target for the major portion of the foreign supply of these nuts, the bulk of which under normal conditions was sold in European and nearby markets—and this at a time when our domestic production is at an all-time record high which is adequate in itself to meet the American need except in the case of nuts not domesticaly grown—Brazils, cashews, pistachios and pignolias. For example, almond supplies for the 1946-47 season will amount to approximately 29,000 shelled tons. (See exhibit J attached) A comparison of this anticipated supply with the average total supply in the years 1942-44 of 14,000 tons and the prewar supply in the base period 1935-39 of 9,000 tons (see exhibit K attached), illustrates the critical supply and marketing problems faced by the domestic producers. Imports of almonds are already running 325 percent of the normal prewar rate, and will continue at this or an increased rate until some corrective measures are taken by our Government or until the price has gone so low that the American producer cannot even recover his cost of production. Such a supply obviously cannot be consumed in this market at anything like a reasonable price to our American growers."

NUTRITION

The witnesses appearing July 3, and particularly Dr. Carlson emphasized the point that a large proportion of nuts in the diet of starving people was undesirable. We are in full agreement with this view. We have at no time suggested that anyone be fed a large proportion of nuts as a daily diet. In calling attention to the concentrated food value of nuts, we have used illustrations of the small quantity required to meet the caloric requirements of a daily diet.

However, we have advocated that the nuts be used only as a supplement to other foods and in quantities which would represent a relatively small part of the diet of any one individual. Even the very large volume of imported nuts coming into the United States during the past 8 months represents in food value less than 1 percent of the 250,000,000 bushels of wheat which the United States is proposing to furnish foreign nations. If the edible nuts were properly distributed, no individual would receive a large ration of nuts. In addition to wheat, the United States is also furnishing canned meat and other products. A set-aside order was issued some time ago by the Department of Agriculture on canned meats to obtain supplies for relief distribution abroad.

It is believed no one will question the highly concentrated food value of edible nuts when properly used as a supplement to the restricted diets of persons capable of digesting normal food. Dr. Carlson himself recognized this. It would seem apparent that anyone capable of eating some varieties of canned meats could consume edible nuts and efficiently digest them. Certainly they would be more readily digestible than the 200,000 pounds of canned plum pudding which the Navy contributed to famine relief according to an official announcement of June 14, 1946.

As further evidence of the nutritional value of limited quantities of nuts in the daily diet, there is attached, as exhibit A, a letter dated June 12, 1945, signed by L. B. Williams, director of the California Foods Research Institute of San Francisco. It is there stated, on the authority of publications by Dr. Henry C. Sherman, referring to the work of the University of California, that the fruit and nut diet was as readily and almost as completely digested as would be expected of ordinary mixed diets. It is also stated:

"The addition of nuts to the diets of people in all but the very lowest levels of food consumption is not only desirable, but should make a distinct contribution, especially if the nuts could be ground to a flour for the use of those with inadequate teeth for thorough mastication."

That nuts can be so used has been demonstrated by an experiment conducted by the California Foods Research Institute at the request of Mr. Bailey of the California Almond Growers Exchange, since the hearings before this committee on May 28. A biscuit was prepared by the use of equal parts of wheat flour and almonds ground to a flour with a small quantity of evaporated milk and without sugar or shortening of any kind. This biscuit shows an analysis of higher food value than the Army biscuit included in several of the ration packs. A letter of June 7 from Mr. Williams of the California Foods Research Institute describing this biscuit is also attached, as exhibit B.

India has recognized the desirability of conserving for the use of its own people its supplies of edible nuts. A complete embargo on peanuts imposed some time ago has recently been followed, according to reports in the trade press, by an embargo on exports of cashews limiting shipments to 50 percent of the 1941-42 average. This action was taken by the Indian government for the express purpose of conserving food supplies for home consumption. Is it not only common sense that the International Emergency Food Council should apply the same principle to the solution of the world food crisis by taking the world supply of edible nuts under allocation and effecting an efficient distribution of surpluses in nut producing countries to nonproducing food deficit and famine areas where they can be used to the best advantage as a supplement to the restricted diets of people threatened with starvation?

NO NUT SHORTAGE

All the witnesses of July 3 categorically asserted that there was an edible nut shortage at present in the United States. Aside from the statistical proof to the contrary made in the presentation on behalf of the growers, the assertion of a nut shortage is conclusively refuted by the nut market comments in the current issues of the New York Journal of Commerce, by current price lists of importers and dealers who quote currently supplies of both imported and domestic nuts, by repeated requests of buyers to be relieved of commitments for future delivery, by the frantic search on the part of dealers in both imported and domestic nuts for cold storage space in which to carry over their supplies during the hot summer months, and by the substantial price decline since January, particularly in the case of almonds, filberts, cashews, and Brazils.

In substantiation of the foregoing, we quote from the New York Journal of Commerce of July 2, the following:

"NUTS

"Removal of price controls was without influence as far as the nut market was concerned, for with few exceptions, nuts have been selling on spot well below official ceilings for weeks.

"This was particularly true of shelled cashews, almonds, Brazils, and filberts. Spot supplies are ample and the combination of bright crop prospects on the coast continued heavy imports, and the absence of important trade demand, served to keep the market tone easy.

"There is a fairly good demand on spot for Brazil nuts in shell, and heavy arrivals are expected through July and August. The bulk of these, however, will move out against previous purchases."

And from the New York Journal of Commerce of July 3, as follows:

"NUTS

"With the possible exception of shelled pecans and walnuts, which are quoted nominally at recently prevailing ceilings, the nut trade continues to show indifference to establishment of a free market, inasmuch as prices have been well below maximum OPA levels for some time.

"Trade interest appears to center largely in the movement of Brazil nuts in shell. A big business has been placed, and receipts are now coming forward with expectations of a rather heavy import movement during July and August.

"Crop reports from the coast are mostly ideal, with heavy yields of almonds, and fair yields of filberts indicated. It is still too early, traders say, to determine just what the walnut crop will be."

A consular report from Malaga, Spain, dated May 23, states that stocks of almonds in the United States are much too heavy, that importers are selling at cost to lighten their inventories and that offerings from Italy are at cheaper prices than the Spanish quotations.

None of these current and reliable indications substantiates the contention of a current nut shortage. On the contrary they indicate an unusually heavy supply for this time of the year at the end of the marketing season and the naturally resultant declining prices. They also indicate, as we have shown previously, an anticipated heavy domestic production for the coming crop season together with continued heavy imports.

To emphasize briefly we quote the following from the above July 2, 1946, New York Journal of Commerce article:

"Spot supplies are ample and the combination of bright crop prospects on the coast, continued heavy imports, and the absence of important trade demand, served to keep the market tone easy."

WHOSE SELF-INTEREST SHOULD GOVERN?

This indicated picture of the nut supply for the coming crop and marketing season, obviously spells out an oversupply of nuts, prices to the farmer grower below parity or comparable prices, and larger profits to the importers, salters, confectioners and retailers since retail prices are lagging behind the declining prices to farmers. Naturally the short-time self-interest of these groups dictates that they must oppose the proposals of the American growers. However, when you balance this with the self-interest of the American grower in receiving a fair price for his product together with the substantial contribution to famine relief by a common-sense distribution of the world nut supplies to the nearby famine areas where they are most needed and where under normal prewar market and exchange conditions they were actually consumed; the answer between the two sets of self-interest seems obvious.

The prospective supply for the coming crop year of both production and imports, based on continuation of imports at current rates, indicates an aggregate tonnage on a shelled basis of 121,837 tons compared with 81,973 tons as the highest (1938–41) 4-year annual average total supply since 1922, as shown in statistics compiled by the Tariff Commission (see attached exhibit J). And there is no indication that the American market can absorb such a large supply at prices which will give a fair return to the domestic growers.

CURRENT NUT IMPORTS

The witnesses on July 3 also took exception to our projection of annual imports based on the monthly imports to date. If the comparison be made on the basis of the period of 1945–46 for which import statistics are available with a similar period in the prewar years 1935–39, it will be found that almonds are currently being imported at a rate of 325 percent of prewar, filberts at 459 percent and cashews at 120 percent. The following is a table showing the monthly imports from which the foregoing percentages are derived:

Specified edible tree nuts: Comparison of 1935–39 average imports with 1945–46 current imports by months and by totals through April 1946

Source: Department of Agriculture monthly import statistics.

This table shows that during the remaining months of the crop year for each nut the imports are normally substantial. When this fact is taken together with present heavy stocks available in exporting countries and trade predictions of continued heavy imports, it is obvious that the projected annual import figures given in our summary statement presented to the committee on June 7 will prove about correct, perhaps even lower than the actual imports will prove, unless some corrective steps are taken by the International Emergency Food Council or unless others of the exporting countries take action similar to India to conserve their own food supplies.

SUPPORTING COMMUNICATIONS

There are also attached copies of letters addressed to the chairman of the committee and other letters and telegrams supporting the position of the American nut growers on this subject. It is respectfully requested that these communications be included in the record of the hearing. These communications are from the following:

Mr. D. R. BAILEY,
General Manager, California Almond Growers Exchange,

DEAR MR. BAILEY: The literature on nuts, while not abundant, does give us adequate support for our judgment that the use of nuts in the diet of persons previously inadequately fed could have no adverse effect, and might very well be considered a highly desirable supplement to a low calory diet provided the persons had not reached the stage of debility in which their digestive strength was inadequate. In other words, we feel that nuts added to the diet of persons still capable of digesting an adequate amount of any food would find no trouble in digesting and assimilating the high values of nuts.

I have today discussed this matter with Dr. Nina Simmonds, who collaborated with Dr. E. V. McCollum in the production of The Newer Knowledge of Nutrition, and who is now associated with the University of California, and Dr. Simmonds agrees with our contention that the addition of nuts to the diets of people in all but the very lowest levels of food consumption, is not only desirable, but should make a distinct contribution, especially if the nuts could be ground to a flour for the use of those with inadequate teeth for thorough mastication.

Dr. Henry C. Sherman, in his publication, Food Products, referring to the work by Jaffa, of the University of California, says:

"In 28 digestion experiments with two men and one woman upon fruit and nut diet, the average coefficients for digestibility were: for protein, 90 percent; for fat, 85 percent; for carbohydrate, 95 percent. Apparently, the fruit and nut diet was as readily and almost as completely digested as would be expected of ordinary mixed diet."

Inasmuch as practically all of the protein and all of the fat in these diets were supplied by nuts, it is evident that nuts have a higher coefficient of digestibility.

Quoting Sherman further:

"Nuts in general being rich in both protein and fat, are compared with meat as food, and may be used interchangeably with meat in the diet."

Dr. James McLester, in the third edition of Nutrition and Diet in Health and Disease, says:

"Nuts are regarded as indigestible. True, their compact physical state and their richness in fat may retard the emptying of the stomach and cause discomfort, but the reversal may also be true, and if they are well masticated this retarding influence will often give a sense of satiety and comfort. It has been shown that when nuts are thoroughly masticated and eaten with fruits and other foods, their nutritive constitutents are well utilized. * * * This increase in the satiety value which fat gives to a meal is important."

Morgan and Heinz have shown that the protein mixture contained in the almond functions efficiently in human nutrition.

Rose and McLoud found that the calcium of almonds was fairly well utilized, but in most cases not as well as was the calcium of milk.

McCollum, Orent-Keiles, and Day, in the fifth edition of The Newer Knowledge of Nutrition, 1939, say:

"Many people with faddist tendencies as respects food believe that nuts posses unique nutritive value, and that they are complete in all the essential nutrients. This view finds no support in experimental studies. All of the commonly used nuts, with the exception of the chestnut, which is starch-rich and fat-poor, are extremely rich in proteins and fats, hence they have a high caloric value and are good sources of protein. In no instance, however, have their proteins been found to be of high biological value, this being of the general order of the cereal grains. The quantitative studies available are relatively few; consequently no very exact statements are warranted about any of them. Their distinctive and appetizing flavors recommend them as human foods, but their high energy values point to their consumption in moderation by sedentary persons who have a tendency to put on weight."

If you would like us to carry this investigation further, please let us know.

Sincerely and cordially,

L. B. WILLIAMS,
Director, California Foods Research Institute.

DEAR MR. BAILEY: We have just completed a comparison of our "five in one" biscuit with the Army biscuit which was included in several ration packs. This comparison works out as follows:

Figures are for one biscuit in each instance:

	Proteins	Fat	Carbohydrate	Calories
	Grams	Grams	Grams
Army	1.5	1.6	12.4	70
5 in 1	3.5	6.0	10.0	108

	Calcium	Phosphorus	Iron
	Grams	Grams	Milligrams
Army	0.020	0.044	0.9
5 in 1	.51	.07	.62

	Vitamin A	Thiamine	Riboflavin
	International units	Micrograms	Micrograms
Army	----------	26	29
5 in 1	50	64	123

	Niacin	Vitamin C	Vitamin D
	Milligrams	Milligrams	International units
Army	0.28	----------	----------
5 in 1	.35	0.17	0.50

Upon analysis, this shows that eating 4 biscuits 3 times a day will give 1,296 calories, which, I think, is a maintenance minimum, but is approximately two-thirds of the minimum requirement in calories for a moderately active man. I understand that this is considerably above the intake of many people in Europe at this time.

Going further, according to figures of the National Research Council, the biscuits consumed in the above quantities—12 a day—will give more than half of the daily protein required, and it should be noted that this protein contains 8 of the 10 essential amino acids; will give about two-thirds of the daily riboflavin requirement, a great deal more than 100 percent of the daily calcium requirement, about half of the thiamine requirement, and about half of the iron requirement.

The formula for a sample batch to produce 36 biscuits 2½ inches square is as follows: 3 cups ground Blue Diamond natural shelled almonds, 3 cups sifted all-purpose emergency flour, 2¼ teaspoons salt, 1½ cups evaporated milk. Yield: 36 biscuits. Weight: 26 ounces.

This biscuit is a natural health biscuit, with high values in essential nutritive elements and calories in a remarkable balance. For shipping they carry very high values per cubic foot of shipping space.

Temporarily, I am calling this biscuit the "5 in 1" biscuit. It contains a higher proportion of the five essential dietary requirements than most foods I know, and it would be pretty simple to step up the thiamine percentage and the iron percentage to where it would contain 100 percent of these five requirements.

Sincerely and cordially,

L. B. WILLIAMS,
Director, California Foods Research Institute.

Hon. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, Jr.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLANNAGAN: We understand that your committee has under consideration the problem presented by nations in the famine area exporting food products while requesting aid from UNRRA.

We believe that when a nation is the recipient of allocated food it should not export food unless it has a surplus of some particular commodity, and in that case it should be exported to other nations in need.

Our attention has been called to an apparent violation of this simple principle in the case of fruits and nuts. There is evidence that American markets are being flooded by imports of these commodities, far in excess of prewar averages or domestic needs.

This is a problem which it seems to us might well come within the scope of the Emergency Food Council. The purpose of the council, as we understand it, is to survey world food supplies, determine needs and try to direct those supplies to the point of greatest need.

It seems to us to be a clear case of mismanagement of world food distribution when valuable foods, such as nuts and fruits are shipped from the famine area to this country, where there is no shortage of those commodities, while we ship them grain, flour, meats, and other commodities in short supply in this country.

While in London recently I found that there is little appreciation of the sacrifices our people, and particularly our dairy, livestock, and poultry farmers, are making to help meet the world-wide food shortage.

There is a widespread feeling throughout much of the world that our food resources and financial means are unlimited. The determination to help themselves before calling for aid is not too strong in many quarters.

We hope that Congress will call to the attention of the Emergency Food Council the need for directing food, wherever available, to the nearest emergency area. It should make certain that the famine areas make the best possible use of food produced in those areas before calling for relief from outside.

Sincerely yours,

ALBERT S. GOSS,
Master, The National Grange.

Hon. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, Jr.,
Chairman, House Agriculture Committee, New House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLANNAGAN: I am writing to you on behalf of the 380,000 farm families, residing in 45 States, represented by our member organizations. We believe that your committee in studying available world supplies of food and the problems of distribution is engaged in a most commendable task.

We would like to join with other agricultural groups in calling your attention to the fact that at the present time food is being imported into the United States from countries and areas of the world which are actually considered food-deficit areas. It is inconceivable that a course of procedure should be permitted to continue which permits the exportation of high-caloric and high-vitamin foods from such countries and then expect the American farmer and the American public to pay for and export to those selfsame countries.

Most certainly it is more efficient and will go far to alleviate suffering from malnutrition if those foods which are produced in a particular area are utilized where produced or in nearby deficit areas rather than have them transported to the United States to be sold in competition with our domestic products in exchange for other foodstuffs of no greater nutritive value.

For the reasons outlined above, we recommend the adoption of the suggestions offered by the producers of tree nuts and fruits which have already been filed with your committee.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES W. HOLMAN,
Secretary, The National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation.

Hon. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, Jr.,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLANNAGAN: We have reviewed carefully the testimony submitted to the House Committee on Agriculture by Messrs. D. R. Bailey and Karl D. Loos in the interest of growers of tree nuts and certain tree fruits in the United States.

On behalf of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives we urge that the House Committee on Agriculture act favorably upon their recommendations—

"That surplus foods from either general food deficit or surplus areas be allocated to and channeled into general food deficit and famine areas according to the need therefor in such deficit areas.

"That as a condition precedent to a deficit or famine area receiving allocations of needed food supplies the authorities of such area agree to prohibit the exportation of any food to a general food surplus area where such food is produced in sufficient volume to satisfy the acute need therefor.

"If the FAO should not see fit to adopt this recommendation, or should fail to effectively enforce it, we recommend that this committee sponsor legislation that would:

"Place annual quotas on the importation into the United States of specified agricultural food products when domestically produced in a volume equal to 110 percent of the average prewar production, limiting the importation of such product from each foreign country to 110 percent of the average annual amount imported from that country for the prewar years.

"Such import quotas are within the policies of the State Department as announced in its white paper entitled 'Proposals for Expansion of World Trade and Employment' issued in November 1945. On page 13, section C (1) (a) of this paper, the State Department approved the use of 'quotas, embargoes, or other quantitative restrictions on * * * export or import trade' to assist in 'the equitable international distribution of products in short supply.'"

Chairman, House Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLANNAGAN: I understand that your committee has been making a study of the world food situation. I think this is particularly opportune because it seems to me that there is a tremendous amount of misinformation in circulation and a great deal of exaggeration on some points, particularly the question of using coarse grains for direct human consumption rather than feeding it to livestock. From all the information I can secure, with the wheat crop prospect improving and with conditions in the Corn Belt more favorable than a year ago, this country should be able to send abroad next year the 250,000,000 bushels of wheat which Secretary Anderson has indicated is to be allocated for that purpose, without having to resort to substitution of corn as was done this year to meet the much larger commitment of 400,000,000 bushels. Reports on the world wheat crop are favorable, indicating a production greater than a year ago, and certainly there will be increased production of many other important food crops in devastated countries whose production had dropped to very low levels.

One thing that I think your committee should stress in its report is the importance of all these ccutries using the foods they produce or those available in nearby countries rather than permitting them to be exported to the United States or elsewhere. I understand that our imports of nuts, dates, and figs have increased tremendously, and this is doubtless true of some other products. Why shouldn't these nutritive products be used at the nearest point of need rather than to be exported to this country where our own production has substantially increased? It seems inconsistent to keep on stressing the need of greater exports from this country for famine relief purposs when full advantage is not being taken of food products produced locally or in adjacent countries.

Unless this point is stressed and there is a lessening of the propaganda for the direct human use of coarse grains, we are very fearful that the production of meats and fats in this country during the coming winter will be sharply reduced. It is entirely possible that this could be carried to the extreme that we will have a shortage of these essential products (meats and fats) next spring far beyond anything we have yet experienced. Cattle and hog producers and feeders must know with some certainty within a very few weeks what the program is going to be in order to avoid such a critical shortage.

I think your committee can contribute a great service by a forthright statement in your report that will help to clarify this whole food and feed situation.

Yours very truly,

F. E. MOLLIN,
Executive Secretary.

Would appreciate all you can do to include California dates in the tree-nut presentation in Washington, particularly before the House Committee on Agriculture. This is your carte blanche authority to represent United Date Growers Association in all matters pertaining to allocation of date imports by the Combined Food Board and affiliates. We are firmly behind your program and will do anything we can to further it. Thanks.

Mr. D. R. BAILEY,
California Almond Growers' Exchange, Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR DAVE: In reply to your letter of June 12, I am addressing this letter to you at Sacramento with a request to be forwarded to you should you be in Washington at this time.

No doubt the "resolution" that you refer to embodies the recommendations contained on page 15 of the mimeographed statement of the Tree Nut Industry. If so, we endorse the resolutions as well as the alternative recommendation that legislation be sponsored to place annual quotas on imports from individual foreign countries. Our own case illustrates how imports during this past year have considerably exceeded prewar imports. For the 6 months from September 1945 through February 1946, imports of dried figs from Turkey total 1,743 tons. I believe that imports since that time would swell the total to 1,900 and possibly 2,000 tons. This compares with average imports from Turkey of 1,223 tons for the period 1934–35 through 1939–40, or an increase of over 63 percent above the average prewar imports.

For your information, dried figs and dates are already under allocation by the Combined Food Board. On June 14 the Production and Marketing Administration of the Department of Agriculture in Washington put out a press release to the effect that the Combined Food Board has recommended an interim allocation of 1,680 short tons of dried figs produced in Turkey in 1946–47, and 3,360 short tons of dates produced in Iran in 1946. This is the third such allocation by the Combined Food Board for Turkish figs and compares with an allocation of 3,900 tons in 1945 and 5,000 in 1944. Only 5 tons of figs were imported from Turkey in 1944–45 so the allocation of 5,000 tons meant nothing. I have already reported to you the imports during the 1945–46 period. I don't know what they mean by interim allocation, but it sounds like something tentative that would be subject to upward adjustment later on.

One point that might be brought out in connection with figs, and the same point could be made in connection with dates, is that substantial seizures of both figs and dates have been experienced. In the case of figs, approximately 420 tons were ordered destroyed or reexported from October 1945 to March 1946. If any portion of this was ordered destroyed because of unfitness for human consumption in this country, it represents a loss of food to European famine areas. We know that standards of fitness for human consumption in foreign countries are far below those of the United States, and there is no question in my mind but what the figs and dates seized by the United States Food and Drug Administration at the time of import could and would have been gladly consumed as food in Europe. I have no idea of how much tonnage was actually destroyed as compared with that which was reexported, but it might be a point worth mentioning anyway. In other words, why export food from European countries that is subject to possible seizure and confiscation upon arrival in the United States when it could be consumed in Europe?

I will greatly appreciate hearing from you upon your return from Washington or, if you find it convenient and advisable to do so, I would like to hear from you regarding the progress that you are making in your hearings while in Washington.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD H. HYDE,
Director.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT, OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., June 17, 1946.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: This is in reply to your letter of May 22, 1946, with enclosures from Mr. D. R. Bailey, general manager of the California Almond Growers Exchange, relative to the importation of tree nuts.

A record production of tree nuts in the United States is in prospect for 1946. It is also probable that the volume of imports into this country will remain at a high level unless alternative outlets can be found for nuts produced in foreign countries. On the basis of information available to us now, supplies in the United States during the 1946–47 season may be 10 percent greater than last year's record supply.

In view of this prospective supply situation, some decrease from the recent high price levels may materialize. During the period 1943 through 1945, prices to domestic tree nut producers averaged from 220 to 265 percent of those received during the period 1935 through 1940. Season average prices received by walnut growers during the 1943–45 period were close to parity. For domestic tree nuts other than walnuts, "comparable prices" have been established to replace parity prices which were found to be out of line with those for the basic commodities. The 1943–45 grower prices for filberts and pecans averaged from 20 to 45 percent above comparable prices and almonds averaged slightly better than 50 percent above comparable prices.

The increase in imports results from favorable crops in the foreign producing areas from which the United States historically has drawn part of its nut supplies. From a strictly commercial viewpoint, it is to be expected that such foreign exportable surpluses will tend to be directed to the United States to a greater extent than was true in prewar years as a result of the high price levels prevailing in this country. Spain, Brazil, Turkey, and India are the foreign countries which are heavy exporters of tree nuts. None of these countries has received donations of food from the United States Government or the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

We recognize the concern of the industry regarding the prospective supply and price situation, and will do everything we can under existing legislation and within the limits of available funds to assist it in obtaining maximum nut distribution in domestic and international channels. We have not made any recommendations to the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration in regard to tree nuts, but we have suggested that they might be used to advantage in famine areas because of their high fat and oil content.

Sincerely yours,
CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Acting Secretary.

CALIFORNIA ALMOND GROWERS EXCHANGE,
Sacramento, Calif., July 2, 1946.

Mr. CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Acting Secretary,
Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BRANNAN: Your letter of June 17, replying to Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND'S request of May 22 for information relative to the importation of tree nuts, has been referred to us.

The purpose of this communication is to request the details of your price and supply estimates, which differ substantially from our own, and to clarify statements which may lead to improper inferences with respect to past price levels on edible nuts.

We note in your letter a statement relative to protential supplies which has already been given wide circulation in a letter over the signature of Under Secretary Dodd.

From current crop estimates and from the known figures on imports to this date, it is rather apparent here that the phrase, "supplies in the United States * * * may be 10 percent greater than last year's record supply." is dangerously vague, in that it fails completely to give an accurate picture of the problem facing our domestic producers.

I use this statement, dangerously vague, intentionally. When you say supplies in the United States may be 10 percent greater, I presume you mean the supplies from the 1946–47 crop year. When you say 10 percent greater than last year's record supply, I am somewhat in doubt as to whether you mean the known figures for 1944–45 or the as yet incomplete figures for the current year 1945–46. In either case, you will find that importations have been at a rate considerably in excess of the annual average for the prewar decade 1930–39. More important, you will find that brazil-nut imports were practically nonexistent during 1944–45 and during the 1945–46 seasons. The fact that the Department of Agriculture now estimates 10,000 tons of brazil nuts to be expected during the 1946–47 season indicates that importations will be greater during the coming year than either of the past two seasons by 10,000 tons. This, I believe, will indicate an increase in imports of considerably more than 10 percent.

As regards domestic production, the 1946 almond crop, currently estimated at some 18,000 tons, shelled, is approximately 68 percent above last year's bumper crop and is nearly three times the 1930–39 average. Both almond and filbert production will be approximately double the 1935–39 combined total of imports and domestic volume. The 1946 walnut crop is conceded to be equal to last year's heavy production, as is the pecan harvest in our Southeastern States.

I am sure that you are fully aware that still other factors are adding to the seriousness of this present emergency.

As you know, the complete disruption of normal markets for Mediterranean nuts in Holland, Belgium, England, Germany, and the Scandinavian countries, is making the United States market the target for the entire world's exportable surplus of edible nuts.

It must be obvious that serious marketing difficulties are ahead, especially since shortages of sugar, oil, and other items, have adversely affected the market for edible nuts in the confectionery and nut-salting trades.

As regards price, may we say that we are under no illusions as to the possibility of maintaining the edible nut market at its past level. In view of current inflationary tendencies, the fact that recent almond quotations have been so much as 40 percent under the former ceiling price will confirm our statements concerning the demoralizing effect of excessive supplies. Based on these quotations, returns to growers on the 1946–47 crop will be 10 to 15 percent under the "comparable" price.

We do not propose at this time to argue the merits of comparable prices, except to point out that the United States Department of Agriculture must have recognized a rather marked inequity when in 1943 they granted almonds an increased "compromise" price when establishing price ceilings for edible nuts under MPR–490. May I point out that your comparison of 1943–45 prices with those in force during the period 1935–40 can hardly be taken as a fair comparison under present conditions. I cannot believe that it is your intention to infer that edible tree nut prices have been unduly high, although this inference is the only one possible from your comparison between the 1943–45 period and the prewar 1935–40 period.

Surely you realize the edible nut prices are placed in a most unfair and unfavorable light when they are thus singled out without reference to the general price increases enjoyed by all commodities during the World War II inflationary period. A similar false inference might be drawn from the fact that apple prices in May 1946, were 427 percent over the 1935–39 average, and that oranges were 283 percent above the average for the same period.

The erroneous inference resulting from this singling out of edible nuts in a comparison of wartime and prewar prices will be readily seen from the following table taken from the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics' publication, the Agricultural Situation, for June 1946:

Commodity	January 1935 to December 1939	Parity price, May 15, 1946	Price, May 15, 1946	Percentage increase over 1935–39 average	Percent May 15, 1946, price is above parity

1 Returns to growers for the crops 1935 to 1939, inclusive.

It is my earnest belief that the foregoing figures indicate the critical nature of the marketing situation which faces all domestic producers of edible tree nuts. Supplies are obviously excessive; domestic production has reached and may be expectd to maintain a new high level which will amply take care of all domestic needs; the demand situation is adversely affected by shortages in all the manufacturing trades; the current price level for all edible nuts reflects a surplus condition. Since domestic producers have, in total, nearly a billion dollars invested in orchards, equipment, and processing plants, and since our growers are not able, as are other farmers, to change at will from one crop to another, it is obvious that constructive and effective action must be taken if the welfare of growers and the continuance of a sound domestic industry are to be maintained. In the light of the enclosed figures, I feel confident that the Department of Agriculture may be expected to recognize this marketing problem, and to make every effort to find a constructive solution.

I believe that this solution may be found in the nut industry's current request that the new International Emergency Food Council be instructed to place edible nuts under allocation so that exportable supplies throughout the world will be diverted into the food deficit areas and away from a United States market which must inevitably be completely demoralized by a continuance of the present practice of indiscriminate importations.

Yours very truly,

D. R. BAILEY,
General Manager.

P. S.—Since your letter covers a number of very pertinent points, we have taken the liberty of forwarding copies to certain interested authorities, along with copies of this reply. I feel sure this action will meet with your approval.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN J. DELANEY
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. JOHN J. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mark Sullivan from the New York Herald Tribune for July 12, 1946:

HEART OF THE BRITISH LOAN ISSUE IS VIEWED SIMPLY AS AID TO U. S.—MARK SULLIVAN SAYS HOUSE USUALLY VOTES ON BASIC ISSUES, NOT ON COMPLAINTS OF SPECIAL GROUPS; HE CITES BLOOM ON JEWISH PROTESTS

(By Mark Sullivan)

WASHINGTON, July 11.—The status of the British loan is this: it was negotiated by representatives of the American and British governments. It has been approved by the Senate, 46 to 34. The House Committee on Banking and Currency approved it by 20 to 5. It is now before the House as a whole for action.

This record has force of itself. The loan is an intricate transaction, not confined to a simple grant from one country to another, but accompanied by provisions having to do, among other things, with future trade relations between the United States and Great Britain, and especially with world trade as a whole. These provisions and the way they will work out if put into effect are beyond the possibility of adequate study by the average citizen. He is justified in taking for granted that in the prolonged weeks of negotiating by highly placed and expert representatives of our government with those of Britain every aspect of the loan received the most thorough consideration that is humanly possible.

He is justified in assuming that our interests were fully protected by our representatives. He would be justified in assuming, from the character and standing of the representatives of both countries, that they were not mere commercial bargainers intent only upon the respective interests of a lender and a borrower.

What they did was on the plane of statesmanship, directed in the first instance toward restoration of a ravaged world, by which both and all will benefit. The agreement they arrived at was subjected to intense study by a Senate committee, by the Senate as a whole, and by a House committee, all of which approved.

CONFIDENCE AT STAKE

This record not only has weight because of its thoroughness, but of itself creates a special reason for approval by the House. For disapproval would be much more than a refusal of money. It would be a denial of confidence, made at the last minute and under circumstances which would make the denial spectacular and damaging to the last degree. The damage to Britain as the world's greatest trading nation—taking, before the war, a third of all the world's exports—would be serious enough. It would be, as the Washington Post has said, "tantamount to our telling the whole of the trading world that we consider Britain a poor risk."

But there would be also damage to the confidence of the world in us. Disapproval of the British loan at this stage would be notice to the world that it must be careful about relying upon agreements made by representatives of our Government, that such an agreement may be upset long after it was originally made through dissent by one branch of Congress. The effect, at a time when we and the world are dedicated to international cooperation, and are engaged in bringing it about, would be a climactic addition to the cumulative disasters from which the world suffers. It would weaken the voice of Secretary of State Byrnes in his negotiations with heads of other governments, and weaken the voice of the United States in the proceedings of the United Nations. It would certainly postpone, and might even damage irreparably, the whole expectation of international cooperation.

THE HEART OF THE ISSUE

On some single aspect of the agreement men of good will might differ. But Members of the House of Representatives commonly sense the broad and fundamental aspects of proposals before them, even though much of the debate may deal with single aspects, sometimes aspects that are merely collateral and incidental. In the vast majority of cases they put a correct estimate upon demands by special groups and vote finally upon fundamental merit. Sometimes a majority of the House takes its cue from an address from some Member whose judgment is respected and who, on the question at issue, is especiall well informed. Sometimes the voice of the House is expressed by a Member who, dismissing what is incidental, goes instinctively to the heart of the question. In the debate on the British loan, Republican Representative CHARLES A. EATON, of New Jersey, in a comparatively brief speech, dismissed or answered incidental considerations and said simply: "The only reasonable way to help ourselves in this situation is to help Britain by granting this loan." * * *

During the present debate demand was made by a special group, the National Jewish Council and affiliated organizations, that we refuse to loan to Britain on the ground, expressed directly or implied, of what they regarded as unfairness by Britain about Palestine. To that answer was made by Representative BLOOM, of New York, that he would "vote as an American and not as a Jew." The fundamental issue, he said, "has nothing to do with the Jews. * * * It is simply an issue of whether we should vote on this loan as Americans and what is for the best interests of our country."

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, many Republicans in the House have been deeply concerned about the lack of action on the report of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress.

Because of the parliamentary situation, the only means by which we can hope to bring the recommended legislation before the House for definite action is by an appeal to the majority leadership. Consequently, today we have sent the following letter to the Speaker:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D C., June 10, 1946.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: After more than a year of extensive hearings and study, the Joint Committee on Congressional Organization filed its final report on March 4, 1946.

On May 13, 1946, S. 2177 was introduced in the Senate and was reported there on May 31. The Senate began consideration of the bill on June 5, and debate continued on June 6, 7, 8, and 10. On June 10 the bill, as amended, passed in the Senate by a roll call of 49 to 16

On June 11, a message was received from the Senate by the House, announcing that the Senate had passed the bill, in which the concurrence of the House was requested. During the succeeding 20 calendar days, no action is recorded in the House of Representatives. The Senate bill remains on the Speaker's table. Moreover, during the 18 weeks subsequent to the filing of the final report of the committee no comparable House bill has been introduced. There are many rumors of objections to the consideration of any bill.

We recognize that, under the prevailing parliamentary situation, there is no effective means by which this legislation can be brought before the House for consideration unless and until the majority leadership makes that possible.

But, the overwhelming public demand for action by the House upon the recommendation of the joint committee is clear.

Since we cannot know the form of any legislation which may be presented to the House, we must reserve our opinions as to the merits of any proposal submitted. However, referring to the committee report, we emphasize the "widespread congressional and public belief that a grave constitutional crisis exists in which the fate of representative government itself is at stake."

Therefore, we request that arrangements be made immediately for a full opportunity to consider and act upon definite legislation. We urge that this legislation be placed promptly upon the House Calendar.

There can be no tenable reason offered for any recess or adjournment before action is taken by the House upon the legislation recommended by the joint committee.

Respectfully.

House Approval of British Loan Urged To Avoid Injuring Jews

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. DELANEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. JOHN J. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George Fielding Eliot, from the New York Herald Tribune of July 12, 1946:

HOUSE APPROVAL OF BRITISH LOAN URGED TO AVOID INJURING JEWS—WRITER DECLARES THAT WITHOUT GRANT LONDON CAN'T AFFORD TO SEND 100,000 REFUGEES TO PALESTINE AND UNITED STATES WILL LOSE INFLUENCE IN GREAT BRITAIN

(By George Fielding Eliot)

Counsel of caution for confused Representatives: On this British loan, friend, the pay-off is not now, but next November. Yesterday morning the headline in the New York Herald Tribune read: "British loan imperiled by Zionist issue." Behind that headline lies the fact that many Representatives, some who have a considerable number of Jewish constituents and some who do not, are deeply and very properly disturbed over the plight of the distressed Jews in Europe and the long delays in opening the way for emigration of some of these desperate people to the one land which seems to them to be their last hope of refuge—Palestine.

It is to these Representatives that I would speak this word of caution:

The worst thing any Representative could do, from the point of view of helping these poor people to get to Palestine and have a chance to start their lives anew under decent auspices, is to vote against the British loan.

LOOK FACTS IN FACE

Discard the emotion, the irritation with Mr. Bevin's tactless remarks, and the far more soundly based annoyance at the long delays (for which both the British Government and our own have some measure of responsibility), and look the hard, grim facts squarely in the face.

If there is to be a refuge for 100,000 Jews—and more—in Palestine, this will come about only by cooperation by the British and American Governments. Such cooperation is the one hope of constructive achievement in this matter. If you make such cooperative action impossible by turning down the British loan you shut the gates of hope in the faces of the very people you are trying to help.

If you do that next November your constituents will not remember the fiery letters and the emotional telegrams they have sent you. They will not remember the silly advertisements "Kill That Loan" to which they subscribed. They will see the unfortunate Jews of Europe dying in black despair, and they will not take the blame themselves; they will blame you, their Representative in Congress.

They will say you should have foreseen all this. They will say that this is what we sent you to Congress for, because we thought you were wise enough and clear-headed enough to have a reasonable amount of foresight. You have let us down and, what is worse, you have let down the poor, tortured folk to whom you have denied their last hope.

A MATTER OF FINANCES

I am not saying, of course, that the British will revenge themselves on the Jews in Europe and Palestine if they do not get the loan. I am saying that without the loan the British Government will not have the resources to carry out any large-scale movement of Jews to Palestine.

In fact, the British Government will be compelled to pursue a policy of the sternest retrenchment, in which there can be no room for expenditures of money and effort on the scale necessary to effect such a movement. Moreover, the reaction of the average Englishman, as he discovers what all this means to him in terms of rationing, restriction of opportunity, and denial of much hope for his economic future, will be one of bitter resentment against the United States; he will hardly be in a mood to receive with cordial appreciation such suggestions as we may offer on the subject of Palestine or anything else. So you not only make it financially impossible for the British to do very much about further emigration to Palestine by voting down this loan, you also make it psychologically impossible for the American Government to exercise any further influence in the matter.

TRUSTEESHIP UP TO BRITISH

I know there has been a lot of loose talk about the United Nations taking over the Palestine mandate. That is just nonsense, Mr. Representative, unless the British Government consents to it. The charter is explicit on this point: "The terms of trusteeship for each territory to be placed under the trusteeship system, including any alteration or amendment, shall be agreed upon by the states directly concerned, including the mandatory power in the case of territories held under mandate."

Negotiations are now in progress in London looking to the implementation of the recommendations of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine, which recommendations include, among others, the immediate admission of 100,000 Jewish immigrants—the most urgent cases, those who are now in camps in Germany and Austria, clinging to the last shreds of their dying hopes.

I share with you, Mr. Representative, your impatience at the delays in this matter—delays which seem heartless indeed when human lives and happiness are at stake. But sit for a moment alone with your conscience, Mr. Representative, and ask yourself: Will a successful outcome of these negotiations be helped or hindered by the failure of this financial agreement with Great Britain, on which all our hopes of future Anglo-American cooperation are founded?

SPEEDY ACTION NEEDED

Is it not obvious that American influence, directed toward speeding up the opening of the gates of Palestine, will be immensely greater in London once we are in the position, so to speak, of financial partners in a world-wide commercial and monetary system?

Remember, Mr. Representative, this rescue of the Jews of Europe—especially the 100,000 most urgent cases—is something that won't wait. It must be done very quickly if it is to be done in time. The only way to do it quickly is by Anglo-American agreement. If it has to wait for the United Nations to act, death will have acted first. Winter is coming—the winter which most of these poor people will not survive if they must stay in Europe.

Some will die of starvation, others will be killed—they are killing them already in Poland, Mr Representative—others will just lie down and die because there is nothing left to live for and they can't wait any longer. Effective action now by the British and American Governments acting jointly is the one hope to which they can cling. Don't take that hope away from them, Mr. Representative.

Radio Address of Earl Godwin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a radio address by the distinguished radio commentator, Earl Godwin, delivered by him over WMAL at 8:15 p. m. eastern standard time last night, Thursday, July 11, 1946.

I am sure all persons will be interested in reading the comments of this distinguished, universally recognized radio and newspaper man in regard to what he states about our distinguished colleague and friend, the Honorable ANDREW J. MAY, and the atomic bomb in the latter part of his broadcast:

The army of industrial workers, mainly city dwellers, are fighting to save price control; the farm districts are determined to get rid of the Washington strong arm that makes farmers work to produce goods for stuff they cannot afford to sell. If there ever was an example of an irresistible force meeting an immovable object, we have it now before us in this everlasting OPA row. As it appears today, the Senate insists on an OPA bill the President must veto again. As the trend goes tonight, we are again approaching a crisis which for a time at least may result in chaos and a state where every man is for himself and the devil take the hindmost. The Senators are voting the reflections of their own constituents. Sectional interest is paramount. The consumers, largely represented by powerful labor unions, demand that wages stay up and all living costs be kept down. The folks who produce the goods to sell declare they will no longer sell at prices that keep them in the red. The labor man says, "I refuse to buy your stuff at high prices," and the farmer says, "O. K., Buddy, I refuse to be starved out on your account." And there it goes.

Walter Reuther, president of the CIO's United Auto Workers, heads a buyers' strike. He demands full employment, full production, and full consumption, but the mass of folks who produce food, for instance, declare that Washington's controls have been stymied and they can't produce unless they get more or it.

OPA did not encourage full production, except possibly in black markets such as the outrageous meatlegging that went on for months. In Chicago, P. O. Wilson, manager of the National Livestock Producers' Association, which represents 350,000 livestock men, charges that the black marketeers have bid up livestock price levels after OPA died, in order to help influence a public demand for OPA continuance. Mr. Wilson sees a parallel between the black and high-priced market in meat and the bootleggers who in dry days opposed repeal of prohibition so they could continue speakeasies and rum-running. It should be remembered that the legitimate market for meat was almost bare of cattle toward the last, and that no sooner had controls been lifted than cattlemen began shipping their critters to the stockyard in huge droves. Those favoring free wheeling in business are sure that as soon as the present jamboree is over meat will flow through regular channels at prices representing fair conditions. But prices will stay high and go higher. We cannot have full production if the producers will not make and sell, and if prices are so high, the buyers will not buy. And yet we may have to experience both of those ailments before we get back to common sense and an era of good feeling. Right now we are on the verge of a national riot. The riot is being agitated by those noisy elements which long for the day when our national unity breaks up and a complete European-style, totalitarian government takes over. That will do nobody any good but the thin, yet well-armed layer of dictators, who would take over, and that would be the end of free enterprise until a revolution took us back to free America again.

Much more than a majority of Congress representing more than a majority of the people told the President what they thought of OPA and presented him with a less rigorous control. The President saw it in a different light and ended OPA for the time being with that veto. And yet more than a majority of Congress is still against the old-time OPA and its illegal and ill-considered limitation on profits instead of prices.

In some other countries the situation would call for an immediate canvassing of the voters and a new election to see whether Congress or the President would be supported. As it is in the United States, 2 years and a few weeks will elapse ere there is another Presidential election. But, in the meantime, the congressional nominations are going along at a pace which so far indicates the people are well satisfied with their Representatives in Congress, including the Southern Democratic coalition which has been voting against the administration on OPA and many another liberal subject.

This week's political talk at Washington featured former Governor Stassen's chances for the Republican Presidential nomination, which people in Washington feel were strengthened when isolationist Senator SHIPSTEAD was beaten for renomination by more liberal and internationally minded Governor Thye, of the Gopher State. Thye is spoken of as Stassen's indicator. At any rate, Thye keeps Stassen in the forefront. Two years hence if there is a sure chance that Truman can be beaten, the tight-lipped boys that run the Republican Party from that smoke-filled room are going to throw the Presidency to one of their own kind. Stassen is far too liberal for the Republican Party as it it controlled at the top so far. The old-time Republicans don't want Stassen to win. If there should be no chance of a Republican victory the bosses may bring out Stassen with a wild cry of liberalism, and throw Stassen to the lions.

The headlines in the case of ANDREW JACKSON MAY, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, have come so thick and fast and there has been such a mean slant to them that not one person in a score of thousands knows what happened. I want to make it plain that Representative MAY has been in Congress, representing a typical American Kentucky district, a long time and is highly regarded in Congress and in his district among the people who know him.

The case involving Mr. MAY and a group of industrial enterprises which helped win the war is the result of the investigating work of employees of the successor to the so-called Truman committee which covered itself with glory during the war. That committee is now headed by Senator MEAD, of New York, who apparently is making great moves to become the next Governor of the great State of New York. If Senator MEAD can show the folks that he is as great an investigator as Governor Tom Dewey, it might help him with the voters. The investigation is not completed, but here are some of the influences at work against Mr. MAY—and they are playing dirty water on him without stint.

First, the atomic energy boys who want full control of the Atomic Energy Commission, with no military man on the premises, are all out for MAY's scalp, because MAY thinks we are just plain so-and-so fools to leave the military out of the atomic energy consideration, and thus open the doors to attack by our own devices. Many of these atomic energy fellows are palsy walsy with some of our potential enemies, as has been hinted today in the Committee on Un-American Activities.

Then there are a few Army officers who have not been able to bend ANDREW JACKSON MAY to their way of thinking, and they are not helping the Military Affairs Committee chairman one bit. MAY did not see eye to eye with the Army on the matter of drafting teen-agers. He is against it.

MAY is and always has been a stanch defender of the Government against the horde of radicals, reds and near reds, who infiltrated high places during the war. So, that dangerous crowd and their newspaper and radio pals are squirting MAY with mud. The Military Affairs Committee and its chief investigator, Ralph Burton, has been the object of a violent attack by left-wing propagandists for their Americanism and their stand against dangerous radicalism in the Army.

Senator MEAD seeks nomination for Governor of New York on the Democratic ticket and his opponent probably will be Governor Dewey. He must produce something big and startling by the early part of August to make it appear he is the one great statesman the Empire State needs.

In New York, a convention of delegates chooses the nominee. Senator MEAD has a lot of delegates pledged and is a strong possibility, but his friends want to keep him in the limelight and apparently they don't care whom they hurt, nor what fine character they assassinate. In New York, former Governor Lehman, the late unsuccessful head of UNRRA, wanted to go to the Senate to follow MEAD, and the Little Flower, LaGuardia, wanted to be either Senator or Governor. I mention those as parts of the picture and I also want to point out that the New York Democratic bosses, which include Jim Farley and Boss Flynn, may not want MEAD, hence, MEAD'S attempt at a strong build-up.

His immediate Washington supporters have been playing for headlines rather than results in the investigation so far.

And, by the way, the May committee on the House side can start its own investigation and, for that matter, has been carrying on an undercover probe for 4 years. As a partial result, as I have disclosed to you, a frightened band of Reds and pinks have been exposed and moved off the danger spots—now this kick-back!

The atomic bomb makes the headline of the week but first here is an important message directed to you ladies:

While a board of experts today informed the President that the atomic bomb tests in the Pacific have proved their worth, and have demonstrated that great naval redesign must be undertaken to save naval personnel from atomic destruction, in Congress also a bomb explodes when from the Committee on Un-American Activities comes the strong hint that there is deep anti-American skullduggery underway on the Oak Ridge, Tenn., reservation where atomic energy material is being made. Chairman WOOD receives information from the committee investigator, Ernie Adamson, that some of the so-called scientific societies on the job are cloaks for un-American activities whose success would put America on the defensive against potential enemies. WOOD will at once start a move to put atomic energy control into the sole hands of the military and make Oak Ridge a complete Army reservation. America's atomic energy could be used to blow Americanism to its death and produce the form of totalitarian dictatorship now rife in middle Europe.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. GWYNNE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a copy of a letter written to the editor of the Des Moines Register, a newspaper published in Des Moines, Iowa:

JULY 12, 1946.

THE EDITOR;
Des Moines Register,
Des Moines, Iowa.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: I have never before written you about your editorials, although many have impressed me as unfair and some as definitely untruthful.

However, your editorial in a recent issue of the Des Moines Register concerning the so-called endorsement of my candidacy by Gerald L. K. Smith contains so many insinuations that I thought it only fair to make this answer.

As I told the representatives of the press, I do not know Gerald L. K. Smith, nor any member of his organization. I was, of course, never consulted about his endorsement, and even now know nothing about it except what I have read in the papers.

I am told that it is the practice of Mr. Smith to go about the country making endorsements. In these busy and trying times when so many problems are before us most people have treated Gerald Smith with the silent contempt he deserves and which would soon relegate him to the limbo of forgotten things. But since you have chosen to make an issue of it, I wish to advise all concerned of my views concerning Mr. Smith and concerning certain other related matters.

I am very much opposed to all attempts from any source to stir up racial or religious prejudice or to array one group in this country against another. So, therefore, I condemn the activities of Gerald L. K. Smith and his so-called organization and intend to speak and act against him at every opportunity.

So there will be no misunderstanding, I reaffirm my opposition to making loans to Britain or Russia, to breaking down immigration barriers, to all attempts to destroy our form of government either by force and violence or by sneaking, lying propaganda. I would keep America a nation of religious freedom as guaranteed in the Constitution. I would deal sympathetically and justly with all peoples; but our own country must always have the first claim on our resources, our affections, and our blood.

But I would like to add a few other persons and groups whom I think are also conducting themselves in a manner detrimental to the interests of true Americanism.

Certain columnists and radio commentators have consistently carried on smear campaigns and made statements calculated to appeal to prejudice and mass hysteria. The Des Moines Register has carried some of these columns, many of them unfriendly to our form of government and to small business—your advertisers incidentally. Just how you justify this irresponsible journalism I have never been able to understand.

While I am on the subject, permit me to say a word about the general tone of your parlor pink editorials which differ from those of the Communist Daily Worker only in degree. You have consistently defended the attempts of this administration to foist on the American people a strangling bureaucracy such as the OPA. You have been a groveling apologist for Communistic Russia regardless of how her actions may endanger our own form of government. You have given aid and comfort to groups whose principal aim is to destroy America.

It is a great comfort to me that the overwhelming majority of newspapers in our country do not accept your selfish and vicious philosophy both as to journalism and as to government.

I trust my views both on Gerald L. K. Smith and the Des Moines Register have been made clear.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. GWYNNE.

Contributing to the Peace of the World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot of talk these days about peace and brotherhood and international good will, and just to keep the record straight, I am submitting a newspaper item from today's papers. This indicates the tremendous cooperation which Russia is extending other countries in connection with everything that she is doing in contributing to the peace of the world.

Secretary of State James F. Byrnes, a somewhat noted authority on international matters, is reported today to have said in Paris that Russia, which has demanded ten billions in reparations from Germany, has already had fourteen billions in property, which amounts to the same thing as reparations. Mr. Byrnes is quoted as having said that Russia has taken property and materials valued at $14,000,000,000.

This is an altruistic and Christianlike approach to the program of international good will among all nations, tongues, and creeds which has no counterpart in the history of the human race.

I wonder what the United Nations thinks about it. I wonder what Mr. Byrnes thinks about it. I have lost track of the many trips that he has made to foreign countries for the purpose of negotiating a treaty of peace or holding a peace conference. He has worn out a lot of shoe leather. Up to date the only thing that has been accomplished in making good the promises which were held forth when the United States entered World War II has been the wearing out of shoe leather. This, of course, is not very much. I just want these facts on record for the benefit of those people who take the position that the Russians are suspicious of us and they have good reason to be. The report of Mr. Byrnes' statement appears in the Washington Daily News, Friday, July 12, 1946, and is as follows:

BYRNES CHARGES: SOVIET RECEIVED FOURTEEN BILLIONS IN REPARATIONS FROM REICH

PARIS, July 12.—Secretary of State James F. Byrnes today charged that Russia, which has demanded $10,000,000,000 in reparations from Germany, actually has already received direct and indirect reparations of $14,000,000,00.

Byrnes made the charge in a formal statement issued as the Big Four foreign ministers entered what was expected to be their final day of conferences preparatory to the 21-nation peace conference July 29.

Byrnes said that the transfer of Silesia, most of which has gone to Poland, and the acquisition of Koenigsberg have given Russia property and materials which he estimated to be worth $14,000,000,000.

I am quite sure that the facts above set forth are correct because all of us realize that Mr. James F. Byrnes is a very outstanding American citizen and that he has reason to be accurate in this instance. I repeat that if this attitude, which demands ten billions in addition to fourteen billions already obtained is to prevail at the conference which will be held July 29, then we may well look upon the future with apprehension and concern.

Stop British Aggression in Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein an ad which appeared in the Boston Traveler, Wednesday, July 3, 1946:

IN THE NAME OF FREEDOM STOP BRITISH AGGRESSION IN PALESTINE—DEMAND JUSTICE FOR THE JEWISH PEOPLE

While America celebrates its Independence Day, troops of Great Britain are arresting thousands of leaders of the Jewish community in the Holy Land, confiscating Jewish property, and making a shambles of Jewish rights.

We ask, What is behind this undeclared war on the Jews?

Is Great Britain attempting to liquidate the Jewish national home?

Has it turned over a new and bloody leaf in its policy of betrayal initiated in 1939 by the Chamberlain government?

CAUSE FOR ALARM

As freedom-loving Americans, interested in lasting world peace, we are greatly alarmed over the trend of events.

A short while ago, in its open repudiation of the recommendations of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, Great Britain refused to allow the immediate admittance of 100,000 Jews into Palestine.

Now, as if in answer to the storm of condemnation that has broken upon her, Britain is employing her military might to smash the morale of the Jewish people in Palestine, at the same time continuing her traditional policy of Arab appeasement and failure to live up to the mandate given her by the League of Nations.

Is Britain's word to be trusted no longer in international affairs?

MR. BEVIN RENEGES

Even as British troops, without warrant, throw Jewish men and women into prison, the recent words of Foreign Minister Ernest Bevin ring out in hollow mockery of honor among men and nations.

Mr. Bevin, who helped create the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, had publicly asserted that the British Government would carry out the recommendations of the committee if they were unanimous.

When the committee reported unanimously in favor of immediate admittance of 100,000 Jews into the Holy Land, Mr. Bevin hesitated, sought loopholes, and, finding none, exploded in a speech that will rank as one of the most anti-Semitic of all time.

INSULTS TO THE UNITED STATES

He publicly insulted the people of the United States by attempting to impute their support of the committee's recommendations to a desire to keep the displaced Jews of Europe out of this country, in spite of the fact that the Jews of Europe themselves had voted almost to a man to go to Palestine.

He publicly insulted the Congress of the United States, which has gone on record favoring the immediate admittance of 100,000 Jews into Palestine.

He publicly insulted the President of the United States, who has striven unceasingly to help the ill-fed, ill-clothed, homeless Jews find a haven in the land of their fathers.

Now that Mr. Bevin's shocking words have been spoken, Britain is displaying equally shocking tactics, reminiscent of the Gestapo, to bring the Jewish population of Palestine to its knees.

What has Britain offered in defense of her actions?

She says she is out to smash the Hagana, the Jewish underground self-defense army. With the full facts before it, what did the Anglo-American Committee have to say about the Hagana? The committee recognized the vital need for an organization of its kind, declared it should not be disarmed.

MINUTEMEN OF PALESTINE

Frank Buxton, one of the American members of the Committee, compared the Hagana with the American minutemen of the Revolutionary War.

Clearly the Hagana is not the issue. Can it be the Jewish Agency?

The Jewish Agency in Palestine is made up of Zionist and non-Zionist members the world over, including the United States. According to the League of Nations mandate and the United Nations Charter, the Jewish Agency is the officially recognized spokesman for world Jewry. It expresses our own views in deploring any and all acts of violence however their origin.

In the dark days of the last war when Rommel was on the march toward Egypt and the Suez Canal, it was the Jewish Agency which helped Britain turn the tide. The Jewish Agency, mobilizing Jewish manpower and industry, was the oasis in a sea of support given the Axis by the Arab world.

SAVED AMERICAN LIVES

The Jewish Agency and the Jewish people in Palestine saved countless lives of American boys during the north African campaign by their all-out military and economic help.

The Arabs, and particularly their leader, the Mufti, on the other hand, waged a vigorous campaign in behalf of the Axis. Had it not been for them, many American boys would be alive today instead of finding graves on a foreign shore.

A TACTICAL "ESCAPE"

To the everlasting disgrace of Great Britain, the Mufti, Hitler's hatchet man during the war, has been allowed to "escape" to lead the Arab fight against the Jews in Palestine. Can it be that Britain's tactics of intimidation have been timed with this "escape" to create the utmost havoc among the Jewish population?

No, we cannot sit idly by and allow these acts of aggression to go unchallenged and uncondemned.

In this atomic age we must trust the words of men and of nations if the world is to escape disaster. Here is an example of a flagrant violation of a nation's trust. Here is an example of a world power, sitting in the councils of the mighty, defying a committee whose recommendations she promised she would enforce, and imposing instead a reign of terror.

Is this what the Second World War was fought for?

It is fitting that on this Independence Day, a day hallowed in the hearts of all Americans, we make it known to the world that freedom-loving people, wherever they may be, are not alone in their struggle against tyranny and oppression.

HOW CAN YOU HELP

Write or wire the President, asking him to take a firm stand against this international outrage. Write or wire your Congressman and Senators, urging them also to do everything in their power to implement the committee's report to allow the immediate admittance of 100,000 Jews into Palestine.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I desire to again call to the attention of the House the plight of our aged citizens. We have seen the costs of living soar to a point where their pitiful allowances in the form of old-age pensions have become so meager that it is a disgrace to the world's richest Nation. Now the House is crying huge tears over the British Empire, and giving serious consideration to the matter of appropriating billions for the purpose of stabilizing Empire economy. It is argued that this appropriation will be important to the future well being of the United States. They say it is necessary to maintain a market for American goods and services in the postwar period. This, Mr. Speaker, is open to argument. Why is it better for American trade, American workers, or the American economy to establish dollar purchasing power in the hands of Great Britain, France, Russia, or any other neighbor country than it is to establish the dollar market through the hands of our own worthy senior citizens? Why is it better business to make easy money available to foreign customers than to make it available to our own veterans? How can a dollar spent here by a citizen of the British Commonwealth of Nations do more for the American economy than a dollar spent by a senior American citizen, or an American veteran?

Mr. Speaker, I have been raising these questions on this floor, in the press, and over the radio for some time. Many of my colleagues share the position I hold in this matter. In fact I have a request in writing, signed by 75 Members of the House, requesting that the matter of considering the loan to Britain be deferred until proper consideration shall have been given to the matter of adequate pensions for the aged and veterans' legislation. In behalf of these 75 Members of the House I again call upon this body to give heed to this very important matter. May I remind the House that it is our first duty to represent the citizens of the United States of America. Once this is done, and done properly, then, and not until then, should we take time out to legislate to restore or maintain the economy of Great Britain or any other country.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the July 11 edition of the Gary (Ind.) Post-Tribune, its editor, H. B. Snyder, briefly and concisely outlined one of the major reasons why the British loan resolution should be ratified by the Congress. The Gary Post-Tribune has in the past been classified as an independent newspaper with a leaning to the Republican Party on most domestic issues.

Mr. Snyder has maintained a policy of informing the readers of his newspaper of America's responsibility, as the world's leading nation, to participate in a program for future peace, both commercial and military.

BRITISH LOAN TO PASS

It is now believed in Washington that the House of Representatives will pass the British Loan Act within a few days. The loan is being debated and a careful computation indicates there will be enough votes for its passage although the margin will be slim.

Any other result would be close to an international calamity because the failure of the act would end the era of good feeling and cooperation between the two countries. This relationship was the basic reason for our war victory. Together we were irresistible. And we can continue to be irresistible in peace if we stand together.

For a time it appeared that the opposition to the loan might defeat it. Many Americans still have no conception of our international position and some of our officials made the mistake of trying to sell the loan as a good business deal.

Of course, it is a good business deal in the larger meaning of good business but it is hardly a good loan for money-making purposes. We may get the money back but it is a fair bet we won't. That, as we see it, makes no difference. We are not loaning for the purposes of money profits but to retain our place in world affairs.

Together the United States and Britain cannot be shoved aside, they must be heard. But with the United States departing from Europe and refusing to act as a partner to Britain in international controls the future would appear very dark.

Apparently the broader view is being taken by a majority of the House of Representatives. With the loan act passed we can then proceed to carry out the various parts of the economic and other agreements already agreed upon, all of which are required to handle the job facing us and other nations.

The Road to Survival Leads to the Right

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House of Representatives to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by me at Fort Stevens, Washington, D. C., on the occasion of the eighty-second anniversary of the battle of Fort Stevens:

This is a historic spot. We stand on sacred ground. Gettysburg was the crucial point of Confederate penetration into Federal territory. Fort Stevens was the crucial point of defense against the Confederate attempt to capture the city of Washington. Although not a large-scale engagement, its significance is not surpassed by any contest of arms during the four tear-drenched years of the Civil War.

Had the Confederates succeeded here at Fort Stevens and captured the Nation's Capital, they might have been recognized by foreign powers desirous of seeing us divided. History and destiny sometimes hang by a very thin thread.

It was the fact that General Early received a message from one of his subordinate officers who was near Baltimore, 82 years ago tonight, informing him that not one corps but two of the Union Army had arrived in Washington, that caused the Confederate general to delay the assault until daylight, when he might determine whether these defenses were heavily manned. His binoculars told him the story at dawn. It was too late.

The battle here presented one of the strange anomalies of war. The Southern Army under General Early approached from the north. The northern army advanced from the south. Here a President of the United States, in office, was under fire. Here the only battle ever fought in the District of Columbia took place. Here occurred the last aggressive attempt by General Lee to break the fast forging ring of military power around the Confederate Army near Richmond.

Lee deemed the failure of Early to capture Washington of such magnitude that he urged all information of it be kept from the southern people, lest their morale be weakened. Nevertheless, let us remember that they who fought here were all Americans.

Three times since the tragic War Between the States we have demonstrated to the world that we are a united people and that there is no North nor South, nor East nor West, whenever freedom and our beloved land are threatened by a foreign foe.

We trust in God. We believe in the Christian faith. We believe in life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Those things are not granted by man. They come down to us from heaven and are inherent in us from birth. They have been woven into the fabric of our Government. The flower of American manhood died in all parts of the world that those principles might live. Upon us, the living, falls the sacred trust to preserve them.

I sometimes wonder if we are faithful to our trust. We have inherited the country. We enjoy the benefits of the sacrifices our heroes made. Are we alert and vigilant in guarding the trust imposed in us, or are we becoming complacent and indifferent to the blessings we enjoy under this Republic?

We have been moving away from the time-tested principles on which our Government was founded, principles which have lifted the weights from the shoulders of men and given hope to the oppressed of the earth. We have been moving to the left and toward totalitarian government.

Benjamin Franklin, on a day in September 1787, when he signed the new Constitution of the United States, was asked what kind of government he had sponsored, "A Republic, if we can keep it," was his prompt reply. Seventy-six years later, Lincoln asked the same question at Gettysburg in different words, "Can a nation conceived in liberty long endure?"

Now, fourscore and three years later we are asking the same question. Can our American way of life and self-government survive? Well might we ask ourselves that question and do something about it. Liberty has been vanishing in other lands. It can also vanish from America.

When Lincoln asked his question at Gettysburg, he must have had in mind the danger of our destruction from within, for we were not being attacked from without. He foresaw more than 80 years ago what every loyal American should fear now, when he said, "At what point is the danger to be expected? If it ever reaches us, it must spring up among us. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen we must live through all time or die by suicide."

During the last decade or more, we have witnessed an unmistakable trend toward the fulfillment of Lincoln's prophecy. There has been a definite infiltration into every activity of the American people by an ideology of government which has given notice to us and to the world that it intends to destroy us and everything for which we stand.

Communism is getting a foothold in our schools, labor unions, business, even in our churches and in our National Government. Able and patriotic public servants in high positions within the Federal Government have resigned or have been otherwise removed through the subtle influence of those who practice communism.

Undisputed evidence that these enemies within our gates are boring from within our Government is the stealing from the State Department, Naval Intelligence, and other Government agencies, in wartime, of secret and highly confidential files.

We know that they took more than one hundred of them, containing information affecting our national defense. Most of them were found in the offices of a pro-Communist magazine more than 250 miles away from Washington.

Had this happened in some other government, those who committed the offense would have been shot at dawn without a trial. Here the guilty were released upon payment of a nominal fine. What is this thing called communism? It is an ideology of government under which the state is god and master, the individual but a number and a servant of the state. It is anti-God and antireligion. Its purpose is to destroy all other governments and to eliminate private ownership of property.

Under communism no one can own a foot of land or hire anyone to run even a newsstand or a barber shop. There is but one employer, the state. You work for it or starve. You live and work where you are told. You take the job it gives you and like it.

Under communism there is but one political party, one ticket. There is no choice. The radio and press are owned by the state. You hear and read what the state permits and no more. It is physical and mental slavery.

Communism calls itself democracy but denies the basic principle of democracy, which is government by the consent of the governed. It has been moving westward. It has made large advances in and now threatens to dominate all of Europe. Its heel has been planted on our shores.

It can happen here. Our Nation has been moving on the road to the left. It presents a challenge to every loyal and patriotic American. There can be no compromise with this menace. The two systems of government, one based on freedom and justice, the other on fear and terror, cannot live side by side in the same country. One or the other must die.

That is the issue before the American people. This Nation cannot endure half American and half Communist. Ours is the decision to make, and the task of carrying forward the torch of freedom and passing it on to our children undefiled.

Indifference and complacency must be replaced by alertness and vigilance. They are still the price we must pay. On this eighty-second anniversary of the battle of Fort Stevens and on this sacred and historic spot is a most appropriate time for us to rededicate ourselves to the preservation of the fundamental principles on which the Nation was founded and which we enjoy as a free people.

If the collectivist theory is embraced, we are on the road to the destruction, not only of individual liberty, but of the very foundations on which this country grew great and strong.

Freedom has always provided the urge for man to go forward. Throughout the ages, millions have died for that precious thing. It will be defended and preserved only when there is an awakening through our land that touches every heart and arouses within us a new appreciation of our heritage.

Let us, then, my fellow citizens, turn our thoughts and hearts with undiminished energy to this "land of youth and freedom where the air is full of sunlight and the flag is full of stars"; for the only road to survival leads to the right.

Minnesota Elections Aid British Loan Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence, from the Washington Evening Star of July 11, 1946:

MINNESOTA ELECTIONS AID BRITISH LOAN BILL—DEFEAT OF ISOLATIONISTS RAISES REPUBLICAN PARTY'S PRESTIGE

(By David Lawrence)

Did the Minnesota primary election assure the passage of the British loan in the House of Representatives?

Many competent observers in Congress think the answer is "Yes." They do not argue that the election itself made new votes in the House but that it prevented the wavering and doubting few from voting against the loan.

For several days now it has been recognized on Capitol Hill that the number of on-the-fence votes constituted a balance of power which would be sufficient to defeat the loan bill. Opponents insisted that sentiment through the Middle West was strongly against the loan. The Minnesota election furnished a natural test, because the issue was debated there between two rival candidates for the Republican senatorial nomination. Certainly if ever there was a clear-cut demarcation as between the international-minded and the so-called isolationist attitude, it was to be found in the Minnesota primary election.

Not only did former Governor Thye, who won the nomination, make his position clear in favor of the British loan and international cooperation but he had behind him one of the most outstanding champions of international unity—Harold Stassen, whose views are closely associated in the public mind with those of the late Wendell Willkie.

ISOLATIONISM OBSOLETE

The decisive victory means much more than an indication to the Republican Party in the House of Representatives that the isolationist argument now can be beaten in a word that has been shrunk in size by air-power and improved communications, to say nothing of atomic bombs. It means that the Republican Party can no longer be called isolationist just because a few of its members here and there cling to their prewar concepts of foreign policy.

The Republican Party in the House of Representatives has an opportunity now to emerge on the roll call on the British loan bill as a party that does not consider foreign policy a partisan affair.

If the preponderant number of Republicans do vote for the British loan, it will be a sign that the Republican Party is siding not only with former Governor Stassen but with Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, and Senator AUSTIN, of Vermont, who have succeeded in recent months in doing more to achieve a bipartisan front in world affairs for the American Government than have any other men in the Senate in more than a quarter of a century.

For it was the Republican Party which went isolationist after World War I and many of its strongest spokesmen kept that attitude up to the Pearl Harbor episode, thus making European statesmen doubtful as to what the United States could be expected to do if the terms of the Kellogg peace treaties outlawing war and aggression were violated.

FOREIGN POLICY UNITY

There is no way of being sure what might have happened in Europe if the course of the United States had been as plainly marked out in the thirties as it is today with respect to the preservation of peace in Europe. Such an attitude on our part then might have assisted in strengthening the group of nations who saw Hitler rising but did not dare alone to challenge him.

In any event, the fact that the Republican Party is playing a constructive part today in keeping foreign policy from becoming a political issue is an important achievement. It means that the Republican Party will not be selecting its next Presidential nominee on the basis of foreign policy views but on what might be termed domestic economic policy. The views of Messrs. Stassen and VANDENBERG may differ as to domestic issues, but on foreign policy they stand together in upholding the United Nations and such measures as are being proposed to bring about economic stability through the grant of intergovernmental credits.

The Minnesota primary defeated Senator SHIPSTEAD, who voted against the United Nations Charter and who doubtless felt that the Middle West would revert to its 1920 point of view. Minnesota proved by its votes that he was wrong. The prestige of the Republican Party has risen immeasurably.

United States Military Forces in Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I have long believed that a nation which believes that its national interests are threatened anywhere in the world must be willing to risk conflict if necessary to protect those interests, or those interests may not be protected. In this connection, the following editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of July 8 is extremely pertinent:

UNITED STATES IS URGED TO GIVE BRITAIN MILITARY SUPPORT IN PALESTINE—ARABS HELD MUCH LESS LIKELY TO BEGIN WAR AGAINST TWO-POWER FRONT THAN AGAINST THE BRITISH ALONE, AND 100,000 JEWS MUST BE SAVED

(By George Fielding Eliot)

Are American troops really needed, as British official spokesmen claim, to prevent serious Arab disorders in Palestine in connection with the proposed admittance of 100,000 additional Jewish immigrants to that country? The problem is not just the control of the Arab inhabitants of Palestine. It also extends to the possibility that the surrounding Arab states may send help in the way of arms and funds to the Palestinian Arabs if the latter should start armed resistance to the coming of more Jewish immigrants.

There are two points of view which are being strongly put forward: one by the British, who appear to regard the possibility of resistance as most serious, and possibly as extending to the equivalent of a war with the whole Moslem population of the Middle East; the other by the Zionists, who claim stoutly that all talk of resistance is an Arab bluff, that in fact the Arabs would be unable to put up any serious fight. Some Zionists go so far as to say that the British know it is a bluff but are using the Arab threats as excuses for doing nothing.

ANALYSIS OF FACTS

It may, therefore, be useful to subject the known facts to a little analysis.

First and foremost of these facts, from the American point of view, is the terrible fact that unless these 100,000 Jews—the really desperate cases—are removed to Palestine very shortly they will perish in misery and despair. For them there is now no other hope but Palestine. They have fixed the eyes of their souls on this promised land. If it is denied them they will die. On this point all observers are agreed.

The second fact is that threats of armed resistance have been made by various representatives of the Arab point of view.

The third fact is that the British Government, which holds the mandate for Palestine, apparently takes these threats seriously and has asked that the United States Government participate in bearing military as well as financial responsibility if that part of the report of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry recommending the immediate admittance to Palestine of the desperate 100,000 Jews is to be implemented.

The fourth fact is that this recommendation will not be carried out unless the British Government assents to it.

Very well, then. Why not meet the conditions which the British Government considers essential? Why not send American forces to the eastern Mediterranean?

There are only two possibilities: either the Arabs will resist or they will not.

They are much more likely to resist the British alone than they are the combination of Britain and the United States. There is, in fact, evidence in recent dispatches from Palestine that Arab leaders are getting somewhat nervous about the possibility that the United States might, after all, send troops to Palestine.

If the Arabs do not resist, then there will be no trouble, and we shall have suffered nothing worse than the expense of sending a division or two and perhaps an air group on a long and tiresome journey. This is surely a very little price to pay for saving 100,000 lives.

If the Palestinian Arabs do resist, that resistance will be far more quickly overcome by the presence of ample force to deal with disturbers of the peace. Moreover, we may well expect that neighboring Arab states will be much more hesitant to support the Palestinian Arabs against both America and Britain than against Britain alone.

UNITED STATES CAPITAL NEEDED

King Ibn Saud, for example, has done some large-size talking about canceling the Arabian-American Co.'s oil concession, but he will hesitate to deprive himself of the major part of his revenue, especially with American troops on his threshold. Indeed, the whole area of the Middle East must now look very largely to American capital and American commercial enterprise for that measure of economic recovery which it so badly needs and from which alone the Arab lands may in due course attain the internal stability essential to resist Russian pressure against their land frontiers and Russian political penetration in various forms. To this internal stability of the middle eastern region as a whole, the coming of additional hard-working, enterprising Jewish immigrants to Palestine can be a wholesome contribution, and they will bring with them a flow of capital from Jewish and other American sources. They are a danger, in fact, only to those who would perpetuate an ancient and outworn feudal order and who, therefore, cannot bear to see the success of a democratic experiment on their borders.

The time has come for action. The Anglo-American discussions now in progress in London can hardly hope for quick success unless the American Government is willing to cut the Gordian knot and say: "Very well, then, if you say you need troops, troops you shall have. But these lives must be saved—for they are the lives of a people to whom western civilization owes a debt of blood."

A Needed Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel:

A NEEDED LAW

Some years ago a paper which believed with Thomas Jefferson that that government governs best which governs least, started a movement it called Repeal a law a week. It was aimed to relieve the American people of the great burden of useless and hampering legislation which oppresses them. It did not get far, for the time was premature.

Today there is pending in Congress a bill to counteract some of the evil effects of this weight of laws without repealing any of them. It is the judicial review bill, and has already been passed by the Senate. Its author is Senator PAT MCCARRAN, of Nevada, one of the small but able group of Jeffersonian Democrats in the upper Chamber.

As we all know, our governmental octopus has been expanding for years through the addition of bureaus, boards and commissions which follow what is called administrative law, as distinct from what may be called judicial law, or practice before courts under long established rules of evidence and procedure. Under administrative law, the procedure follows rules set up by the administrators, and there can be no judicial review of all rulings made by these. The citizen is helpless to know all these rules, and has to depend upon lawyers expert in this sort of law, usually persons who have held governmental positions in the past on administrative staffs. In most grade A law schools of today, special courses are given in administrative law, which gives an idea of the importance the subject has attained in our business and public life.

Under Senator MCCARRAN'S bill, there would be a reversal of this trend that takes the Government of the people away from the judicial arm, chosen as provided in the Constitution, and gives it to bureaucrats selected by the executive. There would be an end to the illegitimate process of empowering the executive to short circuit the protection which the courts were to give the citizen, a process which is destroying the checks and balances of the three coordinate branches set up by our fundamental law. This end would be accomplished simply by making the acts, rulings, and decrees of the administrators subject to review by the courts.

That we shall get such a measure enacted into law under this regime is, of course, extremely doubtful. The New Dealers, as well as the simon pure bureaucrats who are not even philosophical enough to be New Dealers, are dead set against it, for it means the beginning of the end of their autocratic power. But it is a hopeful sign for the future freedom of the people—when they have placed a representative of their own in the White House.

Removal of Price Ceilings on Grain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER E. MERROW
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, on May 8 I introduced H. R. 6374, a bill to amend the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 so as to remove price controls with respect to grain and grain products. I felt that such action would bring relief to New England; that with ceilings removed those engaged in the farming industry would be able to purchase much needed grain.

Mr. Speaker, since July 1 OPA has been dead, and I for one hope that it will never be resurrected. Since July 1 it has been possible to purchase grain in the State of New Hampshire. The fact that poultrymen and livestock owners have been able to buy feed during the last 11 days means that what was needed in order to relieve the grain situation was the removal of price ceilings on grain. What has happened during the last 11 days is ample proof that to return to price control would be disastrous.

George M. Putnam, president of the New Hampshire Farm Bureau Federation, sent me the following telegram under date of July 11:

We appreciate action taken by Senate on dairy, poultry products, and meat. We regret failure to include feed grains. Putting ceilings back on grain is about the worst thing that could happen to our poultry and dairy industries in New Hampshire. Since OPA went out our grain men have been able to buy. If ceilings come back we will be in same situation as before, which you know was approaching a calamity. Is there any way left in which feed grains can be removed from ceiling control.

GEORG M. PUTNAM,
President, New Hampshire Farm Bureau Federation.

I have received many communications from New Hampshire and have talked with many people since the 1st of July. I am assured that the very critical grain situation has been markedly relieved since the decease of OPA.

Franco Cites Spain's Peril

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Philadelphia Record of July 12, 1946:

FRANCO CITES SPAIN'S PERIL—SAYS COMMUNISTS MAKE LARGE ARMY NECESSARY

(By Randolph Churchill)

MADRID.—In yesterday's column I quoted the answers which Generalissimo Franco gave to a series of questions I submitted to him. Following are his replies to additional questions:

1. "Does the Spanish Government intend to reduce the size of the Spanish armed forces in the near future? How many troops are under arms at the moment?"

FRANCO. "The Spanish Government finds itself obliged to maintain under arms a force stronger than our normal dispositions on account of the threats which have arisen on our Pyrenean frontier since the end of the war. Very serious aggressions carried out against our territory, attempts at infiltration by bands of terrorists armed in southern France, and the fomentation of crime and sabotage by international communism necessitate a larger military disposition and expenditure than usual. Owing to these circumstances, Spain has under arms some 320,000 men."

ATOMIC RESEARCH

2. "Is Spain undertaking any research in atomic energy? Are any such researches contemplated?"

FRANCO. "Spain has not undertaken any research into atomic energy. She regards it, like gas, as a weapon of unbounded cruelty, incomparably more harmful to civil populations than to actual combatant units. Spain does not at present contemplate carrying out this type of research, but she is attentively following the vicissitudes of experiments abroad."

3. "Following upon the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and the Argentine, is there any likelihood of diplomatic relations being restored between Spain and the Soviet Union? Would Spain welcome entering into relations with Russia?"

FRANCO. "Spain has not hitherto considered resumption of diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union, with which country they have been interrupted for nearly 30 years. Spain feels no kind of animosity or ill will toward the Russian people. Her products are complementary to many of the products of the vast Russian territory, but Spain will not barter her domestic peace and order for the material advantages of any trade, however important it might be. Spain desires that the evolution of Russia which necessarily must arise from the influence exerted upon her by higher civilization may allow her to renew good neighborly relations with western peoples. In such a case, assuredly Spain would constitute no exception."

RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

4. "If the United States continues indefinitely to be represented in Madrid by a chargé d'affaires, is the Spanish Government likely to recall its Ambassador from Washington?"

FRANCO. "The Spanish Government has not considered this case, nor does it read into the absence of a United States Ambassador any other meaning than that which it has in itself. Clearly, if this situation should become permanent, the Government would have to consider it."

Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following letter relative to H. R. 6746, legislation which I introduced:

PORTLAND, OREG., June 28, 1946.
The Honorable B. W. KEARNEY,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN KEARNEY: I was very glad to read your bill, H. R. 6746, providing for the establishment of a Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation. It seems to me that this bill may well be the answer to a most important problem, i. e., the orderly economic development of Alaska.

From all that I can discover, Alaska is still pretty much on an economic dead center at the present time, in spite of the energetic efforts of Mr. Bartlett, Governor Gruening, and others. I think we would be making a very sad mistake if we did not take this opportunity to really get Alaska started. The Territory has the raw materials and the space and the climate to be a well-developed, well-rounded home for several million Americans. All that is needed is the men and the money to provide the impetus to get things started.

There are thousands of GI's like myself, who would like to go to Alaska to live. But the prospect right now seems pretty bleak; high living costs, inadequate transportation, insufficient housing, and very little year-round employment is the report we get. It is also my understanding, although I may be wrong about this, that the loan provisions of the GI bill of rights do not mean much in Alaska, since the banks up there are not eager to handle loans at the low rate of interest provided under that bill. Your proposed Development Corporation could open up some fine opportunities in the Territory.

It would be a wonderful thing if this bill could receive congressional approval in the near future

Sincerely,

WENDELL P. KAY, Jr.

Shipbuilding in the United States at the End of the War and Since

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES J. HEFFERNAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. HEFFERNAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a condensation of an article appearing in the New International Yearbook, 1946 edition, just published by Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York, and written by that leading maritime authority, Commander Wendell Phillips Dodge, editor of the monthly magazine, Marine News, New York:

SHIPBUILDING IN THE UNITED STATES DURING THE YEAR 1945

The greatest shipbuilding program ever attempted in world's history was being completed in the United States during 1945. More than any other one thing, ships and still more ships won global World War II. Without ships—merchant ships more than naval, strange as it may seem—the war in both hemispheres would have been lost by the United Nations to the Axis

From January 1, 1942, through November 1945 there were 5,573 merchant ships of 54,002,123 deadweight tons delivered from all American shipyards.

Contracts for 434 merchant ships remained on Maritime Commission books after cancellation of $425,000,000 in contracts for 135 ships, and three contracts for special military equipment

The outstanding contracts, covering virtually all types from small coastal freighters to P–2 passenger-cargo ships, extend into 1946. With the completion of these contracts, the wartime ship construction program will be ended. In the future contracts will be awarded only for ships needed for postwar trade routes. These contracts will be let through competitive bidding, instead of the wartime speed-up procedure of cost-plus.

The Federal Government has built and now owns shipyard facilities costing approximately 2.3 billion dollars, and private shipbuilders have invested additional huge amounts. The wartime investment of the Federal Government is more than four times the total Government and private investment in shipyard facilities prior to the war.

Shipyards, however, do not comprise the whole ship-building industry. They are the establishments which perform the final assembly, repair, and outfitting of both merchant and fighting vessels. In some instances they also manufacture components and develop design.

The broader industry of shipbuilding in the United States encompasses the manufacture of parts and material throughout the country, as well as the work of designing ships and the assembly and repair of ships in the yards. Every State in the Union contributes something to the building.

At peak wartime activity the entire shipbuilding industry employed an estimated 4,000,000 workers. The manufacturers of the wide variety of materials and components which go into the finished ships are spread throughout the country and employed at the peak of wartime activity an estimated 2,300,000 workers. With the shipyards of the United States located on the shores of the more important rivers, on the Great Lakes, the Gulf coast, and on the Atlantic and Pacific seacoasts, they constitute the greatest concentrations of the Nation's shipbuilding activities, and employed the largest single group out of the millions of workers engaged in the shipbuilding industry, having 1,720,000 employees at the peak.

The United States now has a shipyard capacity far greater than it can conceivably use in times of peace. Since the middle of the nineteenth century this country has not been a leader in shipbuilding. In the last 50 years it has been the world's leading shipbuilder only in the World Wars I and II. During most peacetime years between the two world wars England led the world in the production of merchant tonnage. In fact, in many years Germany and Japan each built and launched a greater tonnage of merchant ships than did the United States. In the 18-year period between 1920 and 1939 the United States built less than 10 percent of the total merchant ship tonnage launched in the world.

The production of large merchant types of seagoing vessels over 2,000 gross tons by American shipyards during 1945, while commendable, cannot compare with the tremendous amount of construction during the last 6 months of 1943, when the peak was reached. However, during the first half of 1945 more than three ships a day were finished.

Prospects for new shipbuilding in the future on a more normal basis are fair. A number of designs have been prepared contemplating the construction of special types of vessels to replace the many that were lost during the war, or radically converted for military use.

October 25, 1944, might have been in important day for the American merchant marine, for President Roosevelt requested the Maritime Commission to prepare a bold and daring plan for its improvement and to maintain its future position. The President stated emphatically we should lose no time in preparing designs for and constructing such vessels. He urged immediate inauguration of the program so that this plan could be a factor in employment and the conversion from war to peacetime economy.

The year 1945 passed through 11½ months before this bold and daring plan by the Maritime Commission was brought to light before the annual meeting of he Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers in New York. It was not so bold and daring, after all, and instead went back to the early 1920's, right after World War I, in North Atlantic passenger-ship design. It went so far as to predict that ultimately, it is believed that the water transportation of passengers will be so decreased as to become rather a minor factor outside the cruise for relaxation and recreation.

Then, this study made under the President's directive demanding a departure from precedent proclaimed that the period of usefulness for such ships should extend through a couple of decades.

The year may take just pride in the fact that on March 1, at exactly 10:16 o'clock in the morning Pacific coast time, the keel was laid for the first vessel to be built for a foreign power in the United States in more than 22 years. This historic keel was for the first of 20 cargo ships costing approximately $8,000,000 ordered from the Albina Engine & Machine Works, Portland, Oreg., by the Netherlands East Indies Government. This contract, the first big peacetime order for foreign ships, was an announcement that Portland, Oreg., can compete with the world in shipbuilding, and the enterprising shipbuilder and designer is the Pacific Coast industrialist, L. R. Hussa, who was building ships way back when Henry J. Kaiser was building highway roads in our Northwest. Hussa is continuing to build ships, without benefit of Federal Government financing.

March witnessed the launching of the first 45,000-ton carrier to be built for the United States Navy, the U. S. S. Midway, in the Dravo-created submerged shipway at the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Co.'s yard, Newport News, Va. This giant graving dock, a Navy secret since it was built in 1941, may be put down as an outstanding development in shipbuilding for 1945. When the great battleship U. S. S. Washington was launched on June 1, 1941, some 25,000 persons witnessed the ceremony. If these spectators had paid $10 each for the privilege, as theatergoers did in principal cities from coast to coast to see and hear the great Spanish "Duse of Song," Señorita Raquel Meller, in 1926, the receipts would barely have covered the actual expense of preparing the launching berth for the thrilling moment when the mighty hull slid down the inclined ways. The sum of about $250,000 is required for the necessary blocking, cradles, greasing, and other expenses incidental to preparing a ship of battleship size for launching on inclined ways.

This actual launching expense is only one of a number of shipbuilding costs which are eliminated or substantially reduced when a horizontal shipway is used instead of inclined ways for ship construction, and the completed vessel is floated, rather than launched.

The beginning of 1945 witnessed the commissioning and operation of the first of four ice breakers of the Wind class, bringing to the United States Coast Guard Fleet an unusual and useful type of vessel. A bow propeller driven by a 3,300-horsepower electric motor creates a wave ahead of the vessel that helps break the ice.

Mention might be made of the possibility of the reversible propeller. While variable pitch or feathering propellers are not new, developments along new designs are being brought forth, largely because of their feasibility with machinery not readily reversible.

A notable step was taken in the development of the gas turbine. While it still may be considered in the experimental stage, it has been the subject of a great deal of investigation and probably will soon be put into practical application. Its possibilities are surprising.

No radical changes in hull designs or particular advancements that have not previously been mentioned have been brought out. Progress along these lines is of necessity slow.

Lobby for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Westwood (N. J.) Chronicle of July 4, 1946:

LOBBY FOR AMERICA

What this country needs is more individuals who feel that adherence to principle is more important than personal political prestige. Cynical realism and political expediency have brought the United States to the brink of despair.

As one American asks in desperate earnestness, "Where are the lobbyists for America, for justice, and for truth?" Millions ask this same question. They are frightened by the atmosphere of horse trading and the jockeying for power so evident in high Government and labor circles at a time when the world is crying for statesmanship as well as food.

It is like a breath of clean mountain air when a responsible person in public or private life speaks out unequivocally for what he believes to be right, and in accordance with basic principles of the American idea of government, even though it may not be the popular thing to say at the moment. Such people are rare today. That is why the country is slowly drifting toward socialism and communism.

There is no one lobbying effectively for solvent Government; for the right of the individual to join or not to join a labor union; for an end to the strangling clutch of Government bureaus on the activities of every private citizen. It is not popular to lobby for these things because too many people have the idea tha' in bureaucracy and organized compulsion lie sanctuary from inflation.

Fear of the hazards o. the postwar world has led to confused restrictions and suppression of natural forces which can only result in an exp'osion of some kind. When it comes those millions who believe in this country and its form of government will have to lobby for America as they never lobbied before.

What There Is in It for Us

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. DELANEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. JOHN J. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of July 12, 1946:

WHAT THERE IS IN IT FOR US

Some time tomorrow the House of Representatives is expected to vote on what is conveniently called the British loan but what is really a $3,750,000,000 "line of credit," plus a settlement of $650,000,000 on lend-lease goods left by us in the United Kingdom. The proposal has had a long journey. Negotiations were begun last September and completed in December. The Senate did not begin committee hearings until March 5 and did not pass the approving resolution, by a vote of 46 to 34, until May 10. The House then rehashed the relevant—and irrelevant—material in 3 weeks of committee hearings of its own, which were completed on June 7. A month and a day later the resolution reached the floor. If any Member of the House does not now know what this is all about it is his own fault.

At this late stage, and to meet the objections of those who are still asking if we have abandoned the principles of the Declaration of Independence, who want to know what Britain has ever done for us, who demand why we should subsidize the British Crown, or who believe that British policy in the Near East, Far East, or elsewhere is wrong, it is worth while to ask what this loan will do for the United States. In the language of the professiona' cynics who condemn any act of generosity toward any foreign country, what is there in it for us?

The first thing in it for us is the liberation of world trade, which will stimulate all our exports and bring in the imports, which also mean jobs for wage earners and comforts for consumers. A commercial struggle with Britain would surely follow the rejection of the proposed credit. Britain would have no choice. She is practically stripped of gold and dollars. She would have to fight us in the world's markets in order to survive. But if we extend this credit she will be able, and has promised, to drop all discriminations against American trade, including the sterling-dollar pool which is now a veritable Atlantic barrier between the two countries. Her prosperity and ours will be linked. In that union lies the reasonable expectation that interest and principle on the loan can be paid during the 50-year period following 1951.

The second thing in it for us is world peace, under a gradually strengthening and broadening United Nations Organization. No one supposes that an economic battle with Britain would end in a military war with her, but if the trade of the world were allowed to fall into chaos and ruin, the peace of the world would not be worth betting on. Former Secretary of State Hull spoke truly yesterday in his letter to Speaker RAYBURN:

"The world is today confronted with an inescapable choice as fraught with decisive significance as any that the human race has ever faced. Reduced to its fundamental terms that choice is between a growing cooperation among nations in the economic, political, and other fields, or a growing hermit-like aloofness on the part of nations toward each other, which must inevitably lead to increasing international discord and possibly to the final supreme catastrophe of another world war."

If we cannot cooperate with Britain, nearest of all nations to us in history and tradition, how can we cooperate with other members of the United Nations? The experiment in cooperation which this credit proposes is only a beginning, but it is a necessary beginning. If the House says "Yes" tomorrow, world reconstruction in a vast and important area can be started.

Resolution of Nanticoke (Pa.) Business Men's Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Nanticoke Business Men's Association, Nanticoke, Pa., that the Federal Government is about to dispose of its so-called Big Inch and Little Inch pipe lines, constructed during the late war for transportation of crude oil to the refineries on the eastern seaboard, and that said pipe line extend from the Texas oil and gas fields to terminals on the eastern seaboard with facilities for branch pipe lines to municipalities in the Middle Atlantic States; and

Whereas said pipe lines are adaptable for the transportation of natural gas and if put to such use would be in direct competition with anthracite coal in the market area of anthracite: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this body go on record as opposed to any use of said pipe lines or sale by the Federal Government for the transportation of natural gas, for the reason that competition between natural gas and anthracite in the Middle Atlantic States would result in a further shrinkage of anthracite sales with a corresponding depressing effect upon the general welfare of this community; and be it further

Resolved, That communities in the anthracite producing counties of Pennsylvania be informed of our action and copies of this resolution be transmitted to Senator JOSEPH F. GUFFEY and FRANCIS J. MYERS and Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD.

The Real Labor Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Hearst newspapers of June 6, 1946:

THE REAL LABOR PROBLEM

The administration's so-called labor policy appears to be confused and aimless only if it is viewed as separate and distinct from anything else that goes on in Washington.

It takes on a very different aspect when it is considered in conjunction with almost every other administration policy.

It is of the same nature as the New Deal's reconversion program, by which the supply of merchandise—from fuels and raw materials to finished products, from the farms and cattle ranges to the meat packers and the dairy kitchens, from the cotton fields and wool yards to the textile mills and the clothing shops—is bossed from the Capital by the Administrator of Civilian Production, by the Office of Price Administration, and by the Economic Stabilizer.

It embodies the same spirit and purpose as the administration's housing plans and a long list of similar legislative schemes, ranging from socialized medicine and Federal control of scientific research to vast centralized satrapies supplanting State and local governments in the great river valleys.

It belongs in the same category as the British loan agreement and the use of Export-Import Bank funds, the actual effect of which will be to create an international trade organization in which American finance, industry and commerce will be subjected to bureaucratic domination abroad as well as at home.

The policy is, in fact, one segment in a complete system of controlled economy that is being riveted part by part upon the uncomprehending Nation by diverse and devious methods.

At present this labor policy is being enforced in the guise of emergency measures to deal with the long series of demoralizing strikes in vital industries.

President Truman's temporary antistrike bill would have given congressional sanction to the policy for an indeterminate period.

Within that period permanent legislation was to be prepared: and, with so much power already exercised by the Government, it is a foregone conclusion that the permanent law would simply make the emergency permanent.

The essence of the New Deal's postwar labor policy is governmental wage fixing.

The wage-fixing is accomplished by the device of Government seizure of private property in which a strike occurs—a peacetime misuse of wartime power which was first flagrantly and unconstitutionally abused in the Montgomery Ward seizure.

Having seized a plant or industry, the administration substitutes Government operation for private operation.

The next step is for the Government to settle the strike—itself determining, acceptably to the labor bosses, the wage rates and working conditions of the men by a pretense of collective bargaining.

When that has been done, the owners and operators, who have no voice in the strike settlement, can recover their properties only by accepting the terms which the Government and the labor bosses have made.

There is no assurance, in law or elsewhere, that the settlements will be such as the affected industries will be financially able to sustain—the alternative prospect being continuous Government operation, or Government ownership.

In his emergency antistrike bill, the President proposed a still further usurpation—that any profits accruing during Government operation should not be left to the business but should be retained by the Government.

Here is a form of outright confiscation the like of which has never before been suggested by an American administration.

There is a way—an American way—of solving the labor problem, but it is not the New Deal's way.

First, legislation is needed to abolish the inequities and racketeering evils inherent in the Wagner Act.

Second. The Corrupt Practices Acts must be applied in politics against labor unions as well as business corporations.

Third. Labor unions should be required to incorporate, to hold honest elections, and to account for their funds.

Fourth. Labor unions as well as employers should be held legally liable for breach of contracts.

Fifth. The equity powers of the courts to issue injunctions in strikes, especially against illegal actions, should be fully restored.

Sixth. Judicial tribunals to hear and determine as arbitrators all labor disputes should be established—impartial courts to which labor or industry could readily resort, just as citizens now appeal to civil courts for the redress of grievances and settlement of disputes, instead of taking the law violently into their own hands.

Two things must be abolished—(1) Government seizure, by Executive orders, of private property and (2) wage fixing by governmental bureaucracies or political appointees.

If, on the other hand, the Federal Government is to have permanent power to determine wages, then also the Federal Government must have permanent power to fix prices and to control all the processes of production and distribution.

This is obviously the power the New Deal wants—and is really using now—because it is a part of the New Deal's entire program of socialism and regimentation.

This is exactly what the New Deal must not have if the American people are to become again a free people and if our matchless economic and social progress is to be resumed.

Bevin Breaks Palestine Pledge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including portions of a speech I made on the Palestine question in Atlantic City, on February 10, 1946, and supplementing that statement by a brief review of the continuing struggle for justice for the Jewish people. A quarter century has passed since the Balfour Declaration, a quarter century of broken promises. And months and years have passed without effective aid from our Government.

Let us deal with the problem of Palestine in three parts: as a moral question, in its legal status, and in its political aspects.

Surely those of us who propose that Palestine shall be open to free and unrestricted Jewish immigration have no need to defend our position on moral grounds.

THE MORAL ISSUE

For centuries the treatment accorded Jewish minorities has been a blot on the record of civilization. Crowded always in the least desirable sections of European cities, and living at all only at the sufferance of majority groups, their history in Europe has been a tragic tale, marked at the best with inferior status, and at the worst by outbreaks of disgraceful savagery on the part of their oppressors.

They have patiently continued as an underprivileged group in Europe while hoping, someday to gain a free and independent life wherein, by their own efforts, they could achieve that self-respect the desire for which is inherent in all human beings.

During the First World War, their ancient homeland was wrested from Turkish domination by the Allied Powers, led by a Jewish legion. Palestine was promised them in recognition of their historic claim to that country, and in appreciation of their services to the allied cause. It was assured them by international covenants agreed to by the civilized nations of the world.

In 1922, the Congress of the United States adopted a joint resolution approving the use of Palestine as a Jewish homeland, and in 1924, an Anglo-American convention lent its endorsement, and recorded American assent to British administration, subject to the terms of that convention.

What happened? With limited immigration and under considerable handicaps, thousands upon thousands of members of this energetic and able race successfully commenced to build in Palestine an economy which at long last was affording them comfortable, and even prosperous living conditions, and an opportunity for real achievement, while at the same time the priceless gift of freedom and liberty seemed to be theirs.

Those who would suggest that the Jewish people are not constructive builders must be confounded by the results, because by their efforts a flourishing agriculture and trade have been created and cities built, such as Tel Aviv, which in many respects equal any modern community in the world.

Such was the situation at the time of the rise of Hitler. What happened to the Jews of Europe under his monstrous dominion was, and is, an eternal reproach to all of us who call ourselves Christians. Millions of these people were tortured and exterminated for no fault or crime except that they were Jews, and the pitiful remnants of their race wander over the face of Europe, homeless and almost hopeless. Their families have been destroyed, their homes have been destroyed, whole communities have been destroyed, and only faith in God and in their ultimate deliverance sustains them. They pray only for a chance to live. Shall civilized, Christian people deny them this chance? Shall agreements and promises and good faith all be repudiated? Are sacred undertakings to be regarded as mere scraps of paper?

We must no longer bear the shame of intolerance or of broken promises.

Need we remind ourselves of the Belsen butcheries to remember that we owe a high duty, not as Americans, not as Republicans nor Democrats, but simply as children of God.

Need we remind ourselves of the mass suicide of 7,000 hopeless Jews in Czechoslovakia within recent months to know that action is needed now—not committee deliberations nor diplomatic conversations, but action; not next year, but now.

THE LEGAL ISSUE

But forget momentarily the transcendent moral issue. Consider coldly the legal situation, and the binding promises of great nations.

The official and nonpartisan American position is clear. Democratic President Woodrow Wilson said, in March 1919:

> The Allied nations, with the fullest concurrence of our Government and people, are agreed that in Palestine shall be laid the foundations of a Jewish commonwealth.

An overwhelmingly Republican Congress in 1922 unanimously adopted a joint resolution approving the Jewish national home.

In 1924 Anglo-American Convention set out in full the terms of the mandate for Palestine and recorded American assent to British administration in Palestine subject to those terms.

In the 1944 Presidential campaign the two major parties both adopted plans favoring the opening of Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization.

On October 15, 1944, the President gave his support to the Democratic Party plank on Palestine in the following statement:

> Efforts will be made to find appropriate ways and means of effectuating this policy as soon as possible. I know how long and ardently the Jewish people have worked and prayed for the establishment of Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth. I am convinced that the American people give their support to this aim and if reelected I shall help to bring its realization.

On March 16, 1945, on his return from Yalta and subsequent to his interview with Ibn Saud, the President stated:

> I made my position on Zionism clear in October. That position I have not changed and shall continue to seek to bring about its earliest realization.

In light of all this, it is difficult to believe that our late President, shortly before his death, wrote Ibn Saud that he would take no action on Palestine that "might prove hostile to the Arab people."

I like to believe that the President was sincere on Palestine, and that this was merely the language of diplomacy. But the press reports of the correspondence were disquieting.

On April 20, 1945, President Truman authorized the issuance of a statement that he intends to carry out President Roosevelt's policy in regard to Palestine with which he is fully familiar.

Within the last 2 years 33 States, representing 85 percent of the population of the United States, have, through resolutions of their State legislatures, gone on record in favor of the Zionist objective.

Immediately prior to the President's departure for the Potsdam Conference, 40 State governors, including the then Acting Governor of New Jersey, Frank S. Farley, of Atlantic City, joined in a petition to the President favoring the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish Commonwealth.

In June 1945 a letter to the President, with the like objective, was signed by a substantial majority of the Members of both Houses—55 Senators and 262 Congressmen. I am proud to say I was one of the early signers.

That is the American position. Now what of the British position?

BREACH OF PROMISE

They agreed to this policy in 1924. They repudiated it by their white paper, but as late as 1939, Mr. Winston Churchill, speaking in the House of Commons in a debate on the Palestine white paper, said:

> The provision that Jewish immigration can be stopped * * * is a plain breach of a solemn obligation. * * * I cannot understand why this course has been taken. * * * I cannot believe that the task to which we set our hand 20 years ago in Palestine is beyond our strength, or that faithful perseverance will not, in the end, bring that task to a glorious success.

The leader of the Conservatives was supported in that debate by Herbert Morrison, speaking for the Labor Party. And a little more than a year ago, in May of 1945, the British Labor Party, which now controls that Government, faced the problem very clearly in this language:

> There is surely neither hope nor meaning in Jewish national home unless we are prepared to let Jews, if they wish, enter this tiny land in such numbers as to become a majority. There was a strong case for this before the war. There is an irresistible case now, after the unspeakable atrocities of the cold and calculated German Nazi plan to kill all Jews in Europe. * * * The Arabs have many wide territories of their own; they must not claim to exclude the Jews from this small area of Palestine, less than the size of Wales.

But Great Britain has breached her contract.

So, we who respect contracts; we who propose to open Palestine to the Jews, are on a sound legal foundation, too.

And the stronger an individual or a nation may be, the higher the obligation faithfully to perform promises.

INTERNATIONAL STALLING

What of the political aspects, national, and international?

We see continued hedging and stalling. Objections are being raised. The question is being postponed. It is now being made to appear that the Jews may only enter Palestine by consent of the Arabs. We are asked to believe that the peace of the Near East will be threatened if we carry out the solemn promises we have made. It has been suggested that it may be necessary to send 500,000 troops to keep order in Arabia. Let us examine that statement.

It is estimated that there are 25,000,000 Arabs scattered over a vast country; 16,000,000 are in Egypt, whose army consists of 22,000 ineffective troops. In Iraq, a movement to aid the Nazis in the middle of the war was suppressed by a handful of British soldiers. The desert horsemen of Saudi Arabia can hardly be reckoned as a military force, which is equally true of Syria and certainly of Trans-Jordan, with a population of 350,000. It is impossible seriously to imagine that such groups would attempt any large-scale organized violence in the face of a firm and definite policy by the Allied Powers.

THE COMMITTEE REPORT

However that may be, the present administration has followed a confused and weak policy—long on favorable statements but short on action. Mr. Truman fell hook, line, and sinker for the proposal for an Anglo-American Joint Committee of Inquiry. This was obviously a delaying tactic on the part of the British because this subject had been inquired into and examined from every angle for years. However, the committee made its examination, and in due course reported and while, for the most part, the report was not very encouraging to friends of the Palestine movement, at least, it clearly recommended the immediate immigration of 100,000 Jews. This leaves a tragic question mark as to what will happen to the rest of the Jews in Europe, but 100,000 is a start in the right direction, and it would seem to be a modest enough start so that no one would object. But, of course, the Arabs started their usual uproar and Mr. Ernest Bevin, the British Foreign Minister, quickly jumped at an excuse to repudiate the unanimous decision of his own committee composed of six Englishmen and six Americans. Bevin not only repudiated the committee, but he did so with a crudity which would be hard to duplicate from the lips of any responsible statesman. Mr. Barnet Nover writing in the Washington Post under the title "Bevin Reaches a New Low Level," had this to say:

> No British statesman of modern times ever before reached so low and despicable a level as did Ernest Bevin when he discussed the Palestine problem in a speech before the Labor Party conference at Bournemouth on Wednesday.
> The agitation in the United States and particularly in New York for 100,000 Jews to be put into Palestine—
>
> He said—
>
> is because they do not want too many of them in New York.
> In the midst of this outburst Bevin interjected the remark: "I do not want the Americans to misunderstand me." It was quite unnecessary for him to say that. Nobody is going to misunderstand him.
>
> His statement stands revealed in all its nakedness as an outright anti-Semitic outburst that would have gladdened the heart of the late Adolf Hitler. It shows that Joseph Goebbels is dead only in the flesh and that while Julius Streicher is on trial at Nuremberg for crimes against humanity his spirit still marches on.

And the Jewish Record of Atlantic City pungently adds:

Mr. Bevin has ceased to amuse us. What does remain disconcerting is that a representative gathering of the British Labor Party, which must have included many intelligent, decent and sober men, could have permitted this waterfront Machiavelli to end his nauseating performance without a word of shame or reproach.

Now the truth is that in an UNRRA poll taken in displacement persons camps in the American zone in Germany, 96 percent of Jews questioned wanted to go to Palestine. Of 19,311 refugees, 393 indicated a desire to come to America, and 13 were willing to remain in Germany.

CALL ON PRESIDENT

Within recent weeks the New Jersey congressional delegation called upon the President of the United States personally and urged him to take strong action with reference to the immigration of 100,000 Jews recommended by the committee. The President stated he had not changed his position in the matter, and that he was engaged in negotiations with the British Government to bring it about, but it is evident that courteous negotiations will have no effect on Mr. Bevin. Strong pressure will have to be applied.

Over administration objections, Congress once more declared its policy on December 19, 1945, by passage of House Concurrent Resolution 113, which provides as follows:

The United States shall use its good offices to the end that Palestine shall be opened for free entry of Jews into that country to the maximum of its agricultural and economic potentialities, and that there shall be full opportunity for colonization and development, so that they may freely proceed with the upbuilding of Palestine as the Jewish national home and, in association with all elements of the population, establish Palestine as a democratic commonwealth in which all men, regardless of race or creed, shall have equal rights.

The record of Congress is clear. It is for the Executive to implement the program of the American people. The President and his Secretary of State must deal with Great Britain more vigorously.

As to this, see Palestine, January 1946, which says:

The Palestine resolution, adopted almost unanimously by both Houses of Congress, serves as reflection and confirmation of the pro-Zionist sentiment of the great majority of the people of the United States. Whenever American public opinion has had an opportunity to express itself on the Palestine issue in recent years, its stand has been manifestly pro-Zionist. State legislatures, the two great political parties, governors, the labor movement, prominent clergymen, and leaders of our intellectual life have gone on record time and again in support of Zionist aspirations.

Despite all this, the history of the Palestine resolution in Congress up to this concluding chapter makes sad reading. President Roosevelt, Secretary of State Stettinius, and other representatives of the Government did their utmost to prevent the passage of the resolution in 1944. The fact that Congress in 1945 displayed superb integrity and humanitarianism by adopting the resolution against renewed pressure by the present administration will form a glorious page in the history of American democracy. The administration may still disobey the dictates of this resolution, but it can hardly disregard the resolution and its implications.

No less significant is the timing of the resolution. To the Jewish people it came at a moment of deepest distress and despair. It seemed as if the Christian world, not satisfied with the Hitlerian massacre of 40 percent of the entire Jewish people, was bent on destroying all hopes of a Jewish national renaissance. Labor Britain proved no more faithful to its pledges than Tory Britain. The American administration, committed and recommitted to the support of the Jewish commonwealth idea, was apparently accepting the Palestine policy of the British colonial office. In Palestine itself things were going from bad to worse. Immigration was practically stopped.

At so crucial a moment the passage of the Palestine Resolution in the Congress of the United States was a noble message of hope from the Christian world to the Jewish people. Between the sober lines of the resolution, the Jews, those eternal optimists, read the moral that there is still decency, integrity, and compassion in mankind for suffering Jewry.

DESPERATE JEWS

Jews in countless numbers have been arrested in Bergen-Belsen, in the British zone of Germany—and now in Palestine—for protesting British policy. Unfortunate disorders have occurred in Palestine. The Jewish people are desperate. The American Zionist Emergency Council has said to Prime Minister Attlee:

America is today called upon to deal with your Government in order to help in the solution of your country's financial and economic difficulties, to the end that the British working masses may maintain a fair standard of living. They are entitled to it. But we say to you: The same rule of life should apply to the surviving Jews of Europe. You cannot expect sympathy for the social advancement of Britain's masses when you withhold the right to a life of self-support and self-respect from the first victims of nazism. You cannot talk of social and economic progress and at the same time bolster the reactionary, pro-Fascist, feudal Arab rulers in the Middle East.

In this eleventh hour we urge you not to drive Jewish youth in Palestine and elsewhere to regard you and your people as enemies and betrayers of a sacred trust. We call on you to redeem Britain's pledge to the Jewish people now. Nothing else and nothing less will do.

Indeed, that is true. With great admiration for the virtues and the gallantries of the British people, they must quickly solve this urgent moral problem. And we must press them.

Anti-Semitism is still with us even in this great country where freedom and tolerance have reached a high peak. Our treatment of minority groups leaves much to be desired. It is often inconsistent with the noble professions of our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution. We are by all odds the strongest country in the world, and I have no doubt of the greatness of our institutions, and the security of our future; but complete greatness can only come with a revival of spiritual grace, and a much wider extension of the Golden Rule in our governmental attitude as well as our private attitudes.

The Jews have been and can be happy in Palestine; they are still starving and persecuted in Europe. It is time for all of us to remember that divine and merciful invitation—

Come unto me, ye that sorrow and are heavily laden, and I will give ye rest.

Britain's Bad Faith

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, Britain again shows her true colors. She adamantly refuses to learn. She has closed the Jewish Agency and seized and imprisoned thousands of Jews in Palestine. She has likewise seized and imprisoned leaders of the Histadruth, Palestine's central labor organization. What imperturbable irony. A labor government attacks the structure of a labor organization elsewhere. Prisoners recently released from detention at Athlith gave clearest evidence of beatings by investigators of the British. Men were dragged by the hair and tortured as in the old Spanish inquisition days and not unlike the activities of the Gestapo.

It is rather anomalous that while the Grand Mufti lives in a palace in Egypt, Moshe Shertok, who recruited 25,000 Jews for Britain's armies, is behind the bars in the Latrum detention camp.

If there is one thing we have learned of British colonial policy it is that Britain respects not ideas or ideals or pledges or faith; no, none of these things. She respects force and force only. That much we have learned. But what has Britain learned? Britain imprisoned De Valera, but Ireland became free. She seized hundreds of Indian leaders, including Ghandi, Nehru, and Mrs. Pandit, but her cruelties availed her naught. India's freedom is imminent. She seized and tortured our own patriots of the American Revolution, but we loosed the chains of British servitude.

Incarceration of Jewish leaders will only cover her hands with more blood of Jewish martyrs and will strengthen the Jewish resistance movement in the Holy Land.

The British would provide the setting in Palestine for a renewal of the horrifying Indian massacre at Amritsar. Sir Alan Cunningham, High Commissioner for Palestine, who bayonetted and tear gassed his way into Jewish settlements to strafe and maim innocent people, in my humble opinion, is no different from that infamous General Dyer who led the Amritsar massacre.

Palestine Jews had to meet the Arab assaults in 1920, 1921, 1929, and 1936 with bare knuckles. They were denied arms which were furnished to the Arabs. During these pogroms the Arabs shouted, "The government is with us," and the British authorities were with them. Jews must have arms and a militia, especially when the British stand charged with the offense of failing to provide public security.

The Haganah, the Jewish underground citizens' army, is a purely defensive organization. Its leaders are no more terrorists than were Patrick Henry, Nathan Hale, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, or Haym Salomon.

Calling them terrorists is the British smoke screen to mask their own activities in Palestine. Do they seek to parallel again in Palestine their brutalities of the Black and Tan outrages in Ireland? The Irish resisted in the name of freedom. Can the Jews do any less? They will resist to the death.

The Jews in Palestine have been declared to be felons because they seek to retain the right to bear arms. The right to bear arms for the protection of one's home and loved ones is an inalienable right and the founders of our own republic have protected that right by incorporating it into our Constitution. Indeed, one of the causes of the Revolution was the British demand that our colonists lay down their arms. History has told us the answer to that.

And history tells us too that the United States was proud at all times not only to sympathize with but actively to support patriots in lands that sought to loosen the chains of oppression.

When the Hungarian patriot, Kossuth, visited this country in 1848, we answered readily his call to give him every possible aid against the oppressive Hapsburgs. I need not go back that far. A goodly number of us can remember how actively and vigorously we sided with the Irish in their brave fight for freedom. It was not a negative support, it was a lusty support, alive and kicking.

I am well aware of the implications of my message tonight, but that is because I am well aware of what Thomas Jefferson said in that great human document, the Declaration of Independence:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident that all men are created equal, that they are endowed, by their Creator, with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

The spirit of Jefferson now speaks for the Jew.

The Jews have been patient, very patient. They have suffered almost beyond human comprehension. They have been balked at every twist and turn. The Book of Genesis tells us:

> And I will give unto thee and unto thy seed after thee, the land of thy sojournings * * * for an everlasting possession.

The divine pledge was reechoed by the man-made pledges of Great Britain and the world. But Great Britain, at every needful and needed moment, defaulted again and again.

How long, then, do we accept pious declarations and promises while civil rights are trampled upon? Now action is necessary, vigorous action. The Jews of Palestine have weighed what is in the balance and whatever their decision we must support them morally and materially.

If the Jews have found that they must now resist to protect their homes and their land, I applaud that resistance. And if the only protection against the use of force is force * * * then so be it. I shall have and must have your blessing and mine with our knowledge of Jewish suffering, deprivation, and the counted dead.

I am one of those who feel we must render every support and assistance to the Jewish patriots. I call upon American Jews, particularly, not only to support this resistance movement with fine words, but I also ask that they give concrete, material expression to that sympathy with every means at their command. I know that the American people, in the light of their own fight against indignity in all forms, will view with favor what the Jews are doing in Palestine. Jews are fighting for their heritage, for their way of life, a life of dignity and honor too long denied them. They, like all patriots of history, prefer fighting on their feet to living on their knees.

I say, let us here and now organize as friends of the Jewish Resistance Movement, and I am certain that all those who value human rights above all other rights will join with us. Will you join with me in a community of friends of the Jewish Resistance Movement?

We who have had our lives spared to us only by grace of being here and not in Europe cannot ignore the sufferings of our brothers who by a hair's breadth escaped the charnel house of Hitler and the asphyxiation chambers. We have the strength, we have the numbers, and we have the wherewithall in the United States; therefore and thereby we have the responsibility.

Palestine will not be lost. As for myself, I shall not rest quietly, but shall continue to fight, fight, and fight again for Palestine. I shall never let Palestine be sold down the river.

I do not know what will be done finally with regard to the resistance movement. I am speaking for myself alone, as a liberal, who knows that upon the fate of one liberal cause rests all other liberal causes. I speak as an American and I speak as a member of the race of Abraham, Jacob, and Isaac. But I intensely hope that my words will be reechoed in many places and that the honesty of this point of view will prevail among all of us so that in and out of organizations we can send moral and material aid to the freedom-loving patriots in Palestine.

We cannot fail them now as we failed them before. And I mean exactly that. Millions perished who might not have perished if the doors of Palestine had been open to the Jews of Europe. We listened to Churchill and we applauded the platform of the Labor government which until it came into power professed friendship. We managed to permit a thousand out of the perishing millions—1,000 only—to enter our shores to be camped at Oswego. How vigorous was our protest then?

We are shocked and horrified by Mr. Bevin's statement and are filled with a sense of raging helplessness. Consider his soulless boorishness. His statement on Palestine and Jews could not have been improved upon by Hitler, Goering, or Goebbels. What otherwise could be expected from Herr Bevin? Judge his hardness of mind and heart from his past.

But, now, the time has arrived when we need not sit back in enraged helplessness, but we can help and must help in every fashion, manner, and means.

As an individual, my course is clear to me. As a Member of the House of Representatives, my course is likewise clear. I shall not be a hypocrite. I cannot speak like some people out of both sides of my mouth at the same time. I cannot in one breath castigate Britain for her perfidy and in the other encourage her foul deeds by presenting her with four and one-half billions. I am not one to lick the hand that strikes me.

I shall vote against the loan to Britain. It will, I assure you, give me great pleasure to do so. I shall not vote in favor of British imperialism and force. I could not with a clear conscience vote moneys to Britain that might be used to support soldiers to maim and strafe the Jews of the Holy Land. I want to see that loan defeated. I want to hear Britain say with the Psalms, "According to the cleanness of my hands, hath he recompensed me."

I would like to read a portion of a letter I received from a citizen of Britain. I believe it to be quite relevant. He wrote:

> I now write respectfully to suggest that you consider putting forward the idea that instead of the United States taxpayer advancing a loan to Britain, the Arab countries should do so. This would be logical, as, at this moment, millions of pounds sterling are being paid to King ibn Saud, King Abdullah of Trans-Jordan, etc., for oil and military subsidies. Thus, if the loan comes from your fellow citizens, it will be used to line the pockets of Arabs.

I know that my vote against the loan will speak for many millions in this country who favor decency and conscience and the dignity of human life more than they favor Britain, particularly a Britain without honor and without shame.

I say that the glory rests with those who fight back.

Resolution by American Society of International Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I include the following resolution adopted by the American Society of International Law at its annual meeting held in Washington, D. C., on April 27, 1946:

Resolved, That the American Society of International Law strongly favors a declaration by the United States Government of its acceptance of the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in the types of legal disputes enumerated in article 36 of the statute of the Court.

British Loan Agreement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRENT SPENCE
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I herewith insert a telegram which I have received from James G. Patton, president of the National Farmers Union:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9, 1946.
Congressman BRENT SPENCE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

We strongly support approval of British loan agreement as indispensable to starting wheels of world trade moving again and as of special benefit to American farmers.

JAMES G. PATTON,
President, National Farmers Union.

What's In a Name?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK A. MATHEWS, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. MATHEWS. Mr. Speaker, upon two occasions recently proposed legislation has come before this House which in my opinion appeared to disregard the provisions of the Constitution. They were of such character that I felt it my duty to call the fact to the attention of the Members. And the general trend for sometime toward such legislation is to my mind such a serious matter that I desire to further expand upon my remarks made during the debate on Senate Joint Resolution 138 the other day. The resolution purports to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the agreement dated December 6, 1945, between the United States and the United Kingdom, commonly referred to as the British loan agreement.

The time allotted to me during that debate was too short for me to cover all the details, nor can I adequately cover them here. It is a subject for a book. I can only add a few which may help some other Members better to understand my position, as well as the danger with which I am trying to cope.

The growing practice, which has been particularly in evidence in this New Deal administration since 1933, to persuade people to believe that something is not what it is by calling it something else, is at the bottom of the trouble. It has been one of the most insidious and successful, although by no means original, of the deceptive techniques of this New Deal.

When Government spending reached a point where people began to question it, it became Government investment. Taking all steps leading to war was described as taking all steps short of war, and the trusting public knew there would be no war for us, until the last inevitable step was taken.

Break-downs in law enforcement necessary to protect the property of innocent citizens against unlawful depredations, which break-downs were excused because in an enforcement some lawbreakers might get hurt, was called placing human rights above property rights.

The list is entirely too long to be completed here and the foregoing are cited merely as examples.

In the remarks I made to the House on July 9 I did not, nor will I here, present anything in the form of a legal brief, with technical arguments and citations of authorities. That is neither desirable nor necessary. Principles, logic, reasoning, and common sense are attributes as much of the intelligent layman as of the trained legalist.

Long ago the Supreme Court of the United States sanctioned certain dealings between the President and foreign nations as executive agreements or transactions and not treaties, and therefore not subject to the treaty-making clause of the Constitution.

Whether such decisions were sound it is too late now to argue about. By the decisions the agreements passed upon were constitutional. Naturally Presidents, and Congress when so minded, have taken advantage of this opening and, equally naturally, have widened it by extending from time to time the scope of so-called executive agreements. And, of course, the agreement of December 6, 1945, is called an executive agreement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the $64 question is: When is an executive agreement not an executive agreement? That is, when is what is called an executive agreement really a treaty? Or are there to be no more treaties?

I think the $64 will go into the jackpot, because you are never going to be able to tell, except in whatever specific cases are presented to the Supreme Court for decision. And, from the way the present Court has treated its own previous decisions, the sky may be the limit.

The agreement of December 6, 1945, covers a period of many, many years and several vital matters.

One of the important purposes of the agreement is to promote the development of multilateral trade and facilitate its early resumption on a nondiscriminatory basis, and plainly will have far-reaching effects on our foreign trade situation and domestic economy during that entire period.

So, Mr. Speaker, we find an executive agreement which for years and years and years restricts our import revenue, affects and restricts our entire tariff policy, provides for free trade regardless how that may affect the standard of living, the wages, the income, and the general welfare of the American people for a period so long that no one can know how seriously, opens our market to foreign goods without consideration upon our producers and consumers in the unforseeable changing conditions which will inevitably take place during that time.

And the proponents say that such an agreement is not a treaty. They say it is just a little executive agreement.

And why do they do that? That is the jackpot question, Mr. Speaker. The answer is: Because they knew they could not get two-thirds of the United States Senators, present at any one time, to concur, as required by the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, there should be a special reward for the answer to the "superduper" question: When is a treaty not a treaty?

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, having been obliged to preside at a meeting of the Committee on Rules this morning to consider the granting of a rule on the atomic energy control bill, and at a further meeting this afternoon for a rule on the price-control bill, I have missed the opportunity of obtaining the floor to explain my position on the British loan joint resolution and, therefore, ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, at the time I presented the rule making in order that joint resolution providing for the British loan, and urged its adoption, I expressed my views on Great Britain's unfair and selfish policies and tactics. I stated that she has failed in the past to keep her pledges and promises, and has always sacrificed the rights and interests of other nations and peoples whenever it was to her benefit.

I do not retract now what I said then.

I asserted that my long familiarity with Great Britain's record made me reluctant to support the loan, believing that Great Britain is in a position to reconstruct her own economy.

HAVE ALWAYS HELD MY COUNTRY'S INTEREST FIRST

Immediately my motives were questioned and my position distorted by those isolationists and reactionary forces opposed to all progress and real democracy. Yes; even some of my friends have assumed to think that my opposition was based only on the unfair treatment of Czechoslovakia and the Jews. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I am deeply interested in the welfare of Czechoslovakia, and of Jewish people everywhere, now and in the future, but I am an American, right or wrong, first, last, and always.

I resent most strongly the insinuations and implications that have been made.

Mr. Speaker, in 40 years in this House, and in more than a half century of unbroken public service, there has never been a time when I have not held paramount the welfare and interest of my own country, America.

HOPES LABOR GOVERNMENT WILL FOLLOW LIBERAL POLICIES

Since I made that speech I have observed that some of the outstanding British tories are criticizing and opposing the loan. Consequently, I came to the conclusion that the defeat of the loan would be capitalized by that reactionary group against the present Labor administration, in the effort to overthrow it. The Labor government has not, it is true, been as fair and liberal as I had expected, but I hope in the future it will follow more humane and more liberal policies, and I am confident no part of this loan will or can be used in any way to support a Fascist government anywhere, or in further repression of her colonial people.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN HAS POINTED OUT BENEFITS AND AMERICA'S DUTY

On last Wednesday I had a long conference with the President, who urged the passage of the bill because it would serve our own best interests and would aid in the adjustment of international commercial and political problems, and because, as the most powerful Nation on earth, it is our duty to, and we must and will, assume the world's leadership, and making the loan is essential to sustain the world leadership we have attained.

LOAN SUPPORTED BY AMERICAN LEADERS

For years, in urging the passage of legislation recommended and requested by our Presidents, I have argued that as Chief Executive of this Nation the President has sources of information more complete than any one of us can possibly have, and that his knowledge is such that he is familiar to a much greater degree with the needs of the whole Nation and the world.

Moreover, the former Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull, in whom I have always had the utmost confidence, who entered this House when I did, and whom I have known for 40 long years, has, in company with many other outstanding American leaders, urged favorable action on the loan.

On the other hand, I have heard and have received communications from many former isolationist and reactionary leaders opposing this loan, and I cannot bring myself to the point of joining with them, many of whom, even now, as is their custom, have unfairly and unjustly questioned my motives; their company, as well as their viewpoints, I have never cherished.

AMERICA MUST TAKE LEAD; SHALL SUPPORT BILL

In view of all this, Mr. Speaker, and believing that the accused should have the benefit of the doubts, and believing further that America can, will, and must take the lead in rebuilding the world for a lasting peace, for justice, and democracy, and freedom for all, I cannot avoid the conclusion that I should support this joint resolution.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my radio broadcast to be put on the air over radio stations WSOO, Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.; WMAM, Marinette, Wis.; and WDBC, Escanaba, Mich.:

As I make this transcription in Washington, Friday afternoon, the House is continuing to debate the so-called British loan which is an absurd name for it because it will prove to be an outright gift and make no mistake about it—and the Senate is still working on the OPA. Apparently we may have a vote on both issues Saturday so by the time you hear this broadcast you will know the results just as well as I. As of today it looks as if some emasculated form of OPA will probably be adopted by both Houses and signed by President Truman. I have not voted for the OPA heretofore and I have no intention of voting for it in any form whatsoever. I would vote for the continuation of rent controls—but that only It also appears probable that the House will pass the British loan by a comparatively small majority. However, I personally intend to vote against it. I have made my position clear on this before over this microphone but I shall briefly state my position again on the British loan which is before the House—while the OPA is not at present.

I said before that the British loan was a gift and don't let anyone tell you otherwise. In the first place, everyone in authority from Churchill down made it perfectly clear from the start that Britain wanted us to give her $5,000,000,000 and felt insulted to think that we did not feel we owed her $5,000,000,000 because, after all, she claims to have won a war for us that we did not start; and she makes this statement despite the fact that we have already given her $25,000,000,000 in lend-lease materials in this war—without which she could not have begun to make a showing; we made her an outright gift of the guns and ammunition she needed after the debacle at Dunkerque and without which she was absolutely helpless; we gave her 50 destroyers without which she would have gotten very little of this equipment to her shores—and throughout the war we furnished 70 percent of the manpower on the western front as opposed to her 20 percent. She still owes us from the First World War $6,500,000,000 in principal and interest that she has made not one single move to repay. We have already loaned her $390,000,000 from the RFC and yet she claims to be strapped financially. Well, according to Jesse Jones, Britain owns assets in this country today totaling more than $3,000,000,000, including $587,000,000 of United States Government securities; and $40,000,000 in corporate bonds; and $623,000,000 in controlled branches of corporations having a value of $611,000,000. In addition—Britain has assets in other countries totaling $8,000,000,000. She has unmined gold reserves worth at least $15,000,000,000 and another $8,000,000,000 in diamond reserves, and several billions of dollars in cash. That's at least $35,000,000,000 of assets and yet we ask no collateral to insure repayment of this so-called loan.

Now, I never believed in this loan and I do not believe in it now—whether it passes or not. Let me remind you of the fact that under this present so-called loan Britain has not obligated herself to one blessed thing. The entire agreement is full of ambiguities as far as Britain is concerned. She commits herself to absolutely nothing definitely. It has been argued on the floor that she will spend all of this money in the United States to purchase our surplus. Well, in the first place I do not see any surplus today—I have not found any in the butcher shops nor on the farms, nor in our industries. Maybe we will have surplus in a few years, we all hope so; but there is not one blessed word in this agreement that compels Britain to spend that money in this country, and, being the sharp trader she is, you know just as well as I do she will spend it where she can get the best bargain in the world. Secondly, it has been said that Britain would give up her Empire preference program, which means that in purchasing supplies for her own needs she will naturally give preference to her own nations within her Empire. This she has not agreed to do in any sense of the word and certain it is that, having recently accepted a loan from Canada, she may well be expected to give Canada preference in her international trade regulations. Third, the agreement provides that this loan may be repaid over a 25-year period but payments on principal and interest are solely at the discretion of Britain, and she can refuse to make payment any time she deems it to be to her advantage. Now, I believe in financial dealings with my fellow citizens but according to the past record—and as a former GI Joe told me just the other day—when I have loaned a man money 25 years ago when he was in desperate need and he agreed to pay it back and yet has made no effort since to repay principal or interest but rather, on the other hand, felt insulted when I suggested repayment, why in the name of all that is good and holy should I even consider loaning that man any more money today? Furthermore, remember this, the British financial experts, themselves, have told us point blank that this $3,750,000,000 is only going to last them 18 months and then you know, just as well as I do, that because we have been suckers once they will expect us to be suckers again and they will be right back here for more. And remember also that not so long ago when Britain conceived and promoted the establishment of the World Bank she came right out with the statement that she was going to put up some $2,006,000,000 as contributory capital and after we swallowed that hook, line, and sinker, then she came out with the threat: yes; she would put that up provided we would loan her the money to do it with and that is not in this $3,750,000,000 loan.

It has been said in the debate that we had to loan the money to Britain in order to permit her to go along with us, shoulder to shoulder, in taking the leadership in the postwar world trade and in promoting international friendship. Well, now, let us look at that argument from this angle. Already we have total requests in here for about $20,000,000,000 of loans to other nations all over the world. In the main, those loans have been postponed indefinitely, and the demands from these foreign countries have likewise been temporarily suspended until they see on what terms we are suckers enough to loan it to Britain. Now, I ask you, my listeners, this question. Will we be cementing international friendships? Will we be promoting world peace and world harmony if we do not loan to every other nation on the same basis that we loan to Britain, and will any of them, based on their past record—with the exception of little Finland—expect to repay if Britain does not repay?

Take the case of Russia, for instance. She wants $5,000,000,000 from us. If we complete this loan to Britain, as now appears likely, and should we later refuse to loan money to Russia, will that not substantiate the arguments that she has been using at the UNO lately, behind the scenes, that she is fearful we are organizing an Anglo-American or western bloc against her desire to spread communism all over the world? The argument has been advanced by some of the New Deal spokesmen that we must loan this money to Britain to make her economically and financially stable to stop the infiltration and spread of communism into Britain. Well, all right, is that an international blackmail scheme, then, to force us to loan money to every other nation in the world which is threatened with communism? Are we to be forced by this British loan to incur the enmity of Russia, with whom we can live at peace? There is no question about it. If the Russians prefer to live under a communistic form of government and believe it best for the 5,000,000 members of the Communist Party to control the other 185,000,000 people in Russia and, in turn, be controlled by the 14 members of the Comintern, or politbureau, as it is called—I repeat, if the Russian people desire to live under that form of government that is their privilege, and we have no business to interfere with it. But we do have the right, and as American citizens should insist, and certainly as your Representative in Congress, I shall insist, that we do have a right to live under our form of constitutional government even though the leading British spokesmen of today who negotiated this loan, the late Lord Keynes, and the present leader of the British Labor Party now in control of Britain, Prof. Harold Laski, have referred to our American Government as the last bulwark of a "rotten and decadent capitalistic system." Well, it may be rotten and decadent, and it may be capitalistic, but over the years it has been proven successful enough for them to seek gifts from us to finance their own ill-conceived ideas based solely and inevitably upon their desire for personal political power backed by the most lustful personal greed the world has ever known.

Now, we are asked to finance this present British Labor Government on another ground—that of cementing friendship between the English-speaking nations of the world. Remember, we did not start this last war—the British got into it head over heels before they knew what was up, based on their power-political alliances in Europe, which has been in a turmoil of warfare for thousands of years, and yet in her darkest hours she turned to us for aid just as she is doing today and we heard plea after plea on the floor of the House—just as we are hearing today—that the British are our friends—we must go to her aid—Britain must not fall. Now let us see just how friendly this present socialistic British Labor Government is. On Monday, May 13, 1946, Professor Laski, the head of the British Labor Party, made this public statement in London, and I quote, "To those who say we have to choose—as I do not believe we have to choose—between the Soviet Union and the United States with its passion for free enterprise that is not free and is not enterprise, we—the Labor Party—stand foursquare behind the Soviet Union." Can there be any doubt in the minds of any of my listeners of the trends in Britain today and if anyone is foolish enough to think that this three and three-quarter billion dollar gift is going to make them any more grateful to us than they were after the last war when they called us "Uncle Shylock"—then you are sadly mistaken. I said previously, when you are loaning money to a man you better look at his past financial record and his willingness and ability to repay his debts and in both instances Britain is sadly lacking.

Now I appreciate England has a great many friends in the United States. Some of them have moved over here from England and become American citizens. Others of our citizens are of English ancestry and thus—in both instances—their loyalty is to the mother country. Then, there are those who have personal, selfish reasons or personal financial reasons for wanting to protect their own investments in England—who favor this loan. There are those—and I am one of them—who admire the heroic stand made by the British after Dunkerque and during the days of the terrific German bombings. Representative JAMES WADSWORTH, of New York, made a most excellent speech on the floor yesterday afternoon in favor of this loan in summing up probably the mutual feelings of the majority of these people I have outlined above. He said it was inconceivable that one nation proposing to loan money to another nation should expect that nation to put up collateral. He said a loan should be based upon the integrity and the credit rating of that nation to the same extent and in the same manner as when selling our war bonds to the American people we argued they were making the safest investment in the world if they had confidence in our governmental soundness of structure.

That is a good argument, if you have that faith in the structure of the Government in question. I have that faith in America even though it be characterized by the British as a rotten, decadent, capitalistic system. But I do not have that same faith in the British Government of the past and certainly not the socialistically inclined—yes; communistically inclined government of today that would stand foursquare behind Russia as opposed to the United States. Therefore, I say to these Anglophiles—if you want Britain to have this money then I suggest to Britain that she float a bond issue in this country and let you buy it. But I insist that we have no business whatsoever in demanding of the taxpayers of this Nation—such as my constituents back home and even myself—by taxing us or forcing us to buy Government bonds floated for the purpose of sending this money to Britain and for which we must be taxed later. We are being unfaithful to our trust and that is why I have steadfastly refused right along to vote for this British loan, as the Anglophiles call it, and I call it the most outrageous gift that this New Deal Government has foisted on the taxpayers of this Nation and for which unquestionably we will be called "Uncle Shylock" again whenever it is meekly suggested that the British repay any part of it.

No, I shall not vote for the British loan tomorrow, nor shall I vote for any semblance for the continuation of the OPA with the possible exception of a special bill, if introduced, to stabilize and control rents until such time as our housing shortage has been ended by resumption of production of building materials and equipment needed to provide these homes for our returning veterans at reasonable prices which they can afford to pay.

Communistic Plots Against the Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE R. HOEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 13 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Charlotte Observer of July 11, 1946, relating to the statement of Attorney General Tom C. Clark showing the activity of communistic groups in this country, and the necessity of our Government being alert in regard to this manifest danger.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HE OUGHT TO KNOW

The National Lawyers Guild, a lawyers' union, has issued a bombastic blast against Attorney General Tom Clark, not that the guild questions Mr. Clark's fitness for his office but only for the reason that the Attorney General, in the course of a recent address, had the audacity to discuss in public the existence of a plot on the part of Communists against the Government, the people, and the institutions of the United States.

In the opinion of a great many labor unions, those especially which are dominated by foreign-born, for anyone to so much as breathe a rebuke against the Communists is the unpardonable sin.

Particularly so, if such a one happens to have any connection with the Government of the United States. This attitude on the part of the outright Communists in this country and their sympathizers is a development of the last dozen years.

During this period communistic forces have enjoyed the utmost respect from Government forces, and all who dared to question their rights or to impugn their motives were certain to be denounced as Fascists.

This is exactly what has happened to Mr. Clark.

On June 21 the Attorney General went to Chicago to make a speech before the bar association of that city, and during his address he openly and clearly accused the Communists of a deep-seated and vicious plot to destroy the unity of the American people and otherwise to weaken our national strength.

Mr. Clark charged that the Communists were in a conspiracy, both national and international, to bring disrespect upon American institutions, to discredit American democracy, and to undermine American Government.

One of his most emphatic indictments was that they were in control of many important places of leadership in labor unions and were using their positions in these organizations to foment industrial strife, to hinder law enforcement, and to promote strikes with the end in view of disrupting the national economy.

Of all men connected with the Government of the United States the Attorney General should know what he is talking about when he is discussing such matters as these.

He is in constant and immediate touch with the FBI, and the FBI is in constant and immediate touch with every movement and enterprise that is designed to impair the integrity of our Government and criminally to interfere with the operation of our free institutions.

Still, there are multitudes of people, and good people, who are tragically complacent as to the threat of communism in the United States.

They simply cannot believe it to be the case that such an organization could thrive in such a land as this. And often as not, they pass over without attention any warning that may be given or any evidence that may be produced to prove beyond the remotest doubt that what Attorney General Clark says and what tens of thousands of others are saying is not sheer fiction.

Americans everywhere had better be getting their eyes open and the cotton out of their ears when the truth about communistic influences in the United States is being revealed.

Nothing could please these enemies of our country more than to have the American people enjoying the snooze of a sedative while they go about to dynamite our institutions and overthrow our Government.

Audit of War Shipping Administration for 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission granted me to revise and extend my remarks, there is set forth below a copy of the audit report of the War Shipping Administration for the fiscal year 1944, recently prepared by the Comptroller General of the United States.

This matter is now under investigation by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I hope that a full report of our findings may be submitted to Congress during the coming months.

The matter referred to follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, July 1, 1946.

ADMINISTRATOR, WAR SHIPPING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ADMINISTRATOR: There is presented herewith report on the audit of War Shipping Administration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, made pursuant to and in accordance with the requirements of section 207 of the act of June 29, 1936 (49 Stat. 1988), as amended. Copies of this report have been transmitted to the Congress.

Respectfully,

LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States.

AUDIT REPORT, WAR SHIPPING ADMINISTRATION, FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDED JUNE 30, 1944, BY THE COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
Washington, June 25, 1946.

1944 AUDIT REPORT, WAR SHIPPING ADMINISTRATION

The COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES:

Pursuant to section 207 of the act of June 29, 1936 (49 Stat. 1988), as amended, an audit has been made of the financial transactions of the War Shipping Administration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944.

During the fiscal year 1943 Admiral Land, Chairman of the Maritime Commission and Administrator of War Shipping Administration, and Lewis W. Douglas, Deputy Administrator of War Shipping Administration, requested that the Comptroller General proceed with the audit of the transactions of the War Shipping Administration as expeditiously as possible as they believed such action most desirable.

Unusual difficulties were encountered in tracing the numerous year-end adjustments and locating the many inaccuracies in both the books and financial statements.

The results of the audit are herein submitted, including the following financial statements:

Exhibit I. Balance sheet.

Exhibit II. Statement of income and expenses.

Exhibit III. Statement of capital and deficit.

Exhibit IV. Statement of impairment of capital.

The audit was made of the books and records of the War Shipping Administration in Washington, D. C., supplemented by examination at 3 district offices and offices of 20 vessel-operating agents, and several stevedoring and forwarding companies, all within the continental limits of the United States. Its scope included such review and test checking of the Administration's accounting methods, records, and system of internal control as approved commercial auditing standards require.

This audit was in addition to the regular audit of receipts and expenditures made, pursuant to the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, for the purpose of settling the accounts of the Administration's disbursing officers.

The errors and conditions set forth in this report that have been corrected are so indicated; other proposed corrections not yet effective will be reported in the audit report for 1945.

FINDINGS

1. The Administration has determined that no collection will be made for the use of about 300 ships valued at approximately $600,000,000, transferred to a foreign government for temporary war use.

2. The audit disclosed that the financial interests of the Government were not adequately protected, due to failure to recover, currently, moneys due the United States.

3. The financial statements when issued were qualified by the inclusion of the following statement:

"Pursuant to Budget-Treasury Regulation No. 2, the financial statements of the reporting agencies (among which are included the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration) for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, were due to be submitted on or before September 30, 1944. When it became obvious that this deadline could not be met, extensions of the time limit, first to December 31, 1944, and later to January 31, 1945, were sought of and granted by the Treasury Department. As a result of the insufficiency of experienced accounting personnel, the accounts of the War Shipping Administration were in need of considerable analysis and adjustment for financial statement purposes. It was not possible to augment the staff sufficiently to permit of comprehensive analysis and adjustment of the accounts within the extended time limit for the submission of the statements and it, therefore, was necessary that this be done on a selective basis. In the continuing analysis of the accounts subsequent to their closing for financial statement purposes, a number of necessary adjustments affecting the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, have developed. Since it would be impracticable to delay the submission of the financial statements for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, pending the completion of the analysis and adjustment of the accounts and since it is not believed that, in relation to the totals involved, such adjustments will be of sufficient magnitude to change substantially the financial position and operating results reflected by these statements, such adjustments are being made in the current accounts and will be reflected in the report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1945."

The character of the adjustments is clearly indicated by this report.

4. The audit disclosed that the accounting methods employed were not of the kind or type to result in the accurate recording of the financial transactions to the extent necessary to properly and completely disclose the results of its operations or financial condition.

5. It can be definitely stated that at no time during the fiscal year 1944 could the management of the Administration have been furnished current financial information from the accounting records.

6. The audit disclosed that the internal audit was incomplete.

7. It is believed that past deficiencies in the Administration's accounting and auditing accomplishments have been due to the lack of clearly defined goals of auditing, accounting, and reporting objectives.

8. Improvement in the accounting methods and procedures for 1944 is noticeable as contrasted with 1943.

COMMENTS

The following comments have been divided into four general classes:

A. Those involving incompleteness or inadequacies of the accounting procedures and practices.

B. Major errors of omission or commission.

1. Errors affecting operations or financial position facts.

2. Errors affecting classification or presentation of financial information.

C. Failure to collect promptly moneys due the War Shipping Administration from commercial interests.

D. Failure to bill promptly for moneys due the War Shipping Administration from other Government agencies.

A. Incomplete or inadequate accounting procedures and practices

1. The books were not closed for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1944, until sometime in February 1945, indicating an 8-month lag between actual fact and recorded fact.

2. A substantial number of cash accounts had not been reconciled with the corresponding United States Treasury balances. Several special deposit cash accounts were found on the United States Treasury's books to the credit of the Administration, which were not recorded on the Administration's books or financial statement. The records indicated in numerous instances that checks were not deposited for 2 to 6 months following receipt. This condition is being corrected. Checks were found in a number of offices other than those of the cash unit, where they would normally be held and controlled prior to deposit. An Administration order has been issued to correct this condition.

3. Control of accounts receivable, billings and collections, was not coordinated fully with the departments from which the billings originated That information on which to base the billings was not channeled through the Billing Unit in a substantial number of cases is evidenced by the records which show receipt of payment before any billing had been made. Lack of effective controls over the release of property and services to others was evident, together with a failure to establish a clear policy with respect to billing and collection for items chargeable to third parties. The follow-up on items billed was likewise not fully effective. Billings totaling in excess of $11,500,000 from other Government agencies still remain unpaid.

4. The audit disclosed that charter hire in the amount of $216,634.22 was erroneously paid on a vessel undergoing repairs because of being torpedoed 2 days before it was requisitioned by the Administration. The full amount has now been collected by the Administration

5. During the fiscal year 1944 the submission of voyage accounts by vessel-operating agents was materially delinquent and the internal audit of such accounts by the Administration was likewise delinquent. The following table shows the approximate status of the accounts:

Voyage accounts due by June 30, 1944	24,000
Voyage accounts submitted by June 30, 1944	11,000
Voyage accounts audited by June 30, 1944	5,000

The Administration advises that the status as of March 31, 1946, is as follows:

Voyage accounts due by Mar. 31, 1946	62,500
Voyage accounts submitted by Mar. 31, 1946	50,000
Voyage accounts audited by Mar. 31, 1946	34,000

6. Failure to issue instructions to its agents caused a lack of uniformity in reports received with the result that the consolidation of such reports with the accounts maintained in the Washington office did not produce an accurate classification of assets and liabilities. An administrative order has been issued to correct this condition.

7. Included in the income and expenses of the Administration were various major items which are strictly attributable to the functions of others but which evidently for purposes of expediency were not segregated from its own regular operations. Three hundred vessels, loaned to a foreign government, are still in the statements of the Administration without qualification, and related vessel losses and depreciation were absorbed as Administration expense. Similarly, approximately 200 vessels were assigned to the Army and Navy.

8. The audit disclosed in connection with insurance operations that:

(a) Two incomplete records of insurance are maintained.

(b) No separation was maintained between insurance sold to others and self-insurance on the general books, whereby, the profit or loss could be determined separately.

(c) Cash receipts were currently understated.

(d) Issued, unissued, and voided policies and binders were not under satisfactory control.

(e) The Administration's equity of over $1,000,000 in an insurance syndicate was not recorded on the books.

(f) The internal audit of insurance was incomplete.

9. The audit disclosed in connection with floating equipment that:

(a) There was charged to expense, repairs, and betterments made to vessels prior to their use, approximately $34,000,000.

(b) Vessels lost prior to June 30, 1944, were still shown as on hand by the statements in the amount of approximately $23,000,000. Some of these losses have now been recorded in the books.

(c) The vessels transferred to foreign governments were still shown on hand in the statement in the amount of approximately $21,000,000. This item has now been corrected in the books.

(d) There was ignored in preparing the statements the increased value due to reappraisal of certain requisitioned foreign vessels approximating $14,000,000.

(e) Vessels requisitioned for the Navy Department and paid for by them were included in the statements for approximately $10,000,000. This item has now been corrected in the books.

(f) There was omitted from the statement, vessels costing approximately $7,000,000. This item has now been corrected in the books.

10. No current or adequate record was maintained of commitments, purchase orders, contracts, etc.

B. Major errors of omission or commission

1. Errors affecting operations or financial position facts:

(a) Overstatement of assets by listing approximately 33 vessels as assets on both the War Shipping Administration and Lend-Lease Administration statements of assets and liabilities $31,000,000. This item has now been corrected in the books.

(b) An overstatement of liabilities by account payable to the War Risk Insurance Fund, recorded twice, $4,000,000. This item has now been corrected in the books.

(c) War Shipping Administration interest in commercial underwriters' insurance agreement for the period prior to December 1943, $1,000,000.

(d) Unrecorded insurance premiums aggregating in excess of $1,400,000 were not recorded on the books at June 30, 1944, $1,400,000.

(e) Collections for insurance premiums deposited prior to June 30, 1944, were not recorded as of that date or included in the statement of assets and liabilities, $500,000. This item has now been corrected in the books.

2. Errors affecting classification or presentation of financial information.

(a) Liabilities understated and reserve overstated for war risk insurance claims, included in the insurance reserve, $125,000,000.

C. Failure to collect promptly moneys due the War Shipping Administration from commercial interests

1. The audit disclosed failure to secure reimbursement for expenses of owners paid by War Shipping Administration. Substantial billing has now been made of this item.

2. Failure to secure proper reporting and accounting for miscellaneous revenues including slop chests (sales to crew members).

3. Failure to determine currently payments made for repairs, etc., recoverable from third parties.

4. Payment of charter hire for periods when the vessel was in off-hire status. Administrative instructions have been issued in this connection.

D. Failure to bill promptly for moneys due the War Shipping Administration from other Government agencies

1. That as of November 30, 1945, there was an estimated amount of $169,000,000 ocean-freight revenues which had not been billed to lend-lease because freight rates had not been established, although the major portion of the services was rendered during the prior fiscal years.

2. Accounts receivable in the amount of $11,500,000 remain unpaid by the Army, Navy, and State Departments.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The following specific recommendations are made:

1. That the accrual method of accounting, including a complete record of commitments, be fully utilized.

2. That all cash balances be completely reconciled.

3. That those employees handling cash be bonded.

4. That financial statements be qualified to show when estimated cost figures are used.

5. That all Administration-owned furniture, fixtures, and equipment be identified as Government property.

6. That the claims payable as reflected in the insurance-claims records be shown as a liability in the general accounting records and future financial statements.

7. That supplementary statements reflecting the assets, liabilities, income, and expenditures, resulting from insurance activities and operations separated between self-insurance and commercial insurance, be incorporated in future financial statements, so as to clearly reflect the financial condition of the insurance fund at a given date and the results of insurance operations over a given period.

8. That all insurance policies and binders be prenumbered at the time of printing, and strict control maintained over issued, unissued, and voided policies and binders.

9. That the internal audit functions be increased to provide an audit of the entire field of the Administration's activities, especially insurance and agents accounts.

10. That war-risk insurance premium receipts and war-risk claims paid be recorded in the general books by the Division of Finance and the Division of Wartime Insurance on the same basis.

11. That the underwriting statements be reconciled to the accounting records and the annual financial statements of the Administration.

12. That repair costs involving amounts receivable from third parties (owners, insurance) be kept in accounts separate from those not involving third parties.

13. That repairs and betterments made at the time of acquisition of the vessel be added to the cost or acquisition value of the vessel rather than to repair expense.

14. That there be established a central file of receipts or other formal documents, evidencing delivery of articles and services charged as lend-lease aid to foreign governments.

15. That all cash receipts be routed to the Credit, Collection, and Securities Unit and deposited promptly.

16. That supplementary statements reflecting the disbursements and contingent receivables, if any, in connection with wartime hull policies in effect since December 1943 be included in the same manner as the statements are submitted to the Administration by the American Marine Hull Insurance Syndicates, showing the Federal support of the commercial-insurance market.

During the course of the 1944 audit, certain recommendations made to Administration officials were adopted and are reported here for information purposes:

1. Endorsements adjusting insurance policies issued will be signed and dated.

2. Amounts set up as receivable, even thought in error, will not be written off or eliminated without prior approval by the War Shipping Administration's comptroller in each case.

3. An inventory is being taken and an appraisal made of all training vessels and floating equipment.

4. Financial statements will show the liability to repair contractors for repairs completed and unpaid at the end of the fiscal year.

5. Balances in the working fund reserve account, reflected as amounts on deposit to the credit of the Navy Department and War Department, will be fully reconciled with the corresponding balances of available working funds on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States.

6. In connection with the Training Organization, the comptroller of the Administration will establish current and continuous accounting control over the financial transactions, funds, inventories, vessels, and other property of the Training Organization.

7. A permanent file of all Administration-owned vessels will be established, centralized in one office, and maintained as a part of the accounting system.

8. All items set up by year-end adjustments will first be approved by a responsible official before inclusion in financial statements.

9. Unearned premiums for war-risk insurance will be computed on a basis of substantial accuracy (and the computations retained for audit reference) for presentation in the annual financial statements.

10. The basic insurance-policy records will be placed in order so as to reflect properly and clearly the issuance or disposition of each policy.

11. Regulations governing the submission of voyage accounts by vessel-operating agents will be enforced.

12. Interagent receivables and payables will be eliminated from the receivables and payables shown in the balance sheet.

13. Inventory accounts will be maintained currently and checked periodically with physical inventories.

14. Greater care will be exercised to guard against erroneous charter-hire payments.

15. In order to protect the interests of the United States, definite determination will be made at the earliest possible date of amounts recoverable from shipowners, insurance companies, and others for vessel repairs made in the fiscal years 1942, 1943, and 1944.

Subject to the comments and qualifications contained in this report, the attached statements present fairly the financial position as at June 30, 1944, and the operating results for the fiscal year ended that date.

E. W. BELL,
Chief, Audit Division.

NOTES PERTAINING TO VESSELS AND FLOATING EQUIPMENT

[1] Net.

[2] The values pertaining to vessels requisitioned for title are subject to revision because of existing legislation (57 Stat. 45, approved Mar. 24, 1943) permitting the retroactive changing of status of vessels to requisition for use rather than title.

[3] Regular program:

The disposition of the vessels and floating equipment at June 30, 1944, was as follows:

	Number of vessels	Acquisition value	Reserve for depreciation	Net
General agency agreements	2, 434	$4, 675, 394, 525. 29	$231, 163, 693. 86	$4, 444, 230, 831. 43

Address by Hon. Alf M. Landon to Young Republicans of Kansas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 13 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address to the Young Republicans of Kansas delivered by the Honorable Alf M. Landon, of Kansas, at Newton, Kans., the night of July 10, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is obvious that the Republican Party will win the election this November. The swing is so marked that we can hardly be maladroit enough to lose in 1948. The normal trend in the direction of Republican success interrupted by war, plus the sins of the discordant Democratic administration coming home to roost, all make sweeping Republican victories inevitable.

We Republicans, therefore, must now be studying the new and revolutionary problems confronting the country. The responsibility of a solution will soon be ours.

Thirteen New Deal years have brought about three major changes in America the Republican Party must deal with:

1. Increase of monopolistic power, which we must break up ruthlessly.

2. Increase of labor unions' power, with which we must deal understandingly and sympathetically, but firmly, in the best interest of labor and the public.

3. Increase of Government power, which has been administered so erratically and badly as to demoralize the economic life of the Nation.

No wonder Socialists say, "Give us two more terms of the Democratic coalition and we will have socialism along the lines of England." No wonder the Communists say, "Give us two more terms of the kind of administration we have had and the country will be ready for communism." No wonder the genuine liberal says, "Give us two more terms of a government like we have had for 13 years and we may have a totally un-American economic and political system, whether it be communism, English socialism, or fascism."

President Truman was right, in at least part of his message to the Congress, in describing the perils of an inflationary spiral.

But Mr. Truman is 10 years late in admitting to the people that the inflationary policies of the New Deal threaten skyrocketing prices—impossible rents—and destroyed savings.

The workingman may feel happy over his wage increase, but his wife knows when she tries to buy food for the family and clothes for the baby that his pay is actually less because it buys less.

In every country that suffers from inflation, price always go up faster than wages.

In Germany, after the first war, inflation reached a point where her farmers found it useless to bring their produce to market, because all they received for it was a useless bale of paper money.

Every intelligent American farmer realizes that he also has a stake in this vital problem.

Mr. Truman, in his message to the Congress, is still advocating the emergency stop gap of price control. Price fixing alone is like pulling down the window shades so that the public can't see what is going on inside. It is the bad system of treating the symptom instead of the disease. And the OPA was doing a poor job at that in preventing steady price increase and black-market increase.

Of course, we needed a wartime control of prices which should have included wages. But from the first there were too many in the OPA more interested in establishing it as a permanent agency to make America over—than in the job the Congress originally created it to do. Therefore, much of its failures were of its own making.

The observant citizen is aware of an overdrawn propaganda to instill fear in the minds of a people already bewildered by our discordant Democratic administration. Certainly there is no evidence to support President Truman's and Mr. Bowles' prediction that unless total OPA were continued there would be chaos.

We are living once again a more normal American economic life. The OPA discontinuation has not been the disaster predicted by administration spokesmen.

Certainly events since the discontinuation of the OPA do not warrant a continuation of the stiff and arbitrary wartime control, either in the OPA or other Government agencies, which the President is requesting.

We undoubtedly need price control on such items as rents. But, most of all, we need an administration that will make even temporary controls work. An intelligent OPA would have prevented the present distressing housing shortage. The Congress has been studying this question for months. I do not believe it will be stampeded by the ill-considered action of the President or by the ballyhoo of Government agencies. The Congress is right in its determination to gradually remove wartime controls which prevent prudent men from attempting to make sensible adjustments to economic and political trends.

We Republicans must stand for a positive program dealing with the fundamentals of stopping inflation. Those fundamentals are economy in government and higher Federal taxes in the program of balancing the Federal budget. All tax statutes, however, should be carefully drawn to encourage full production of the goods we need.

For 13 years, more and more Government control has been the only answer the Democratic coalition could give to each recurring "Jerry built" crisis. The people have been brought by slow degrees to regard that situation as commonplace.

Poor Mr. Truman is doing the best he can. It is all too evident that his heart is not in his job of trying to carry out the policies of his predecessor, which he does not fundamentally believe in. As a matter of fact, our Government has grown too big for one man to successfully administer. That is, if we are to remain a republic.

What we need is a restoration of confidence that American industry can and will produce the goods we need. We cannot have this confidence as long as Government keeps its bungling hands clamped so tightly on American business and agricultural life. Economic blueprinting has had an effect on business opposite to the proclaimed objective of the New Deal. It has resulted in big business growing bigger. Small business has been driven to the wall by restrictive policies. Bureaucratic stimulation of monopolistic combinations must be stopped by a Government program which encourages competition.

Just as soon as we can be assured that the normal American economic way will prevail—that American industry will be encouraged by Government policies to produce, that our American dollar, free from crackpot meddling, remains sound, then the greatest danger of inflation will be eliminated.

Thirteen years ago the very persons now almost hysterical when confronted with the dangers they have created, were boasting of their plans to make America over with a managed currency and a planned prosperity.

Where were these fellows who are now shedding crocodile tears about the evils of inflation during the 13 long years when deliberate deficit spending and buying votes from pressure groups with public funds were consistently undermining the value of the American dollar? I don't remember their backing me up 10 years ago when I was warning the American people of the impending danger to America and the world inherent in the Democratic coalition's fiscal policies. Government deficit spending has done more to cause inflation than anything else.

The very articulate administration's mouthpieces, who are now shouting from the housetops about the evils of inflation, themselves participated in that crime against the American people. In fact they invented a weasel word, "permanent deficit spending," to cover up what they were actually doing. They said the Government had controls to prevent inflation. They are now assuming that the memory of the public is exceedingly short. I said no administration—especially as politically minded one as the democratic coalition would have the guts or the ability to use these controls in time, that American economic life was too big and too complex for a hodgepodge of conflicting Government bureaus to plan efficiently for its management.

These totalitarian politicians who misuse the label "liberal" and play fast and loose with the truth remind me of the man who after murdering his father and mother pleaded for clemency on the ground that he was an orphan.

The workingman should interest himself in more and better goods in exchange for a week's work. He is now being tricked out of bona fide wage increases by money manipulations of the New Dealers. Experience of ancient and modern history shows inflation is really a slick device for slashing real wages.

The scheme in modern dress was cooked up by the master mind behind the New Deal, Lord Keynes. The victims of this scheme, incorrectly described by its sponsors as money management, are the workingmen, pensioners, and all others with fixed income.

Using subtle academic double talk, Lord Keynes gave a blueprint for this gigantic hoax in his book.

Whether the dumb New Dealers intended it or not, their fiscal policy is a way of cutting your wages; cutting your pensions; cutting the value of your savings, while promising the more abundant life.

As the day of reckoning inevitably approaches, clever political manipulators are undertaking a shift play by blaming quarrels between labor and management so that the confused worker will miss the fundamental cause and forget who really trimmed him.

The rank and file of thrifty and industrious American citizens need to be rescued from phony prophets and false leaders.

It is sheer folly for our Nation, the most successful in history, to emulate collectivist patterns of weaker and less successful nations like Russia and Great Britain. Of course we will have good times and bad times, but the forgotten man in the worst slump in the United States had a higher standard of living left and more security than the Russian Communist proletariat today. England is now trying to combine the totalitarian state and political liberty. If it works successfully, it will be the first time in all history. We wish them well and capitalistic America is about to subsidize this socialist experiment.

In spite of the confused leadership of the democratic coalition that has snarled our economy, capitalistic America is able to pour out charity to all the nations of the world while communistic Russia maintains the iron curtain to prevent the world and especially their own people from discovering the facts of the pitiful failure of communism. After 15 years of preparation for war, capitalistic America had to save her.

Despite one strike crisis after another, there are no inherent defects in our republic that sound government policies will not cure. The surest way for labor to keep its social gains is to vote for those policies. The sensible observant citizen now sees the elementary truth, that there is a direct connection between soaring living cost and an unbalanced budget, between world peace and a financially sound America.

The pattern of American progress is distinctly our own. It has proven to be an invincible combination in peace or war. No greater proof can there be than our ability to stand 13 years of government by well meaning but never do well intellectuals peddling quack remedies and claiming fake progress.

As far as I am concerned I am opposed to the Republican Party catering to any minority pressure group to win the next election. The Republican Party does not have all the answers to the enormous and revolutionary problems confronting us. But here are a few simple but comprehensive principles of government we must stand for:

America doesn't need a voluminous planned economy designed to permanently fence in American labor, industry, and agriculture as she does need to return to time-tested simple principles of Republican government. They are so simple that some of the modern superficial liberals will probably sneer at them as platitude.

I do not mean an administration should not be studying and formulating a long-range policy to meet such revolutionary problems as the mechanical cotton picker threatens to create in changing the present occupation of millions—or the atomic bomb in peace or war.

I do mean that a competent and efficient administration would not allow the day by day events to form its policies—as has been true of the Democratic coalition. Instead of formulating the broad outlines of national and international policies and working in that direction, we have had for 13 years an erroneous "quarterback" theory of government. That has brought us to the brink of catastrophe, both at home and abroad.

We have had 13 years of White House leadership that has based action on political strategy. That "slick" way has failed to solve our labor, agricultural, and employer problems, nor is it the road to a peaceful world.

The Republican Party—if the country is to be saved—must nominate for President a man who will base action on principle. As far as I am concerned that is the first requirement in our next Presidential nominee.

We need an administration that understands and carries out the basic principles of a republican form of government. Over this period of 13 years of slick quarterbacking our Cabinet meetings have become a joke. No longer does the Cabinet meet to obtain a picture of the whole and formulate a policy. Each member has become a representative of a pressure group. The Secretary of Agriculture represents one group. The Secretary of Labor represents another group.

The Pearl Harbor investigation brought out at least one terrible fact. From Secretary Stimson's testimony it is clear that the Secretary of War did not know what the Secretary of State was doing until he called up to find out. It is clear that the Secretary of State was pursuing a policy without knowing whether the War Department was able to back him up, and the War Department did not know what the Secretary of State was doing that they might be called upon to back up.

To cap the disgraceful management that led to the Pearl Harbor tragedy—a spot that will never come out on the record of every high-ranking Army and Navy officer who had any connection with it—the only record that was kept of any conversations between Cabinet members was that of Secretary Stimson, who was old-fashioned enough to keep a diary.

The Secretary of Agriculture did not think that food was a political weapon. Secretary of State Byrnes accepted Secretary Anderson's view until he awoke from his coma. In other words, we had the policies of the Secretary of Agriculture prevailing for awhile in our international relations, instead of the policies of the Secretary of State. The latest example of the erratic character of the national administration is President Truman's veto of the OPA bill, which the loyal and devoted administration leader in the Senate, Mr. BARKLEY, and the Speaker of the House, Mr. RAYBURN, had some hours before urged the Congress to pass and personally urged the President to sign.

Therefore, America will benefit immensely from a return to the system whereby the Cabinet meets as a committee of the whole rather than as representatives of special groups, and the executive and legislative branches of the Government work coherently.

I hope the Republicans in the Congress support Senator LA FOLLETTE'S bill to bring the machinery of the Congress up to date. As Raymond Moley said, "It is no exaggeration to say that this bill is the most constructive measure to improve the efficiency of the National Legislature that has appeared in a hundred years."

America needs an administration that is not rendered impotent—by its internal political and economic feuds—to deal effectively with the postwar reconstruction problems and the obligations it has assumed abroad.

The public interest demands that labor be able to bargain collectively on an equal basis with the employer. That calls for unionism. But the public must be protected by our national administration from coercion and squeeze by huge labor unions and management monopolies alike. Neither has the right to imperil public health and safety. After all, labor is a component part of the public, so is management.

It is evident that public interest requires a basic labor policy. It is evident that a friendly and fair administration will come nearer developing a workable program than an administration with a punitive attitude toward either side.

America needs an administration that will take vigorous steps to clean out the Communist traitors that now infest many departments of our Federal Government. Lenin said that America was the greatest obstacle to world revolution and that the destruction of the value of American money and American savings was the way to conquer America, and that is just what the New Deal, consciously or unconsciously, has been doing for 13 years. The election of a Republican President and Congress would be notice to every disloyal Communist and fellow traveler to pack up and get out. We need an administration that will unequivocally make it plain that friendly firmness with Russia does not include toleration of her unfriendly fifth-column activities in America or her undeclared war of aggression throughout the world.

All issues in the end are tied to a sound dollar. America badly needs an administration that knows where the money comes from and how hard it is to get. An administration whose philosophy is not to encourage Americans and foreigners alike to grab continuously from the United States Treasury with the idea that the sky is the limit. An administration that will not double-cross the American people by continuous misstatements of material facts with intent to deceive.

There is nothing the matter with the United States that a little common sense and a little common honesty on the part of its political leadership will not cure. As Adam Smith said, "Any nation can stand a lot of ruin." Especially that is true of the great American people.

We must constantly inspire the qualities of individual initiative and self-help, which made us the most powerful nation in the world and gave the American people the largest measure of happiness of any peoples in the world

The postwar promise of American life can indeed be bright if we, the people, make intelligent decisions and come to grips with our problems.

Weizmann: Prophet of Zion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK A. BARRETT

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. BARRETT of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point, I should like to include an article which appeared in the July 18 issue of the World News. In view of the Balfour Declaration, the Palestine mandate, and the recommendations of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, the recent action of Great Britain against the leaders of the Jewish Agency in Palestine is a great disservice to those endeavoring to promote friendly relations among the English-speaking peoples. The article follows:

WEIZMANN: PROPHET OF ZION

A 71-year-old scientist, who helped Britain win two World Wars, now is applying Gandhi-like passive resistance against the British in Palestine. Dr. Chaim Weizmann (pronounced hai-im vaitsmahn), known to Jews in Palestine as the president, leads this campaign from a sickbed in his Rehoboth home.

Weizmann for a quarter of a century has headed the world Zionist organization and its political arm, the Jewish Agency, which is recognized by the League of Nations Mandate as the official representative of Jewish interests in Palestine.

The agency is under attack by the British Government, which charges a link-up with anti-British terrorists. Five of the agency's executive committee members and seven thousand other Jews have been under arrest. Three major cities and seven other communities are under martial law.

Weizmann, long an advocate of peaceful settlement and of reliance on Britain's good faith, repudiates the terrorists' method. But he agrees with their objectives: restoration of civil law and implementation of the Anglo-American committee's recommendation that 100,000 Jewish victims of Nazi persecution be admitted to the Holy Land.

Science and Zionism have been twin careers for Weizmann for half a century. British gratitude for his chemical discoveries during Warld War I helped win an endorsement of Palestine as a national home for the Jews. Between the wars, Weizmann built a university and research institute in Palestine and devoted much of his laboratory work to the Holy Land's economic development.

* * * * *

Sometimes, as he draws on his long cigarette holder, Weizmann's furrowed face and small goatee convey an air of infinite sadness. But in an instant he can become a sparkling companion. He is a natural story teller and has an inexhaustible supply of Yiddish anecdotes. Whereever he is, he never misses one daily ritual, which combines a Russian and a British custom—afternoon tea.

CHEMISTRY FOR PALESTINE

Weizmann was director of the Admiralty Laboratories in 1916 when Britain was confronted suddenly with a dangerous shortage of acetone, vital to the manufacture of smokeless powder. In a month of day and night work the Zionist leader developed a process for making acetone synthetically out of horse chestnuts. Prime Minister Lloyd George offered the Jewish scientist honors, but Weizmann replied:

"There is nothing I want for myself. But there is something I should like you to do for my people."

The result, after long negotiation, was the Balfour Declaration of 1917, which said: "His Majesty's Government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people."

The Zionist movement for 20 years had spurred the hopes and imagination of the Jewish ghetto-dwellers of eastern Europe and Russia. But it had little interest for the Jews of western Europe and the United States, whose support and financial aid were essential to carry out Weizmann's vision of mass colonization. "We have succeeded in gaining on our side everyone except Jews," Weizmann said dryly.

To gain this support, Weizmann made a dozen tours of Europe, 11 trips to the United States, visited Canada, South Africa, Australia. * * *

ARAB RESISTANCE

With the aid of Lawrence of Arabia, Weizmann went to Trans-Jordan and signed an agreement on Palestine with Emir Feisal, then leader of the Arab world. But Arab opposition to Jewish immigration soon developed. The British Government in 1922 ruled that immigration would be limited to the economic absorptive capacity of Palestine.

Under Weizmann's scientific guidance, the Zionists drained swamps, reclaimed deserts, developed new agricultural techniques, built new cities and industries. In a quarter of a century more than half a million Jews, from refugees to Nobel prize winners, were able to join the 55,000 who were in Palestine in 1918.

* * * * *

In 1939, Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain yielded to demands of the Arabs and closed Palestine's doors to immigration. Weizmann objected strenuously, but told Zionists: "If we are in Palestine at all it is because of the British," and plunged into war work. His experiments helped work out the kinks in the United States synthetic rubber program. His son, an RAF pilot, died in the air over France.

Weizmann's faith in England goes back to his early youth. A lumber dealer's son, he saw czarist oppression of the Jews in his native village in the Pripet Marshes of Byelorussia. From school in Pinsk, at 12, he wrote his village teacher that Palestine was the only solution. Decades later, after the Balfour Declaration, the teacher sent this note to Weizmann in London. The noted chemist discovered he had said the Jews must win Palestine by their own efforts, but that, if help did come from anywhere, it would be from England.

Now Weizmann, whose desire for compromise lost him the leadership of the Zionist movement from 1931 to 1935, warns the British: "I stand before the young Jews as a leader who failed to achieve anything by peaceful means."

Today, again, Weizmann's leadership is threatened by Zionist extremists, who are determined against remaining a minority in a hostile Arab Palestine and are anxious to rescue Hitler's victims from Europe. Weizmann's answer to demands for open war is passive resistance. But unless he can gain full British cooperation, Weizmann's leadership may be repudiated again and the hopes for a peaceful solution in Palestine will become slimmer than ever.

The Treatment of Naval Offenders, War and Postwar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 13 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject The Treatment of Naval Offenders, War and Postwar, by Richard A. Chappell, Chief of Probation, Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The subject of this article naturally divides itself into two parts—war and postwar treatment of naval offenders. I shall confine my remarks about the naval correctional program and the wartime offender to a few observations about the nature of the military offender and the treatment accorded him by the Navy. The problem of the veteran will be dealt with at greater length.

First of all, let us consider the extent of delinquency in the Navy. You may have heard rumors to the effect that military offenses in both the Army and the Navy were alarmingly high. It will interest you to know that at no time during the war or after the war did the population of naval places of confinement for Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard personnel convicted by general courts martial exceed one-half of 1 percent of the total personnel enrolled in the services. The peak population of naval places of confinement for general court-martial prisoners was approximately 17,300. By comparison, the records for the First World War indicate that at the close of that war 1.5 percent of the total personnel of the Navy was confined by orders of general courts-martial. This percentage was three times the peak recorded in this war and indicates that we made some progress between wars. It is probable that the quality of the personnel in the recent war was better and that the methods of effecting discipline were superior. From the above figures we may conclude that delinquency in the Navy was not alarmingly high and that imprisonment statistics do not indicate a general breakdown in discipline.

The second question which may occur to you is: What kind of offenses were committed by sailor men? Were they military offenses of crimes mala in se? Ninety percent of the offenses committed were purely military offenses, and only 10 percent were acts punishable by criminal laws. Of the 90 percent who committed military offenses, 85 percent were guilty of absenting themselves from duty without proper authority. While absence without leave is serious to the Navy in wartime, truancy from the job is not considered serious in the civilian community.

Now may I say a word about the treatment accorded naval offenders. You may wonder whether they were dealt with in such a manner as to make them bitter and resentful toward society. Were they permanently damaged by their treatment in confinement? I believe that the treatment accorded naval offenders in the main will not permanently injure them. There were some isolated instances, particularly in the early days of the war before the establishment of a modern correctional program, when the treatment was damaging to the individual. Happily, early in 1944 the Secretary of the Navy directed the establishment of a program for persons in confinement calculated to fit them for restoration to duty benefited rather than damaged by confinement. The resulting program, which was participated in by 200-odd enthusiastic naval officers and specialists experienced in civil correctional work with the full backing of higher naval authority, is one of the bright chapters in American correctional history. In the Navy's correctional plan there were present the basic essentials of a progressive correctional system: enlightened policies, trained and competent personnel, and suitable tools in the form of equipment and facilities with which to work. Although little publicity has been given to the plan and no imposing array of big names in American penology graced its advisory board, it is, in my opinion, worthy of the careful study of correctional workers. Some of the cream of the personnel of the United States Bureau of Prisons, the United States Probation System, and the more progressive State correctional services helped to fashion and operate the Navy's correctional service. For once sound classification and screening procedures, psychiatry, psychology, education, and physical and trade training had an honest opportunity to make their contribution to correctional work. The plants and facilities made available for the Navy's retraining stations (so-called to avoid the stigma of the designation of prison) and disciplinary barracks were usually the same as those available at recruit training stations except that the dormitories and usually, although not always, the classrooms, shops, swimming pools, drill halls, and gymnasium, were enclosed by a wire fence. Emphasis was placed on training and returning men to duty in the naval service rather than on custody and punitive measures. The minds of the trainees were pointed toward the day of return to duty, and they responded by participating wholeheartedly in the program. Since the discipline in effect was constructive rather than destructive, I seriously doubt that a substantial number of men received permanent injury from their experiences in naval places of confinement.

Since the proof of the pudding is in the eating, let us consider some of the results of the Navy's correctional program. How many of the 59,158 sailormen who passed through the Navy's places of confinement for general court-martial offenders from Pearl Harbor day to March 31, 1946, were restored to naval duty, and how many were discharged by bad conduct or dishonorable discharges? Approximately 80 percent of the 59,158 men were restored to duty, and the remaining 20 percent were discharged with so-called yellow tickets. I should point out that the 59,158 figure refers to separate commitments; and since a number of men, perhaps more than 10,000, were committed twice or more the number of individuals involved perhaps would be between 45,000 and 50,000. A strenuous effort was made by the Navy to salvage every man who gave reasonable promise of being able to adjust in the service. Some were unsuitable for the service in the first place and could not be restored. Sample studies made jointly by psychiatrists and psychologists indicate that at least 20 percent of the persons confined were diagnosed psychopathic, psychotic, psychoneurotic, or subnormal mentally. These for the most part were nonrestorable. In returning as many men as possible to duty the Navy was conscious of its responsibility to the men themselves and to society. For this reason the number to suffer the consequences of a yellow ticket was held to a minimum.

The next question you may have is, What percentage of those restored to naval duty succeeded? This question I am not prepared to answer. One study made by the Corrective Services Division of the Bureau of Naval Personnel in the fall of 1945 on 14,000 offenders, 6 months after their restoration to duty, showed that 66 percent successfully adjusted in the service while 34 percent failed. As this study was made toward the close of the war when there was a higher percentage of recidivists among restored men than there was earlier, it is believed that the over-all percentage of successes is some higher. An earlier study of a much larger group made by the Discipline Section of the Bureau showed more than 80 percent successful.

As of interest to you probation and parole officers, I should bring out one further fact about naval offenders. In analyzing the group of 14,000 men, it was found that 10 percent admitted to being graduates of your juvenile and adult probation departments or correctional institutions. Ninety percent denied any previous delinquencies.

If I may digress for a moment, I should like to say that the hole question of the manner in which former offenders acquitted themselves in the military services is an intriguing one. The Navy, as you learned in your efforts to obtain the admission to its ranks of some of your clients, was reluctant to accept persons with court records, considering them unfit for the services; while the Army was somewhat more liberal in accepting offenders. By comparison the ratio of military offenses to civil-type crimes in the Navy was 90 percent to 10 percent, while in the Army the ratio was 60 percent to 40 percent. Whether or not the liberality of the Army in accepting men with court records partly explains this situation, I am unprepared to say. I suspect, however, that there are other important factors involved in this large difference. Plans are now under way for a study of Federal probationers and parolees who entered the Army and Navy, to determine the adjustment and value of men with offense records to the military service. The findings should have significance for correctional workers as well as for military leaders.

Now, may we leave the wartime naval offender and his treatment and consider him as a veteran. First of all, what antisocial behavior may we expect from veterans who committed offenses while in the military service? Need we fear that these military offenders will become civilian offenders? In all probability very few of the 90 percent of naval personnel and 60 percent of the Army's personnel who committed military offenses will ever commit serious offenses against civil laws.

As I said a while ago, the acts which they committed would not be classed as crimes in the civil community. From some, but by no means all, of the 10 percent of offenders in the Navy and the 40 percent in the Army who committed crimes mala in se, we may expect further delinquencies. A majority of these men received bad-conduct, or dishonorable discharges. As a result of these discharges they will be deprived of some of the important privileges of the GI bill of rights. This will handicap them in their efforts to reestablish themselves in the community. A "yellow ticket" will serve to bar some from jobs in industry. Those who live in cities will be more handicapped in finding employment than those who live in rural areas as the farmer will not so quickly hesitate to employ laborers with "yellow tickets" as industrial personnel managers. I suggested earlier that a considerable number of these holders of "yellow tickets" suffer basic personality disorders. Their social histories reflect maladjustment in the home, the school, and the community. It was unfortunate that most of these maladjusted individuals were inducted into military service. Such men were not helped by the military service. As they come before the courts in the future they will need sympathetic study and intensive treatment. They constitute among all veterans the greatest challenge to correctional workers.

Now with considerable trepidation I come to the question of crime on the part of veterans who received discharges under honorable conditions. I do not claim to be an expert at crystal gazing. For me to tell you that the amount of crime that we may expect from the normal veteran depends upon the extent to which society meets his social needs is to tell you what you already know. We all know that there is a definite relationship between family adjustments, employment, housing, medical care, etc., and crime.

Let us examine for a moment the extent of unemployment among World War II veterans. While the exact number of unemployed is not known we do know how many are now drawing readjustment allowances or unemployment compensation from the Veterans' Administration. Of the 12,000,000 veterans of World War II, as of May 15, 1946, about 3,000,000 have applied for readjustment allowances, and approximately, 1,500,000 are now drawing such allowances. The average length of time that veterans draw these allowances is 6 weeks. Only about 15,000 drew the allowances for the maximum of 52 weeks provided by law. Of the 3,000,000 who have applied for allowances, approximately 1,000,000 obtained work or for some other reason never accepted the allowances. I am informed by the Veterans' Administration that, during the past few weeks, until the coal strike was called, a downward trend was shown in the readjustment allowance payment curve. Of those who have applied for allowances approximately 200,000 were self-employed, and the benefits were used to supplement income from the veterans' own businesses.

You will find interesting the following figures about the loans advanced to veterans by the Veterans' Administration. One hundred thirty-three thousand GI loans have been made. One hundred twenty thousand of these were used for purchasing homes, 9,000 were used in businesses, and less than 4,000 for farms. A total of $600,000,000 in loans to veterans have been guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration. Only 100 veterans have defaulted on their loans, and more than 300 have repaid them. The extent of unemployment among veterans is probably higher than the readjustment allowance payments would indicate as there are some veterans unemployed who do not apply for the readjustment allowances. There are also 35,629 veterans hospitalized by the Veterans' Administration. These are unable to work.

The question of the stability of the veteran employee is one that may interest you. The Veterans' Administration says that the rate of voluntary withdrawals from jobs among veterans is slightly higher than among nonveterans. The War Department recently reported a high turn-over among veteran employees. According to an article published in the Newsletter of the Veterans' Employment Service of Washington, D. C., for April 1946, quoting from a study made by Norman Alexandroff, president of Columbia College, Chicago, Ill., and edited by Dr. Daniel H. Howard, the veteran is adjusting to his employment better than the nonveteran. A questionnaire was sent by Dr. Alexandroff to a number of large and small industries employing a total of 250,732 workers, of whom 9,354 were veterans. Employment managers and personnel directors cooperated in answering the questionnaire. The study indicates that 93.9 percent of the veterans are as well adjusted as the nonveterans in the industrial organizations studied. Some organizations reported a tendency on the part of veterans to "shop" around for better jobs. However, on such factors as attitude toward his supervisors, fellow employees, and management; personal habits; initiative; and neatness the veteran showed superiority or equality with the nonveteran. In a general summary of this same study of the adjustment of veterans with nonveterans for all plants, 60.5 percent of the veterans were reported to be as good as nonveterans; 33.4 percent, better; and 6.0 percent, not as good. In a discussion of the study the author suggests the possibility that the nonveteran will be our social problem in the immediate future rather than the veteran.

What resources are available to you in your study and treatment of the veteran? As veterans appear before the courts, it is important that probation officers carefully study the social, military, and health histories of the individuals just as they should study the prior records of all offenders coming before the courts. Some veterans will paint glowing pictures of their accomplishments in the war and will attempt to gain sympathy by such stories. Probation officers will find some difficulty in obtaining transcript from the War and Navy Departments of the medical and psychiatric records of discharged servicemen. There is a joint Army-Navy agreement which limits the release of data from medical records. However, I am told that a letter or order from a judge of a trial court to the Judge Advocate General of the Navy or the Adjutant General of the War Department will obtain a summary of the medical record. The information is intended to assist the court in shaping a sentence and is not for purposes of prosecution or publication.

The joint Army-Navy agreement provides for the confidential release of medical records of members of the armed services to the War and Navy Departments; the Veterans' Administration; Selective Service System (in the case of registrants only); Federal or State hospitals or penal institutions when the member or former member is a patient or inmate therein; registered civilian physicians, on request of the individual or his legal representative, when required in connection with the medical treatment of a member or former member of the armed services; the member or former member himself on request, except information contained in the medical record which would prove injurious to his physical or mental health; and the next of kin of the servicemen under certain conditions. In addition to the above, the Justice, Treasury, and Post Office Departments may, on request, be given pertinent information from medical records for use in connection with investigations conducted by these departments. As previously stated, appropriate information can also be released in accordance with court orders calling for the production of medical records in connection with litigation or criminal prosecutions.

I should like to offer a personal word of caution about the use of veterans' medical records obtained from the armed services. A diagnosis of psychopathy, psychosis, or neurosis should not be accepted without question. Wherever possible a thorough examination should be conducted by a court or other psychiatrist. It was my observation while in the service that some naval psychiatrists were inclined to be quite extravagant with labels of psychopathy or psychoneurosis, etc., while other psychiatrists were more conservative in their diagnoses. I recall two studies made about the same time on two similar groups of offenders. In one group approximately 20 percent were considered subnormal mentally or were diagnosed psychopathic, psychotic, or psychoneurotic; whereas in the second group the comparable figure was 35 percent. It is difficult to believe that there was actually that much difference between the two groups. We should make full use of military and medical records obtainable, but we should remember that medical diagnoses are subject to question under certain circumstances, and wherever possible a local psychiatrist should conduct another examination.

Certain helpful information, including a brief digest of the military history of the offender, a statement of his offenses before entering the service and during the service period, and pertinent social data, is available on former naval offenders at the Bureau of Naval Personnel, and on former Army offenders at the Adjutant General's Office of the War Department. Letters seeking information about former naval prisoners should be directed to the Corrective Services Division, Bureau of Naval Personnel, Washington 25, D. C., and about former Army prisoners to the Correctional Branch, Adjutant General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C. In many instances psychiatric reports and social data are available on former Navy and Army offenders and may be had for the asking. If the offender whom you are studying was discharged by either a bad-conduct or dishonorable discharge, there is a good chance that you will find helpful social data available on him at one of the above sources. The information which you receive, it goes without saying, should be treated as privileged.

Most of you know the privileges of the so-called GI bill of rights, which includes mustering-out pay up to a maximum of $300; educational allowances of $500 for tuition and $50 per month for living expenses; and unemployment compensation of $20 per week for a maximum period of 1 year. In addition the Veterans' Administration will approve loans up to $2,000 for homes or businesses. In addition to cash benefits there are certain services, such as those provided by the United State Employment Service, which will assist the veteran to find a job. Veterans' Administration centers will provide vocational counsel. If the veteran has service-connected disabilities he may obtain pensions which range as high as $115 per month, and may be hospitalized in a Veterans' Administration hospital. If a veteran needs hospitalization for an illness which is not service-connected he may be admitted to a Veterans' Administration hospital providing he is unable to pay for hospitalization elsewhere.

In addition to services offered by the Federal Government, most States have enacted legislation providing for veteran benefits. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, for example, offers the following: hospitalization and domiciliary care; maternity care for wives of veterans; medical care for infants during their first year; vocational rehabilitation services for veterans not eligible for training by the Veterans' Administration, education in high school, vocational and trade schools, extension schools, colleges, etc. The children of Massachusetts' veterans who have died in the service or as a result of such service are provided an educational grant for higher education. The Massachusetts law also provides for public employment and reemployment the waiver of certain licenses, copies of records, bonuses, soldiers' relief, and burial allowances under certain circumstances. There are also unemployment compensation and farm-aid services under the Massachusetts statutes. The resources available to the probation officer for his veteran clients are more numerous than those available for nonveteran clients. Since Massachusetts is one of the wealthier States it is probable that the benefits available to veterans under her laws surpass those in most States. However, all States offer some benefits.

For a moment let us consider the question of the attitude of the probation officer toward the veteran client. Should we recommend to the court the extension of greater leniency to the veteran than to the nonveteran as a reward for the former's services or through sympathy? Should we attempt to excuse the ex-serviceman for his law violations? It seems to me that we should treat the veteran just as we treat any other client. His war record does not give him a license to violate the laws. If he is mentally irresponsible, of course, he should have medical treatment and hospitalization rather than imprisonment; but this statement applies equally to all offenders. In granting probation to the veteran or the nonveteran the question of leniency should not enter. The important considerations are the protection of society and the furthering of the best interests of the offender. If we apply this rule no distinction will be made between the veteran and any other offender. Some persons have advocated the establishment of special courts to hear veterans' cases. It is my view that this will be a mistake. We should not set the veteran apart as different from other citizens. It is important that probation officers understand the problems and the point of view of the veteran. While some experience in military service may be helpful to the probation officer in his work with the veteran, I do not believe that it is necessary for the probation officer to be a veteran in order to have this understanding.

In discussing the problems of dealing with veteran offenders with the public relations officer of a veterans' service organization recently, I was given two suggestions which I shall pass on to you for whatever they may be worth. This officer's first suggestion was to be frank with the veteran. Do not "beat around the bush," hold out any promises that cannot be fulfilled, or give him the "run-around." Speak straight to the point. In a military organization, straight talk is the rule, and after months of straight talk the veteran will learn to expect it. The second suggestion made by this officer was to refer the veteran to a veterans' service organization for assistance rather than to some other community social agency. These organizations are designed for this service. My adviser was clearly antagonistic to social agencies. He related some unpleasant experiences which he had with a case-work agency. He expressed the opinion that veterans resent waiting in long lines at social agencies to answer an endless number of questions asked by a young woman social worker. If his immediate problem is the need of a job or a house or medical attention for his wife, he resents giving his life history in order to obtain the immediate relief.

In conclusion, may I say that I do not expect a disproportionately great amount of crime to be committed by the veteran. Some persons are more pessimistic than I, saying that men trained for violence will continue to practice it and that we may expect many murders and other serious crimes by veterans. A few isolated crimes of violence already committed by veterans cause such forecasters to shake their heads and say, "I told you so." There are others who say that men who have enjoyed the experience of shedding family responsibilities for a period of many months will be reluctant to shoulder them again; that married men who in disloyalty to their wives have fraternized with fraulein will suffer emotional scars that will not heal; that the homecoming inevitably will fall short of the distant fox-hole visions of that happy occasion. These pessimists predict that as a result of all these stumbling blocks we shall see extensive family discord resulting eventually in break-down. Those who foresee marital difficulties point to a rising divorce rate to support their dire predictions.

While I can foresee many problems ahead for the veteran in his effort to readjust to civilian life, I believe that in the main he will prove himself to be a good and useful citizen. Of course, much depends on the Federal, State, and local agencies and the manner in which they meet the veteran's needs. Much also depends on us as correctional workers. We must provide guidance to those who err and assist them toward satisfactory social adjustment.

A Progressive and Democratic America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, July 13 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix to the RECORD a speech by Miss Olivia De Havilland, one of America's most talented motion-picture actresses.

This speech was made on June 21 at the Seattle meeting of the Independent Citizen's Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions. I was honored to attend this meeting with Miss De Havilland and to hear her speak in behalf of a progressive and democratic America.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman; distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen making a political speech is an unusual experience for me, and, naturally, a very thrilling one. Therefore I wouldn't be honest with you if I didn't emphasize that I am not a politician, not even an expert on any political matters.

As a person who has been fortunate enough to have some success in my chosen profession, I feel most keenly my good fortune in being an American citizen, able to think freely, and to do pretty freely, what I want to.

My career as an actress has coincided with the time when my country came out of the depths of economic despair and became a world leader (if not the world leader), first in fighting a great world war, and then, in the efforts to organize a lasting and just peace It has been an exciting period to live through * * * to be part of. But I believe it didn't just happen by accident. It happened because, we as a people, in this country, with great leaders, had a job to do—and did it well.

But as we listen to the radio and read the newspapers: as we hear of atom bomb tests; plans for the control of atomic energy; foreign ministers of the Allied Nations unable to agree on peace treaties with our vanquished foes; a stop-and-go civil war in China; a famine-hungry world; and, to say the least, considerable confusion at home, we must realize that the job is not yet done.

When World War II interrupted our efforts to find solutions to our periodic waves of booms and depressions, we concentrated on an all-out effort to win the war. But we did not put aside the machinery that would some day provide a stable economy for all our people. And with the end of World War II, we have the added tremendous problem on our doorstep, of providing the home—and therefore, the moral leadership—of a United Nations organization with its sole purpose of insuring a lasting peace.

From 1932 to 1945, there existed in this country, a coalition of all liberal and progressive forces which comprised a sizable majority of the citizens of this country. All of us together, made a part of the laws of our land, more measures for providing real aid and comfort to all people of this Nation, than had ever been enacted in any previous era. There should be no question of the need and necessity for the continuation of this beginning. And yet, we must honestly recognize that we find ourselves confused * * * that the reactionary forces have driven a wedge into the liberal coalition. The very men who repudiated the leadership of Wendell Willkie and bitterly fought the causes of Franklin D. Roosevelt, are today predicting their own return to power. Why? Can it really be? The answer is: It certainly can be—if we don't do something about it.

The adroit generals of the ultra-conservative forces of our country, have tried to confuse and divide the liberal forces by making it appear that the great liberal movement is controlled by those who are more interested in taking orders from Moscow, and following the so-called party line, than they are in making democracy work. There is only one way to answer that charge—and bury it once and for all. The overwhelming majority of people who make up the liberal and progressive groups of this country believe in democracy, and not in communism. We believe that the two cannot be reconciled here in the United States, and we believe that every effort should be exerted to make democracy work, and to extend its benefits to every person in every community throughout our land. We do not intend to let the obvious fact, that at times the Communist Party line is in accord with the aims of liberals to improve the American standard of living, become a blur to the essential differences between the ultra-conservatives and the liberals. If there is any danger of the few Communist burrs changing the course or directions of the progressive movement, then the time is now at hand to make it plain that such is not—and cannot be—the case. Just as in 1940, the Communist Party officially endorsed the candidacy of Franklin D. Roosevelt (and he repudiated them at the first opportunity), so today, Communists frequently join liberal organizations. That is their right. But it is also our right to see that they do not control us, or guide us, or represent us, for what we believe in is as thoroughly American as the far-seeing programs of our pioneering forefathers.

It is up to you to make sure that no one can distract the fair-minded voters of your State of Washington from the affirmative principles to which we are pledged, and for which we must fight.

We believe that there must be as much cooperation in peace between the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and the United States as there was in war. We believe that once the chieftains of the Russian state believe in the sincerity of our peacetime principles, as they did in those we followed in wartime, the sooner will a true understanding be reached between our Governments. We do not wish to force democracy upon the Russians, but we do ask for an understanding of the essential humanness of our two great peoples, and that they be provided with the means of communication and understanding through which lasting peace will surely result.

If we do not have the threat of World War III hanging over us, we can turn, with even greater concentration, to the establishment in our own country of the fullest measures of a successful democracy.

Full employment and the recognition of the right to work is almost as important as the right of free speech and individual freedom.

A fair balance between management and labor, which will protect the consumer to the same extent the Security and Exchange Commission Act protects the investor, is a necessity. That means fair prices; reasonable prices for food, clothing, rents, and the normal articles of everyday living.

If it was right in 1934 to save the homes of a good many millions through the Home Owners Loan Act and the Federal Housing Administration, it must be just as important today to provide homes for American families at prices within their reach.

If we are a democracy we must give to every racial and religious minority the full protection of our laws and equal opportunities to enjoy the privileges of American citizenship. Only through a Fair Employment Practice Commission can these ideals be brought to reality.

These are simple things, it seems to me, for a country which can devise the amazing machines of warfare. But it will take as much determination to achieve our peacetime aims as it took to equip our armed forces of over 12,000,000 men and women, to manufacture the 100,000 planes a year that we produced here at home, and which it is now taking to provide the food to feed much of the starving world. There are some to whom this program will not appeal, but, frankly, I believe that any fair-minded person will soon recognize that it carries on the thing we started out to do in 1933 and temporarily had to stop on Pearl Harbor Day in 1941.

You, here in the State of Washington, are soon going to have an opportunity at your primaries—and before many months at your final elections—to vote for those men whom you can trust not to swerve in the battles that lie ahead. If you really want these things it is your privilege and your opportunity to secure them by going to the polls and voting for the men who will provide leadership in their accomplishment Only you can tell your representatives what to do, and the vigor of your support and the determination which you express will be reflected in the votes of your delegation in the Halls of Congress.

It is not an exaggeration to say that the eyes of much of the rest of the country will be upon the results of your elections. If the progressive forces do not successfully meet the challenge of their opponents, if they do not inspire confidence in the affirmative programs which they advocate, the forces of reaction will see and use a wonderful opportunity not only to stop any further progress but to undo many of the social gains we have so lately won.

Where the causes of liberalism have recently been defeated I believe the reverses are only temporary. The ideals of true progressives and liberals will go forward and the people will soon again have the leadership which history shows us all great causes inspire.

Thanks so much for the pleasure and privilege of joining with you in this reaffirmation of our faith in the steady progress of American democracy.

Special Postage Stamp in Honor of Nursing Profession

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following bill introduced by me:

A bill to provide for the issuance of a special postage stamp in honor of the nursing profession

Be it enacted, etc., That in order that the nurses of our country may be appropriately honored, the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to issue a special postage stamp of the denomination of 3 cents and of such design, and for such period, as he may determine, in commemoration of the invaluable contribution of nurses to the welfare of our people in community hospitals and in homes during times of peace and of war, and of the sacrifices and work of nurses in the armed forces. Such special postage stamp shall be placed on sale on May 12, 1947, designated as Hospital Day.

Food Shortages in Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, July 11, 1946.
Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MRS. ROGERS: In accordance with our telephone conversation this morning, I am writing to give you the most recent information regarding the alleged discriminatory shortage in Massachusetts of meat, milk, butter, bread, and feed grains.

Since termination of rationing of meats, fats, and other foods last year, responsibility for maintaining distribution of these products has rested primarily with the industry.

During recent weeks the demand for a number of food items, including most meats, bread, butter, and other fats, and evaporated milk, has exceeded the supply rather generally throughout the country. Supplies of fluid milk have approximately equaled the demand and shipment of cream into the State of Massachusetts has been materially larger than in the corresponding period of last year.

Insofar as we have been able to determine, the food situation in Massachusetts reflects the general shortage of supplies in relationship to demand rather than discrimination against consumers in that State. Data obtained from reports on the adequacy of food supplies during the first week of June in 208 major trading areas show essentially the same situation throughout the New England States and in the United States as a whole as exists in Massachusetts. Meat, butter, cooking fats and oils, evaporated milk, and bread and wheat flour were generally short in relation to demand for them. While Massachusetts appeared to be less favorably situated than other areas with respect to the supply of cold cuts of meat and evaporated milk, it had more adequate supplies of canned meats, and the evaporated milk industry has assured us additional supplies of evaporated milk are being shipped to this State.

It is not believed that the shortage in Massachusetts is greater or more serious than that obtaining in other States in which practically no wheat is produced, or that it is due in any measure to discriminatory action on the part of millers or flour distributors. It is due, rather, to the relatively small proportion of the 1945 wheat crop left in channels of distribution in the latter part of the crop year. It is now estimated that the carry-over of old crop wheat as of June 30, 1946, may be less than 100,000,000 bushels, most of which is on farms, as compared with about 260,000,000 bushels as of the same date in 1945.

It is the opinion of many persons that the current scarcity of flour is due to the purchase by the Commodity Credit Corporation in May of about 83,000,000 bushels of wheat under the emergency purchase program by the payment to producers of 30 cents per bushel over the appropriate ceiling price. However, it is believed that because of the reduction in carry-over stocks at the close of the 1945–46 crop year, very little of the wheat remaining in the hands of producers would have found its way into normal distribution channels. It is believed most of this wheat was being held for seed and as protection against crop failure.

While there appears to be a very serious shortage of feed, there is no indication of discrimination as between Massachusetts and other States in the distribution of the limited feed supply available.

Emergency feed allocations to Massachusetts were made in the amount of 181 carloads as of June 24, 1946. On that date 1,140 cars had been provided for the New England States, New York, and New Jersey. On the basis of January 1 livestock and poultry numbers in the above States, Massachusetts would be entitled to 17 percent, or 193 carloads, which is slightly more than was actually allocated as of June 24. Without price control it will be impossible to continue the allocation of grain to deficit areas by the Department, but it is our understanding that substantial shipments of grain have been made to the New England area the past week by private grain firms.

Sincerely yours,

N. E. DODD,
Acting Secretary.

Letter of Hon. Chester Bowles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

OFFICE OF ECONOMIC STABILIZATION,
Washington, D. C., July 10, 1946.
Hon. JOHN J. ROONEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROONEY: As I leave Washington, I do want you to know how much I appreciate all you've done to support the stabilization program and me personally during the three rather tough years I have been down here. A great part of the satisfaction that I've gotten out of what we have been able to accomplish so far comes from the knowledge that a few people like you have gone down the line so consistently for us.

I am sure there have been times when some of the things that we had to do in order to hold prices and rents generally on even keel seemed to work a hardship on somebody. The way you have continued, however, to base your judgment on the basic issues involved has been tremendously encouraging to me.

Naturally, I wish that we could have avoided all the strain of the last hectic days before the bill expired. I do, however, greatly respect the President for his courage in vetoing the bill when it was clearly demonstrated that it was worse than no bill at all.

Although the last 3 years have not been easy ones, my real thought in resigning at this time was that I could thereby help to take personalities out of the picture and force a decision on the real merits of price control. I am still tremendously hopeful that a way will be found to get the train back on the track. It seems to me that if we can hold prices and rents reasonably stable during the fall months, we have a good chance for the continued cooperation between labor and management which is so imperative if we are to get over the production hump by Christmas.

Many, many thanks for sticking with us during this long, tough struggle. I am sure the cause has been, and still is, of vital importance to us all. Without your help in the House, I am sure we could never have been so far along the road.

Sincerely,

CHESTER BOWLES.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER J. RESA
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. RESA. Mr. Speaker, anyone who has made an adequate study of the proposed financial agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom, its purposes and its probable consequences, is forced to realize that there is plenty of room for honest differences of opinion regarding the merits of the proposed agreement. Any views sincerely held concerning the matter are entitled to respectful consideration.

Many Americans approach this matter with feelings which would make it impossible for them to approve the transaction if it were a gift or even merely a loan to Britain. I am one of them.

I have a great sympathy for the Irish people who must live with bitter memories of historic oppression.

I have publicly condemned the persistent failure of Great Britain to fulfill her obligations in Palestine.

It is my opinion that the manner in which Great Britain pursued her imperial objectives made a contribution to the causes of each of two world wars.

Great Britain's habit of insinuating that she fought the war for us is, to me, intolerable. I am one of those who think she should be reminded that she was attacked, and fought to defend herself in a war she helped to cause.

I have been unable to escape the conviction that Great Britain is always willing to espouse international ideals when she is on the verge of defeat and to turn from them when her allies drive back her enemy and the threat to her existence wanes. I am not able to forget that the Atlantic Charter was satisfactory to her when she was beaten to her knees, but when with our help she rose again she lost no time in making the proud disclosure that her Prime Minister did not occupy his position for the purpose of presiding over the liquidation of the British Empire.

All these things would be relevant to a decision upon the making of a gift or merely a loan intended solely for the benefit of Britain. They are not relevant to a decision for or against the approval of an agreement affecting the interests of the United States.

It is only with the interests of the United States that I am concerned.

The successful operation of our economic system has always been largely dependent on foreign trade. When our present abnormal domestic demand has been satisfied we shall be more dependent on exports and imports in the years ahead. We must buy from other countries many of the raw materials needed by our industries as well as important goods demanded by American consumers. We shall require a foreign market for our surpluses. A large part of our production will have to be sold abroad if our industry and agriculture are to prosper. We must have a satisfactory volume of trade between our Nation and other nations if we are to have full production, full employment, and a national income sufficiently large to stabilize our economy and provide adequate revenue to our Government. No class or segment of the American people is without an interest in the maintenance of foreign trade.

Before the war, Britain imported more goods than any other nation in the world. She imported more goods from the United States than did any other nation in the world. Britain and the United States between them conducted three-fourths of the entire trade of the world. Obviously if we are to live in a world in which our economy will have a fair chance to thrive we have a considerable interest in restoring, so far as we can, opportunities which formerly were open to us in foreign trade.

The proposed financial agreement will enable Britain to discontinue discriminatory practices which the condition of her economy has forced her to pursue. This agreement will make it possible for American exporters to obtain payments in dollars for their goods instead of being compelled to accept payment in a foreign currency. It will enable Britain to remove restrictions on the convertibility of sterling for current transactions, and thus it will become possible to convert into dollars payments made by England to other countries for her imports so that those other countries will have the means of purchasing goods in the United States with the currency of the United States. It will enable Britain to dissolve the sterling area dollar pool and make possible the liquidation of the blocked-sterling balances so that American exporters will have a fair competitive chance to export into the markets of those countries that are now parties to these restrictive trade arrangements. In addition to these things Britain has agreed to support the American proposal for an international trade organization to reduce trade barriers and eliminate trade discriminations. This should contribute materially to the success of the forthcoming United Nations Trade Conference.

This proposal cannot be considered on a basis which would be proper for the consideration of a commercial loan. It is not a commercial loan. It does not resemble a commercial loan. In a commercial loan transaction the lender expects two things: (1) The payment of the interest, and (2) the repayment of the principal. The present proposal is in its nature and by its terms a financial agreement by which the United States expects to obtain three things: (1) The payment of the interest on the credit granted Great Britain; (2) the repayment of the principal amount of the credit and (3) the creation of conditions in international trade which will enable American exports to reach markets from which extensive bilateral trade arrangements do, and in the absence of our approval of this agreement will continue to exclude them. In fact the most important element in the proposed financial agreement is the creation of international conditions of multilateral trade in which American commerce can thrive, and the termination of bilateral arrangements which must be in each instance inimical to our welfare.

The interest rate provided for in the agreement is less than Britain would have to pay on a commercial loan. There is justification for this. In a commercial loan the interest is the only reward for lending the money. Under the proposed financial agreement between the United States and Britain the interest on the credit is only part of what will be gained by the United States.

In opposition to the making of this agreement, it is urged that "veterans and old folks should be adequately taken care of before we make any gigantic loans or gifts to foreign countries." Our country will take care, unquestionably adequate care, of its veterans and old folks. In order to fulfill this obligation we must not permit hatred or rash decisions to preclude us from adopting measures which will contribute to the maintenance of a thriving economy in the United States. A prosperous trade is the best guaranty of the Nation's ability to care for its veterans and old folks.

I do not think the agreement creates inflationary dangers. If Britain uses the full amount of the credit over a period of 5 years and our production during that period averages, as it ought to, $150,000,000,000 a year the amount of the credit would equal about one-half of 1 percent of the total American product. I am convinced by the evidence that there is good reason to expect that Britain will use the credit chiefly to purchase commodities of which adequate supplies will be available. As to those commodities which may be in short supply we can and should protect the interests of our people by exercising a suitable control through export licenses. There is nothing in the proposed agreement which will prevent this.

In my study of this matter I have been impressed by the number and reputation of the national organizations that are supporting the proposed agreement. Among them are the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the American Bankers Association, American Federation of Labor, Congress of Industrial Organizations, American Farm Bureau Federation, and the National Farmers' Union. These organizations are not capable of supporting any plan to give away our Nation's substance, to dissipate its wealth, or to intrigue the American taxpayer into providing funds for the support of any country but his own. They support the proposed agreement because they see in it advantages to the United States, means of enhancing our national prosperity and welfare.

No one can escape being impressed by the views set forth in the statement filed with the Committee on Banking and Currency by Mr. William K. Jackson, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States:

> After carefully studying all angles of the problem, we are convinced that our own economy will be in better shape by reason of this credit. It is true that it will make the early balancing of the Budget a little more difficult. But we believe that the prospect of a regularly balanced Budget in future years will be vastly better. The credit should contribute to domestic economic conditions which will assure maximum revenues to the Treasury.
> Taking into account the importance to our economy of an expanded world trade, the credit is an investment which should yield returns in the form of greater tax revenues as well as in more employment and higher standards of living.
> Inasmuch as the credit is for productive purposes there is every reason to believe that it will be repaid. If it accomplishes the purpose of establishing world trade on a multilateral, nondiscriminatory basis it will be well worth the cost, whether or not the interest is fully paid. However, the $140,000,000 of annual interest payments, including the lend-lease and surplus-property obligations, should not be an excessive burden upon the United Kingdom.

My study of the committee hearings on the proposed agreement, as well as a considerable volume of documents, pamphlets, and other writings for and against it, has led me to conclusions which I find aptly expressed in these three paragraphs from the column of Mr. David Lawrence published in the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., on July 9, 1946:

> Actually the British loan is of direct concern to American factories and plants which soon will face widespread unemployment unless the markets of the world can absorb the surplus production of American industry. Inevitably the present shortages will be eliminated, and supply will catch up with demand. American producers will not be able to continue to pay high wages or, rather, to continue high-employment levels, unless a substantial amount of production can move into world trade.
>
> If the British loan fails, an entirely different and doubtless anti-United States system of distribution of the world's goods will develop instead of that which is contemplated under the British-American agreement. At present a vast area of the earth's surface is inaccessible to American goods, because the British in that area, known as the sterling area, control foreign exchange. Under the new agreement, if passed by Congress, a large number of countries will be opened to dollar exchange.
>
> The theory that America is lending money to Britain merely to finance socialistic enterprises inside Britain is fallacious. The loan has nothing to do with Britain's internal economy and is concerned wholly with external operations in currency exchange. The agreement really should have been labeled as "a plan to promote world trade, to maintain high-employment levels in the United States, and help ward off a depression when supply balances demand in the domestic market."

It seems to me the facts preponderate in favor of a belief that the proposed agreement will promote the economic interests of the United States. But our national interests are not only economic. They are concerned, too, with the establishment of world conditions in which there will not be a constant threat to the permanence of our institutions of freedom. No nation in the world has a greater stake than ours in the establishment of permanent world peace. A step in the direction of world-wide multilateral trade is a step toward such a peace. The preservation of our strength and influence as a nation is a movement in the same direction. Until the job of establishing the institutions upon which the peace of the world will depend has made a greater progress than it has made to date all our calculations regarding the security of our country must be based upon the assumption that the world we live in is tough. In such a world our country cannot afford to be weak. We cannot afford to sacrifice the strength that comes from promoting trade relations with a nation which, in a crisis, can be expected to stand on our side.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have within the past few days received two very disturbing communications telling me of the serious consequence that has resulted from the recent lifting of price controls. One of these, a telegram from Walter Getty, a veteran of World War II, who resides in Alton, Ill., describes the manner in which his rent has been doubled by his landlord. The other a letter from Mr. John Hoffman, of Belleville, Ill., describes the effect that the lifting of controls has had on the price of food. I include herewith these two communications and should like to remark that unless we hastily reimpose sound stabilization controls, these two appeals are but a brief glimpse of the flood of similar appeals that each of us will be receiving in the immediate future.

ALTON, ILL., July 10, 1946.

Congressman MELVIN PRICE,

Washington, D. C.:

Veteran of World War II—2 years in States, two in Europe. Landlord has doubled rent and ordered eviction. Please vote for rent control.

WALTER D. GETTY.

BELLEVILLE, ILL., July 10, 1946.

Hon. MELVIN PRICE,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The matter of price control to the average person today is a serious matter, since the control ceased no doubt you are aware of what has happened. The principal food items jumped 50 to 100 percent, such as butter 80 cents per pound; milk, 17 cents per quart; meat products likewise, etc. There are thousands of workers who cannot pay these prices and meet their other necessary living cost, such as rent, clothing, taxes, insurance, etc. You are representing the people and not a few pressure groups and the people look to you for protection against inflation.

Unless there is some type of price control conditions will be terrible, business has demonstrated that fact since control ceased. You know there has been a production strike against control. During control goods were not available and now they are more plentiful but beyond the ability of the average person to pay the price.

I realize there has been much pressure to remove control. However, it does appear you cannot pass your responsibility to the people to protect them against inflation and especially those necessary items as food, clothing, shelter, utilities, etc.

Gallop tells us only one in seven people write their Congressman. I do not know what the other six all wish but do know most of them want price control and this is my desire.

I want business to make a fair profit and think this can be done and still have a fair price for goods.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN R. HOFFMAN.

Railroad Retirement—At What Cost Special Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE F. LEA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, there are millions of people in this country who feel that pressure groups are exercising an influence in the legislative and administrative affairs of this Government out of all proportion to their numbers. It is felt that as a result, special privileges are being built up to the burden and disadvantage of the general masses of our citizenship.

Those who entertain this apprehension may well have their fears accentuated by what is taking place in the treatment of the railroad retirement bill, H. R. 1362. This is a complex piece of legislation proposing greatly enlarged benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act to create burdens that will run into billions of dollars in a comparatively few years.

This bill is substantially defective in its legislative and administrative provisions. It proposes to extend benefits for purposes having little or no warrant in our social security programs. It would impose upon employers who come within the bill taxes two or three times as high as those imposed by the Federal Government on any other class of employers for similar purposes. If a similar scale of benefits were applied to the Nation generally, it would impose burdens beyond the ability of the Nation to carry and preserve our system of free enterprise.

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House sought to eliminate these objectionable features. We proposed the adoption of a substitute bill which would have extended the benefits under the present Railroad Retirement Act by more than $65,000,000 per year above present benefits, but without the extreme provisions carried in H. R. 1362.

When the railroad retirement bill came before the Congress on the 3d of July, as will appear by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, amendments were offered in conformity with those proposed by the committee substitute. Every amendment so offered was approved by the Committee of the Whole by a decisive majority. When the matter came before the House on a roll call vote, 144 Members did not vote. Of the remaining 288 Members, 108 voted for the amendments and 180 against the amendments. Thereupon, H. R. 1362 was adopted as originally filed without the slightest amendment to improve its great defects.

I think it inconceivable that the House would have taken such action on such a measure had there been no pressure groups involved.

The Federal Government is sponsoring three different systems of social security. One is for the Government employees; another for the railroad employees; and a third is general, applying to various classes of employees under the Social Security Act. Under the first system, only employees of the public are included. Under the other two, the beneficiaries are under private employment. Certainly some reasonably comparable provisions are required in fairness as between different classes of privately employed persons. A startling inequality of treatment as between these two classes of privately employed would be established by the pending bill.

What we do now as to railroad employees will be far reaching as a precedent for burdens and responsibilities that must be assumed by industries and their employees of the Nation generally.

Democratic government is the negation of class government at any level. Equal rights to all and special privileges to none are goals of democratic government. Special privilege legislation in any form is based on advantages to the few at the expense of the many.

I now state in epitomized form the provisions of H. R. 1362, for which the 180 Members voted, and provisions that would have been substituted therefor had the provisions of the committee bill been adopted.

PROVISIONS OF THE CROSSER BILL—H. R. 1362

I. This bill, if enacted as it is, would create an annual deficit, based on the level-payment plan, of about $100,000,000 a year. Under the law this would be a charge against the Federal Treasury.

II. The Crosser bill provides benefits for railway employees out of all proportion to what would be possible in a general social-security plan for employees of the Nation.

If similar benefits were provided for 45,000,000 employees in the Nation, the aggregate cost would be over $20,000,000,000 a year.

III. The Crosser bill is very inadequately financed, even though it provides for an eventual tax rate of 12½ percent for retirement and 3 percent for unemployment, making a total of 15½ percent of pay roll.

Actually the retirement tax should be 14 percent to be on a sound actuarial basis. The unemployment system should carry a tax rate of 4 percent to support the sickness and maternity benefits. This would make a total necessary tax rate under the Crosser bill of 18 percent of pay roll, whereas only 15½ percent is provided for, leaving a deficiency of 2½ percent in the tax rate, which is equivalent to about $100,000,000 a year.

Under this bill, if enacted as it is, there would be an annual deficiency of that amount, based on a level-payment plan. Under the law as it would then stand, this deficiency would accumulate against the general funds of the Treasury.

IV. The sound financing of the Crosser bill would require a tax against the employees and the carriers of over $700,000,000 a year on the basis of the present annual pay roll of about $4,000,000,000.

The tax collected last year was about $410,000,000.

V. The Crosser bill provides unemployment benefits for 26 weeks for all unemployed, which is 6 weeks more than under the present law.

VI. The Crosser bill provides unemployment payments at a maximum rate of $25 a week, whereas Social Security allows, in most States, $20 or less per week.

The Federal Government allows our servicemen only $20 per week.

The railroad system gives very large benefits for partial unemployment. Even full benefits are paid if the individual works at full wages for 2 days each week, whereas in State systems any small amount of employment will usually disqualify the worker from all or most of his benefit.

VII. The Crosser bill allows for sick benefits at the sole expense of the employer for a maximum of 26 weeks at the same rate as for unemployment. This is an innovation in unemployment insurance plans inasmuch as no connection with the employment is required to qualify the applicant and the expense is borne by the employer without any contribution from the employees, and even though the sickness may be due to misconduct of the employee.

Under the Crosser bill an employee who has left railroad employment for as much as two years can draw unemployment insurance or sickness benefits.

VIII. Under the Crosser bill, maternity benefits are allowed for 16 weeks at rates higher than for unemployment, at the sole expense of the employer.

IX. Under the Crosser bill, unemployment benefits and sick benefits may be charged against the unemployment fund alternately, making a possible gross payment for as much as 51 weeks per year for a single employee.

Under the Crosser bill a woman out of employment with the carriers for as much as two years would be entitled to draw maternity benefits for 16 weeks for a pregnancy that took place when she was not in such employment.

X. The Crosser bill creates survivor benefits in favor of the widow and dependents, at rates about 25 percent higher than are allowed under Social Security.

When survivorship rights were created under the Social Security Act, reductions were made from the retirement pay of the employees. No such reduction is made under the Crosser bill.

XI. Under the Crosser bill, credit for survivorship allowances are made in favor of the dependents of those who made no contribution whatever to the retirement fund and for periods in which the employer made no contribution.

This retroactive feature creates liabilities against employees and employers alike when there was no such obligation on them by contract or by law.

This provision is definitely unconstitutional as held by the Supreme Court several years ago.

XII. The Crosser bill provides a complicated and what seems to be an impractical system of integrating payments between the different agencies of the Government in carrying out the social security and the railroad retirement plans. It complicates the administration of the finances and admittedly increases the difficulties of administrtaion.

XIII. The Crosser bill creates disability benefits regardless of employment connection with the carriers or whether the disability had any relation to any injury or disability suffered by reason of the employment.

Under this bill, a former employee who has been out of railroad employment as much as 20 or 30 years might hold the employer responsible without any further relationship.

XIV. The Crosser bill provides for taking away from the Bureau of Internal Revenue the authority to collect retirement taxes and places that responsibility in the Railroad Retirement Board.

This provision with others is protested by the Treasury Department on the basis that it is contrary to the general policy under which the Bureau of Internal Revenue is the tax collecting agency of the Government. In addition to that, it duplicates efforts of Government agencies and places upon employers the duty of making separate returns to different agencies.

XV. The Crosser bill also would confer upon the Railroad Retirement Board the right to make binding decisions as to claimants and coverage under social security and under railroad retirement.

XVI. The Crosser bill, with little justification, brings into the coverage of the act a large number of business concerns which have little if any important relation to rail transportation. It subjects these concerns to retirement and unemployment taxes greatly in excess of those now levied against them under the Social Security Act.

The Treasury Department protests these provisions on the grounds that they are so indefinite and uncertain as to create many uncertainties and difficulties of administration.

XVII. The Crosser bill has important difficulties from a legislative standpoint which should be corrected before it becomes a law, as a necessity for good administration. For example, increased taxes over the present rates are provided for retroactively to July 1, 1945.

PROVISIONS OF THE COMMITTEE SUBSTITUTE FOR THE CROSSER BILL

I. This bill gives survivor benefits on the same scale as those of the general Social-Security System. The railroad system is kept completely independent of the Social-Security System so that administration is greatly simplified. No payments are made in respect to those dying before 1947 or those not having paid sufficient contributions to be insured. The additional payments made to beneficiaries will average about $48,000,000 a year but there is a savings of $40,000,000 a year over the Crosser bill.

II. Disability benefits are paid to the same classes as under the Crosser bill but are limited to disabilities caused by employment with the carriers. The additional benefits amount to $8,000,000 a year or a savings of $32,000,000 a year over the Crosser bill.

III. Increased minimum annuities for the lower paid are provided in the same way under both bills.

IV. No changes in the present law for unemployment benefits are provided. Sickness and maternity benefits under the Crosser bill, paid for solely by the carriers, are eliminated. This makes a saving of $64,000,000 a year on the average.

V. Merit rating is introduced for unemployment insurance so as to reduce the tax paid by the carriers when experience has been favorable. This corresponds to the situation prevailing in almost all State systems under social security.

VI. Adequate tax rates are provided to support the benefits of both the retirement and unemployment insurance systems, whereas under the Crosser bill there is an insufficiency amounting to $100,000,000 a year.

VII. New benefits for employees and their survivors amounting to $68,000,000 a year on the average are provided for in the committee bill, but there is a saving of $136,000,000 a year over the Crosser bill.

VIII. Unemployment insurance taxes are to be collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue which is the agency set up for tax collections. The Railroad Retirement Board is not given the irrevocable authority over other Government agencies as in the Crosser bill.

IX. Coverage is maintained at the present clearly defined basis and is not extended to the indefinite boundaries as in the Crosser bill.

X. The retirement tax rate is increased to make the present retirement system solvent, whereas the Crosser bill has an increase for this purpose only half as large as required, according to the latest actuarial valuation conducted by the Railroad Retirement Board.

COST ESTIMATES

The estimates of cost made in this statement are based on the present pay roll of about $4,000,000,000 per year and actuarial estimates of the liabilities to be incurred. Unforeseeable events make such estimates uncertain to a degree, but the figures presented are within the reasonable probabilities. They are certainly definite so as to illustrate correctly the unwarranted and improvident character of the legislation proposed.

WHERE IS PUBLIC PROTECTION

When the adoption of our Constitution was under consideration, a fear of the influence of special groups was suggested. The view seemed to be accepted that special privileges granted under the pressure of group action would not be tolerated because the burden of such privileges would fall upon the great majority of the people who would suffer the burden of such special privileges. In other words, it was thought the victims of special privileges would furnish a resistance that would protect the public against special group legislation.

There are just three barriers under the Federal Government on which the public must depend for its protection against unjust or oppressive legislation from any source. One of these barriers is the House of Representatives, another is the Senate, and the other is the Executive head of the Nation. For their protection the unorganized public must look to us Members of Congress or to the President. If we fail to give proper protection to the public, the Government fails.

Congressman Izac Holds Congressional Medal of Honor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL J. BRADLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, one of the things I have wanted to do before my retirement from Congress at the end of this session is to say a few words regarding the record of my friend and colleague from the Twenty-third District of California, EDOUARD V. IZAC.

The Members of the House, and especially those on the Naval Affairs Committee, know with what distinction the gentleman from California, ED. IZAC, has served his country during the war that ended almost a year ago. But perhaps there are many of us here who do not know the story of his equally distinguished service as a combatant during the First World War.

ED. IZAC is the only Member of the present House of Representatives who has won the Congressional Medal of Honor—the highest award for military valor that this Nation bestows. In all the history of our country I find only three names of Members of Congress listed as holders of this highest award; one of the three being our own colleague, Congressman IZAC.

I should like to quote from the official citation made by the Secretary of the Navy on November 11, 1920, in recognition of Lieutenant IZAC's services beyond the call of duty:

When the U. S. S. President Lincoln was attacked and sunk by the German submarine U–90 on May 31, 1918, Lieutenant IZAC was captured and held as a prisoner on board the U–90 until the return of the submarine to Germany, when he was confined to a prison camp. During his stay on the U–90 he obtained information of the movements of German submarines, which was so important that he determined to escape with a view to making this information available to the United States and Allied naval authorities. In attempting to carry out this plan, he jumped through the window of a rapidly moving train at the imminent risk of death, not only from the nature of the act itself, but from the fire of the armed German soldiers who were guarding him. Having been recaptured and reconfined, he made a second and successful attempt to escape, breaking his way through barbed wire fences and deliberately drawing the fire of the armed guards in the hope of permitting others to escape during the confusion. He made his way through the mountains of southwestern Germany, having only raw vegetables for food, and at the end swam the River Rhine during the night in the immediate vicinity of German sentries.

For the President,
JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

During the Second World War, Representative IZAC was chairman of a special subcommittee set up to investigate conditions in vital port areas of the United States. The reports issued by this subcommittee resulted in the correction of serious congestion and other conditions that were impeding war production, especially in crowded shipbuilding centers. Hundreds of thousands of war workers can thank the Izac subcommittee for helping to make working and living conditions more tolerable in the rapidly expanding war production communities.

Another outstanding contribution is Representative IZAC's work as chairman of the subcommittee which conducted an inspection tour of our Pacific Island bases. With his characteristic thoroughness Mr. IZAC submitted a most comprehensive and valuable report dealing with the strategic, economic, political, climatological, and racial factors involved in our relationships with these islands.

The people of the Nation, the State of California, and the Twenty-third District of the Golden State have been well served by ED. IZAC throughout his five terms in Congress.

Master of Ohio State Grange Urges Passage of House Joint Resolution 325

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have included with my remarks herewith, letter to me from the master of the Ohio State Grange, Mr. Joseph W. Fichter, and also copy of his letter to Secretary Anderson:

OHIO STATE GRANGE,
Columbus, Ohio, June 10, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. VOORHIS: I am glad to receive in last Saturday's mail a reprint from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of your speeches of March 7, 25, 28, and April 4 and 18.

May I congratulate you on your resolution, on your letter to the President, and on your remarks in Congress. The people are with you on this action.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter which I sent to Secretary Anderson on April 1 and which I released to the press. If it will help the cause, I shall be glad to have you include the letter in your extension of remarks on House Joint Resolution 325.

Sincerely,
JOSEPH W. FICHTER,
Master, Ohio State Grange.

OHIO STATE GRANGE,
Columbus, Ohio, April 1, 1946.

Hon. CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ANDERSON: For humanitarian reasons and for the purpose of building the peace, we must devote ourselves to the utmost in making food available to the starving people in the world.

During the annual session of the Ohio State Grange last December a resolution was unanimously adopted urging the Congress to provide funds immediately to relieve the food situation and suggesting that the local granges throughout the State use as a project this year the donation of food in personal gifts or in connection with the agencies for the relief of starving peoples.

Grange members are responding in a splendid way to this suggestion. They are making generous donations of food and money.

They are disturbed, however, by the rapidly diminishing food supply and by the possibility that unfavorable weather could seriously curtail food production this summer. They feel that food supplies should be used for essential needs only.

Therefore, I urge you as Secretary of Agriculture to stop the use of grain and sugar in the production of alcoholic beverages during the food emergency. When children are crying for bread, adults cannot justify the luxury of liquor.

Also, I call your attention to the urgency of immediate action to provide farm machinery, repair parts, and such items as baling wire which farms need so desperately to produce and harvest crops this year. The shortage in these items is much more serious than it was during the war.

Furthermore, the farm-labor situation continues to be acute. The uncertainty about retaining experienced labor throughout the season prevents the planning of farm operations. Migratory labor is not sufficient nor certain.

Farmers appeal to you to acquaint the President with the shortages of labor and equipment facing them. As the war has been over for 7 months, farmers know there is no excuse for these shortages. Explanations no longer suffice. The Government has demonstrated its ability to meet other emergencies, and it can meet the food emergency. It cannot afford to fail to do so. You can depend on the full cooperation of farmers in producing food for the starving people of the world if they have the labor and equipment to do the job.

Sincerely,
JOSEPH W. FICHTER,
Master, Ohio State Grange.

The Children Are Hungry; Will We Feed Them?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Congress today, by passing the British loan resolution, has again demonstrated that the American people are rejecting the spirit of isolation which followed World War I. It is another step toward rehabilitating our war-stricken allies.

The following editorial by H. B. Snyder, editor of the Gary (Ind.) Post-Tribune, reminds us that we must continue our war sacrifices so as to relieve hunger and starvation in war-devastated nations.

THE CHILDREN ARE HUNGRY; WILL WE FEED THEM?

Hunger is abroad in the world.

It's our problem, as well as that of other fortunate nations, to do what we can to fight world starvation.

For the American people, the task is a simple one. It involves reducing our use of wheat and fats, substituting the other foods that are available to us, and fighting waste just as we did during the war.

It's not a great task. No one in the United States has the remotest chance of going hungry as a result. We have been the best fed among the nations and we still will be.

But the food we can save will make the difference between life and death in many other countries. It can prevent swollen, distorted bodies among the youth of Europe and Asia, can prevent the distortion of mind and morals that goes with severe undernourishment.

Food is the key to preserving the order and stability of the world, as Herbert Hoover said in Cairo. Food is the key to peace. Empty stomachs mean lawlessness and disorder in the small community, and they mean unstable government on the national level.

Europe's food problem also is tied up with such things as coal and industrial production, and purchasing power. When the German ration was cut from 1,500 to 1,000 calories a day, coal production in the Ruhr dropped sharply. Men who don't have enough to eat can't do a normal day's work.

This is an emergency situation. "This crisis has a definite terminal date," Hoover said. "That date is arrival of the next harvest." Until that date, it's just a question of food from those who can share or starvation and misery.

As we said, the task for the American people is simply set forth. So is the task for our Government. It's the task of buying up the essential grain and utilizing it, either as part of the United States contribution to UNRRA or through sales to foreign countries, to alleviate the hunger.

Other nations are sharing their foodstuffs. Some may do better, in proportion to their resources, than we do. Some may not do as well. But this isn't a time to quibble over what our share should be.

Children are hungry, the world over, and we can do much to feed them. Our share of the burden is every bit of the load we can carry. Death by bomb or bullet is much more merciful than the slow torture of death by hunger.

Rent Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and resolution:

CITY OF LONG BEACH,
Long Beach, Calif., July 10, 1946.

Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The City Council of the City of Long Beach, at its meeting of July 2, 1946, adopted an emergency rent-control ordinance and also adopted the following motion:

"Councilman Crawford moved, seconded by Councilman Pavey, that Congressman DOYLE and the Senators be sent a copy of this ordinance, with a request that the Congressman urge upon Congress that when they pass this new rule they make it necessary that the administrator of the law set up local committees, before whom cases pertaining to rent control shall be tried, and give them the power to enforce their decisions. Carried by the following vote:

"Ayes: Councilmen Pavey, Wagner, Clark, Klocksiem, Chace, Brower, Moxley, Crawford, Lewis.

"Noes: None.

"Absent: None."

In accordance with the above action, I am transmitting herewith a certified copy of ordinance No. C-2522.

Very truly yours,

FRANK J. BEGGS,
City Clerk.

Ordinance No. C-2522

An emergency ordinance making it unlawful to charge more than a reasonable rent for any dwelling in the city of Long Beach; defining reasonable rent; making it unlawful to remove a tenant except for specified causes; providing an expiration date of ordinance of August 31, 1946, and providing penalties for the violation hereof

The City Council of the City of Long Beach ordains as follows:

SECTION 1. The following words, as used in this ordinance, shall have the signification attached to them in this section, unless otherwis clearly apparent from the context:

(a) Dwelling: The word "dwelling" shall mean and include any building or structure, or portion thereof, designed, built, rented, leased, let or hired out to be occupied, or which is occupied, for living purposes, and any services as hereinafter defined, provided in connection therewith.

(b) Services: The word "services" shall mean and include garages, garage spaces, parking spaces, water, gas, electricity, linens, laundry service, telephone service, cleaning service, janitor service, use of washers, ironers, vacuum cleaners, or other accommodations or benefits furnished in connection with the renting or hiring of a dwelling.

(c) Rent: The word "rent" shall mean and include the pecuniary or other compensation charged or received for the use of a dwelling for a specific period of time.

(d) Reasonable rent: The words "reasonable rent" shall mean and include a rent for a dwelling not to exceed 20 percent greater than the rent charged or received for the same dwelling for the month of June 1946, or any rental period, or portion thereof, in said month.

(e) Person: The word "person" shall mean and include an individual, either acting as principal, agent, employee, or otherwise, a receiver, a trustee, a copartnership, joint adventurers, a firm, an unincorporated association, a syndicate, a corporation, a society or a trust, whether acting for himself or itself or in any representative capacity.

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person to charge or receive rent for any dwelling in the city of Long Beach which is greater than the reasonable rent for said dwelling.

SEC. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person to fail, refuse, or neglect to provide any services that were provided in connection with the renting or hiring of a dwelling during the month of June 1946, or any rental period or portion thereof, in said month.

SEC. 4. It shall be unlawful for any person to remove any tenant from any dwelling by action to evict or recover possession, or to attempt the same, so long as the tenant continues to pay the reasonable rent for said dwelling, unless:

(a) The tenant has unreasonably refused the landlord access to the dwelling for the purpose of inspection or showing the dwelling to a prospective purchaser, prospective mortgagee, or other person having a legitimate interest therein;

(b) The tenant has violated a substantial obligation of his tenancy other than the obligation to pay rent, and has continued or failed to cure such violation after written notice by the landlord that the violation exists;

(c) The tenant is committing or permitting a nuisance, or is using or permitting a use of the dwelling for immoral or illegal purposes;

(d) The landlord seeks in good faith to recover possession of such dwelling for immediate use and occupancy by himself.

SEC. 5. This ordinance shall remain in effect until August 31, 1946, unless sooner repealed by the City Council of the City of Long Beach.

SEC. 6. If any section, subsection, sentence, clause, or phrase of this ordinance is for any reason held to be invalid or unconstitutional, such decision shall not effect the validity of the remaining portions of this ordinance. The City Council of the City of Long Beach hereby declares that it would have passed this ordinance, and each section, subsection, sentence, clause, and phrase thereof, irrespective of the fact that any one or more other sections, subsections, sentences, clauses, or phrases be declared invalid or unconstitutional.

SEC. 7. Any person violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $500 or by imprisonment in the city jail of the city of Long Beach for a period not exceeding 6 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and each such person, as principal, agent, or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a separate offense for each day, during any portion of which the violation of, or failure, neglect, or refusal to comply with any of the provisions of this ordinance is committed, continued, or permitted by such person.

SEC. 8. This is an emergency measure and is urgently required for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, safety, and welfare by reason of the following facts, to wit:

That on December 8, 1941, the United States declared a state of war to exist between said United States and the Japanese Empire, and on December 11, 1941, declared a state of war to exist between said United States and Germany; that although hostilities ceased in the war with Germany on May 8, 1945, and in the war with the Japanese Empire on September 2, 1945, during all of the intervening time and up to and including the present time, this Nation was and still is at a state of war; our Congress has not yet entered into a peace treaty and may not for a long time to come; that during all of this time the prices of most commodities have been controlled by the Federal Government through the Office of Price Administration, and in that connection the Office of Price Administration froze the rent on all dwellings in Long Beach at the price charged on March 1, 1942.

That during the war years and up to and including the present time there has been a tremendous shortage of housing in Long Beach. Workers in this area are leaving every day because of their inability to find housing, and veterans returning have no place to sleep; that thousands of families in this area are undergoing great hardships because of lack of adequate housing facilities; that every effort is being made to construct additional houses, but lack of materials has made it impossible to build even a small portion of the houses needed to fill the demand; that the shortage of housing is so great and the need for housing so large, that desperate people would pay almost any price to obtain a place to live; that, but for the control placed on rent prices by the said Office of Price Administration, the welfare of a great body of the Long Beach public would be jeopardized by an unprecedented raise in rental prices out of all proportions to the ability of tenants to pay.

That at midnight on June 30, 1946, because of the veto of a new price administration bill by President Harry S. Truman, all price controls in the United States have been lifted; that as a result an uncontrolled, unreasonable, and unlimited raising of rents has occurred; in Long Beach hundreds of tenants have received 30-day notices of rental increases up to 800 percent, and it is believed that thousands of additional tenants will be so notified of such exorbitant increases. That when said increases take effect large numbers of tenants will be unable to pay the increased rent and, because of the housing shortage, will be unable to locate other dwellings on which the rent charged would be in an amount which they could afford to pay; these people will be forced out upon the streets, parks, and beaches in this city.

As a result the health, welfare, and morals of a great number of Long Beach citizens will be adversely affected.

That in an effort to obtain such exorbitant increases many landlords have served notices of eviction upon their present tenants so as to secure such increased rent from distressed persons heretofore homeless; that thousands of landlords threaten that, as a subterfuge to evade the placing of a reasonable maximum on increases of rent they will evict their present tenants so as to be able to enter into secret agreements with desperate persons seeking homes. That this ordinance is for the purpose of protecting the health, welfare, and morals of the tenants of the city of Long Beach until such time as the United States Congress enacts a law once again to control rent prices.

That there is no ordinance of the city of Long Beach, no statute of the State of California, or law of the Federal Government now in effect which governs this situation.

SEC. 9. The city clerk shall certify to a separate roll call and vote on the question of the emergency of this ordinance and to its passage by the vote of five members of the City Council of the City of Long Beach, and cause the same to be posted in three conspicuous places in the city of Long Beach and it shall thereupon take effect.

This ordinance shall also be adopted by the city council as a regular ordinance to take effect 30 days after its final passage, to the end that in the event of any defect or invalidity in connection with the adoption of this ordinance as an emergency measure, the same shall, nevertheless, be and become effective from and after 30 days after its final passage, and the city clerk shall certify to the passage of this ordinance by the City Council of the City of Long Beach, and shall cause the same to be posted in three conspicuous places in the city of Long Beach, and it shall, in any event, take effect 30 days after its final passage.

I hereby certify that on a separate roll call and vote which was taken by the City Council of the City of Long Beach upon the question of the emergency of this ordinance at its meeting of July 2, 1946, the ordinance was declared to be an emergency measure by the following vote:

Ayes: Councilmen Pavey, Wagner, Clark, Klocksiem, Chace, Brower, Moxley, Crawford, Lewis.

Noes: None.

Absent: None.

I further certify that thereafter, at the same meeting, upon a roll call and vote of adoption of the ordinance, it was adopted by the city council by the following vote:

Ayes: Councilmen Pavey, Wagner, Clark, Klocksiem, Chace, Brower, Moxley, Crawford, Lewis.

Noes: None.

Absent: None.

I further certify that the foregoing ordinance was thereafter adopted on final reading by the City Council of the City of Long Beach at its meeting of July 9, 1946, by the following vote:

Ayes: Councilmen Pavey, Wagner, Clark, Klocksiem, Brower, Moxley, Crawford, Lewis.

Noes: None.

Absent: Chace.

American Forum of the Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following program of the American Forum of the Air of February 26, 1946, entitled "What Should We Do About the British Loan":

ANNOUNCER. What should we do about the British loan? Does Britain need our financial help? Is the pending financial agreement the best answer?

Once again, the vital issue of the week discussed on your American Forum of the Air. [Applause.]

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. From the Shoreham Hotel in your Nation's Capital, Mutual proudly presents America's pioneer public service radio program, the American Forum of the Air.

The forum presents every Tuesday night at this same time the vital issue of the week, both sides of that issue, and the men who affect the decisions.

Theodore Granik, attorney and moderator, founded this forum program 18 years ago. Tonight is our eighteenth birthday which makes us the oldest public discussion program in American radio.

The forum has changed locations during the 18 years of its life and it has changed its format occasionally, always improving its service to the people in fulfillment of its goal—the full and public discussion of all sides of all issues.

At this point, on behalf of Mr. Granik and the entire staff of the American Forum, we extend our sincere thanks for the hundreds of congratulatory messages we have been receiving on our birthday from Cabinet officers, Senators, Congressmen, Government officials, and others.

During these past years the announcers who have introduced these programs have changed frequently, but this one line remains the same: "And now here is your chairman, Theodore Granik!" [Applause.]

Chairman GRANIK. Good evening. Last September, at the conclusion of the war, top financial representatives of Great Britain came to Washington to meet with our State Department and financial authorities. They discussed a new financial arrangement whereby the United States would make available to Great Britain sufficient money to help restore the British economy.

Their goal was to start the wheels of world trade moving once again. After weeks of negotiations, a figure of $3,750,000,000 was finally decided upon as the sum Congress should be asked to approve.

The announcement met varying reactions, both in London and in Washington. Some members of the British Parliament attacked the conditions of the loan. They said the British representatives had come away with a bad bargain.

Here in Washington, reaction has been slowly building, until now, on the eve of Senate hearings, there are two emphatic and quite articulate groups on both sides of the question.

Although part of this subject is tied up emotionally with years of what some claim have been questionable financial transactions with the British, for the most part both the opposition and the proponents rest their case on cold logic.

Those who are opposed claim that the money could be better spent in getting our own house in order. They say we should allow our returning veterans to borrow more money at a lower rate of interest than the present GI bill allows or grant veterans outright bonuses.

There is the complaint by various Senators that the negotiations were conducted too secretly, and that much more information should be forthcoming before Congress acts.

Some also want to know whether or not the British loan is the forerunner of similar loans to Russia and other nations.

Those in favor claim that this new loan agreement is different in almost every respect from the old war debt—that this loan will go largely for purchases of raw materials and equipment to help restore the British economy.

Most of the money, they say, will be spent right here in the United States. Proponents also point out that by the terms of this loan, Great Britain is to end at once exchange controls on day-by-day business transactions with Americans, and within a year exchange controls throughout the entire sterling bloc area.

They point out also that Congress has already paved the way for such international economic cooperation by extending the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, expanding the Export-Import Bank, and providing additional funds for UNRRA.

Those are the high lights for you, Mr. and Mrs. America, whose decision this ultimately becomes. We pose the question: "What should we do about the British loan?"

We have as our guests four distinguished authorities. First, a noted American who played a leading part in the negotiations with the representatives of Great Britain on this financial agreement, the Assistant Secretary of State, Hon. William L. Clayton. Mr. Clayton.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Granik and ladies and gentleman, I am for the British agreement—and I prefer to call it an agreement rather than a loan, the loan only being one aspect of it—because this agreement is an essential element in the organization of the postwar world for economic peace among nations, without which world peace cannot long be preserved.

Without the British agreement, nations are almost certain to continue the course on which they were set by two world wars—a course of economic nationalism, of closed markets, of economic blocs patterned along the lines of Nazi Germany, with all that such a course brings in pulling and hauling between nations for more power and more trade territory.

With the British agreement, it is almost certain that Britain and the United States, with more than half of the world's trade, can lead the nations of the world back to a system of open markets where every country is free to trade with every other country on equal terms, where economic blocs become impossible, and where the trade of the world develops and expands under a system of natural competition with increased production, increased consumption, and a rising standard of living for all peoples everywhere.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. Clayton. And now one of the outstanding Members of the House of Representatives, a good friend of the Forum, the distinguished Congressman from the State of Missouri, Representative DEWEY SHORT.

Representative SHORT. Chairman Granik, I am against this proposed British loan with all my heart and soul. I talk as I vote, and I vote as I talk. I would like the world to know just how much money our opponents would be willing to lend a neighbor to whom they made a loan 25 years ago, which has never been repaid, and whether they would be anxious to give him another $3,750,000,000 now.

Most of the people who favor this loan do not care much about the taxpayer's money. They are great liberals with the other guy's dough. Charity begins at home. A good citizen is not the man who takes care of the whole community and lavishly wastes his substance upon his neighbors while his own wife and children are in want and need. You do not have to go to Europe to find misery. I have seen it; I have seen it dozens of times in every country over there during the past quarter of a century, and I have seen it hundreds of times right here in the United States.

So long as I know they have crown jewels of the king and the czar—and I have seen them, they are brilliant and would bring a neat sum on any market today, enough to run any government for quite a while—as long as they wear ermine and emeralds in London and Moscow, as long as foreign assets are hidden in nearly every country of the world, I am not going to vote for one dollar to take food out of the mouths of my own people. Our old people are now drawing inadequate pensions, not enough for medicine, let alone fuel, rent, food, and clothing. Why not take care of them before the rest of the world?

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman SHORT. Next, an authority we are always delighted to have with us on this program, one of our very good friends, the distinguished Senator from the State of Florida, Senator CLAUDE PEPPER.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Granik, ladies and gentleman, I feel very profoundly that we will be making an invaluable contribution to the peace and security of the world by immediate passage of this financial agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States. I say that because it is good business for America to make this loan. And why do I say that? In the first place, because this loan is not a gift; is is an agreement to help the best customer the United States ever had to get to be that good customer again.

This loan to Great Britain will make it possible for Britain to buy the products of American industry, particularly the heavy goods industries which depend so much on export markets. I say it is good business for America because it will benefit every section of our economy—agriculture, industry, and labor, for they bought half a billion dollars' worth of goods, half of them agricultural products, in 1937.

Frankly, I am a little at a loss to understand the reasons for this presumed hostility to this financial agreement. Certainly upon reflection, the opposition does not want the alternative of exchange restrictions and the continuance of emergency controls which will keep American goods from British markets—and I might say from other markets as well. This agreement, on the contrary, means a breaking up of the old system of unilateral exchange restrictions. By this agreement the British have agreed to abolish, for example, the sterling pool, which will enable us to build up trade on better terms with other nations, as well as the British.

The events of the last year have made it unmistakably clear that international cooperation in the political field must rest on international economic cooperation. In truth, world trade and world peace await our decision.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator PEPPER. Next, another friend of the forum who has come to these microphones many times to discuss vital issues, the distinguished Senator from the State of Colorado, Senator EDWIN C. JOHNSON.

Senator JOHNSON. Wild and uncontrolled inflation is sweeping the earth. Tonight a cup of coffee costs $100 in certain cities, and yet we Americans smugly think it cannot happen here. Under Federal Reserve arrangements, every dollar of our huge bond issues is printing-press money. Tonight the currency of the United States, which includes a trainload of interest-bearing printing-press money which we call bonds, totals more than $300,000,000,000. Now it is proposed that we add another carload of printing-press money to that trainload of inflated currency which already is threatening the very existence of this Republic. It is proposed that we issue 3,750,000,000 additional paper dollars to finance a British loan.

During the next 3 years Britain expects to spend twice the amount of this loan on armaments. If Britain gets such a loan from us she will be able to hold her own in the world's current armament race.

Henry Wallace says not only must we put up $8,000,000,000 to carry out our pledge in the Bretton Woods agreement, plus several thousand million dollars for UNRRA, but in addition to those carloads of paper money this great liberal leader anticipates that during the next 3 years we must put up $15,000,000,000 for additional loans to Europe and Asia. I do not charge the American sponsors of these vicious loans a desire to finance a world armament race, but the net result of their fantastic proposal will do exactly that. What a bankrupt heritage this generation of Americans is leaving to posterity. It can happen here, Ted Granik. If the present trend continues, soon a cup of coffee will cost $100 right here in Washington.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen. There we have the issues and the sides are clearly drawn. And now to start our discussion, Mr. Clayton, since you are a good businessman, in your opinion, is this loan merely a gift, or is it good business?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Granik, in no sense can it be considered a gift. The loan is proposed in a solemn agreement which is entered into by two great nations, and the agreement carries the commitments and conditions which will make it possible for the loan to be repaid in that the agreement provides that, within 1 year after it becomes effective, trade as between Britain and the United States, and Britain and the rest of the world, and the United States and the rest of the world, shall be on a multilateral basis and not on a bilateral basis.

Senator JOHNSON. But, Mr. Clayton, you are familiar with the fact that the United Kingdom has already entered into bilateral agreements with France, with Sweden, with the Netherlands, and with two or three other western European countries. They have already entered into them.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir; and that is one of the great advantages and benefits of this agreement, and this agreement provides that those agreements shall be canceled within 1 year after this agreement become effective.

Representative SHORT. Ted, Mr. Clayton is a very successful man, and we all respect his judgment a great deal, but I can't see how he considers it a good business proposition to run the risk of lending a creditor who has not yet paid back an obligation that has extended over 25 years, by giving him more money. I know many merchants who have gone broke by extending credit, but none ever went broke on a cash basis, and often the fellow you extend the credit to turns out hating you instead of repaying you.

Mr. CLAYTON. That brings on a lot of other talk, Mr. SHORT. The other loan, as you call it, was really lend-lease. We knew better this time. Instead of extending a loan for goods that were priced at two or three prices, and with a high rate of interest, goods that were shot away in a war that was a common war for them and for us, this time we have given it on lend-lease and have been given it on lend-lease, and are wiping it out with an agreement. Everything that has been consumed and shot away at a common enemy, the airplanes used to bomb his plants, and things of that kind, the old, worn-out tanks, we are not charging for this time.

Representative SHORT. Without pride of power, lust of ambition, or desire for material gain, we went into the war 25 years ago, came out without a dollar of indemnity, without an acre of territory. After the war we extended loans of $13,000,000,000 to the allies, and the little country of Finland was the only one that made a serious effort to pay us back.

You come along after this exhausting war when we have expended $49,000,000,000 in lend-lease, ten and one-half to Russia, and 39 to Great Britain, and after furnishing three-fourths of all the Allied troops in north Africa, Sicily, Italy, and the Western Front, and after winning the war in the Pacific almost single-handed with hat in hand wanting another hand-out. Will Clayton never made his money by extending credit to such customers.

Senator PEPPER. On the contrary, I think it was such far-sighted vision as he has exhibited in this trade agreement that made it possible for Mr. Will Clayton to build up the greatest cotton brokerage business in the world and to have fifteen or twenty million dollars of his own money.

Senator JOHNSON. Yes, but this time he is not using his own money.

Senator PEPPER. But he is putting up more of his own money for taxes than we are around this table, I can tell you that.

Senator JOHNSON. Before the evening is over, I am going to give him a chance to invest some of his own money in the British loan if he thinks it is such wonderful business.

Representative SHORT. I have no objection whatever to your floating a private British loan here, if anyone wants to run the hazard or take the risk. Do not force it on the taxpayers.

Mr. CLAYTON. I don't see why in an agreement that is for the benefit of the Nation as a whole, we should expect only a part of the Nation to put up the money. This agreement is for the benefit of the United States as a whole, every man, woman, and child in it, and I think the Nation as a whole ought to put up the money that is advanced to the British.

Representative SHORT. Mr. Clayton, I want to emphasize the point that the United States of America is not the richest country in the world, which a lot of people foolishly think. Other countries are larger than we are in area and in population and have vaster untapped natural resources. Now we have gone to the rescue twice in our own generation and extended loans, we have given this $49,000,000,000 in lend-lease, we have set up under the Bretton Woods agreement an international bank with $10,000,000,000 assets, and we are responsible for six billion, we have appropriated $3,500,000,000 to the Export-Import Bank, we voted one billion three hundred and fifty million for UNRRA, we voted another billion three hundred and fifty million to UNRRA, we furnished 72 percent of all those funds and the other nations have put in 28 percent. Now there is an end to our capacity and there is also an end to the road.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Granik, I think it is very easy in these discussions to get off on extraneous issues. It seems to me the question that is important is, what is Britain going to do, and what will be the effect of what she does on American business and our economy if this loan is not made? Everyone knows that Britain has had a terrible burden to bear in this war, and instead of my friend, Mr. SHORT, giving us all the credit for saving Great Britain, I think that she and France and the other countries that bore the first brunt of German aggression in World War I and World War II are entitled to have a word said on their behalf for what they did in saving us as well.

What I started to say was that due to the condition that Britain is in today financially, I am not speaking about the fact that they have a lower clothing and food ration today that they had during the war, but I said due to the fact that they are in the condition they are in today with respect to world trade, they can't buy again $500,000,000 of products a year from the United States, half of them agricultural products, as they did in 1937, unless we can help them get back on their feet.

Senator JOHNSON. I thought they were going to trade with us. Are we going to put up the money for them to buy goods from us? Is that good business? If you are talking about trading, let's trade. Let's trade goods for goods, if that is what the formula is.

Senator PEPPER. Senator, the peculiarity is that Britain makes her living primarily by taking raw materials from the ends of the earth, and principally from this country, and converting them into finished goods. Now she can't begin to sell us anything until she can first get the raw materials to run through her factories. She has to get dollars from us before we can get the raw materials.

Representative SHORT. And when we lend her the dollars, she will spend most of them with her colonies abroad and our money will be gone and we will be sitting high and dry.

Chairman GRANIK. Senator JOHNSON, here is a question directed to you: Isn't the only alternative to the British loan a form of economic isolationism whose political counterpart helped bring on World War II?

Senator JOHNSON. Of course not. That is a perfectly ridiculous and silly question. When you are talking business, business is one thing, and while commerce, of course, does cause wars—but we always hear these arguments, we heard the arguments when we were talking about the Bretton Woods agreement, "Why, sure, if we don't act upon the Bretton Woods agreement, if the United States Congress doesn't act favorably upon it, the whole world will be plunged into war again," and I supported the Bretton Woods agreement.

Representative SHORT. ED, I didn't, but we are the only country that has ratified it. Britain hasn't ratified it; Russia hasn't ratified it. Perhaps when we give them these loans, then they will pay part of our money into the fund.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am sorry, Mr. SHORT, but you are in error. Britain has ratified it and almost every country in the world has ratified it.

Representative SHORT. She hasn't put up any of the dough.

Mr. CLAYTON. Russia hasn't ratified it, but Britain and almost every country in the world has already ratified the Bretton Woods agreement, and we are meeting in Savannah on the 8th of March to organize it.

I would like to make a point about something Senator JOHNSON said. He said we ought to trade goods for goods with Britain. That is the kind of trading, Senator JOHNSON, that we are trying to avoid in this agreement, what we call bilateral trading, a closed market trading: Britain will buy something of ours if we will buy the same thing of hers. We want multilateral trading, trading around the world, so that every country is free to trade with every other country. The kind of trading that you speak of is the kind of trading that Hitler did.

Senator JOHNSON. No, I am not.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am not saying you are for Hitler or anything of that kind, but I am telling you that that kind of trading—trading goods for goods between two nations—is bilateral trading.

Senator JOHNSON. That's isn't what I am talking about at all, but I am talking about goods for goods; yes, of course. Do you think you have to loan somebody money to get them to trade with you?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly not.

Senator JOHNSON. Let me tell you something about business, Mr. Clayton. You are a smart businessman and I am not, but if you want people to trade with you, if you want people to buy American goods, the thing that you want them to do is to borrow money from you. Britain owes the Argentine and India, and several other countries, fifteen or fourteen billion dollars. I don't know which it is, but the only way that they can pay those loans is with goods and pay the services with goods. For that reason, Britain does have a fifteen or fourteen billion trade advantage over us with the countries from whom she has borrowed money. If you want to sell something to Great Britain, you are going about it the wrong way.

Mr. CLAYTON. This agreement, Senator JOHNSON, cancels the advantage of which you speak.

Senator JOHNSON. How can you cancel it?

Mr. CLAYTON. If the agreement were not made, then you would be right, but this agreement provides that within a certain period of time Britain is to refund these debts over a long period of time, payment of so much annually, and to make those payments convertible into dollars or francs or any other currency so that the country that is receiving them can buy it in any place in the world it wants to buy, so it will not have to buy in Britain. This agreement cancels the very arrangement that you speak of.

Senator JOHNSON. It doesn't cancel the debts—it doesn't cancel the debt to Argentina and it doesn't cancel the debt to India, and because of that debt, Britain has an advantage over any other nation to sell to those countries.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not in accordance with this agreement because while this agreement doesn't cancel the debt, as you say, it makes the debt convertible, so much per year. The plan is that Britain will refund these debts over a long period of time and as the annual installments come due, they will be convertible into dollars so that these countries can buy in the United States.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Granik, I want to get back to the point of what is the significance in respect to peaceful commerce among the principal powers of the world as influenced by this agreement. Before the war, Great Britain had about 40 percent of all the world trade, I believe, Mr. Clayton.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right.

Senator PEPPER. It is entirely probable, and I think it is the opinion of our best businessmen, that after the war, due to the devastation there is in the other war-torn countries, that the British Empire and their group, and the United States, will together have something like three-fourths of all the world trade. If the British Empire has to bottle all her trade up in the empire system and build a tariff wall around it in order to survive because she hasn't got dollars to trade in a free world market, it means that we have got to do the same thing or there has got to be a trade war to the death between the American and the British economic systems. That is the reason I said I think this agreement was in the interest of peace as well as in the interest of world trade.

Representative SHORT. Of course, we all know that Germany and Japan and Italy, great maritime nations, as well as Norway, a neutral (she was until she was invaded), lost pretty much of their shipping facilities, and that Great Britain will gain that world trade. Of course, she is maneuvering now to get our merchant ships—operating several hundred of them. She will do it again if we be fools enough to give everything away.

Chairman GRANIK. Senator PEPPER, I have a question for you: Secretary Wallace has been quoted as saying that the United States must dig up an additional $15,000,000,000 to be loaned to Europe and Asia. Now the question: Is the projected British loan the first in a series to other countries?

Senator PEPPER. In my opinion, there will be and there should be loans to other countries. The amount of the loan, however, will depend upon the ability of that country in the first place to satisfy men like Mr. Clayton here that they can have a reasonable prospect of paying that money back; in the second place, that they are willing to meet the conditions that we impose.

I happen to have been in London when Mr. Clayton was over there, and I know that he was talking hard business to the British in telling them that if they expected this kind of loan from us, we had to talk about how it was going to benefit the commerce and the business of the United States.

Senator JOHNSON. Sure, that is a good talking point.

Senator PEPPER. So, in making loans to these other countries, the essential criterion is not that it is going to be a gift, not UNRRA, but business advantage to the United States.

Representative SHORT. That is a lot of nice, pretty talk they give us, but the fact is, the British people have quadrupled their savings in this war An AP dispatch from London as late as February 7, by Harold McIntosh, chairman of the National Savings Committee, says that during the past 6 years the small saver has increased his reserves of national savings from five billion to twenty billion four hundred million dollars, a fourfold increase.

Now, we can't overlook the fact that this war cost us $469,000,000,000, as well as over a million casualties, and that we have a staggering national debt of $280,000,000,000 today, the highest per capita debt of any people on the face of the earth.

Senator JOHNSON. Yes, and, Dewey Short, it is a debt that is larger than the combined and total debt of all the rest of the world. It is far greater than the total debt of all the rest of the world, of course, leaving Japan and Germany and Italy out.

Representative SHORT. Of course Britain wants a $3,750,000,000 loan; Russia has already indicated she wants a $6,000,000,000 loan; Mr. Guoin, the successor of Charles De Gaulle, says the only thing that will save France will be a $2,500,000,000 American loan; Poland needs two billion; and China can use five. Where in the name of common sense are you going to get the money?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Short, you say the war cost us $469,000,000,000. If we spent $469,000,000,000 to win the war, shouldn't we spend a little less than 1 percent of that amount to help win the peace?

Representative SHORT. Yes, if I could be assured that it would win the peace, or even contribute to the winning of it, I would be for it.

Mr. CLAYTON. It will help win it.

Senator JOHNSON. This is what you are doing as I see it. The Secretary of Commerce said that the trading deficit of Europe, Asia, and South America for the next 3 years will be $51,000,000,000. That is their deficit. Excluding the United States, the rest of the world will expend during the next 3 years $65,000,000,000 for armaments. If it were not for the current armament race, would there be a deficit of $51,000,000,000 abroad? You talk about your war. Let's hear your answer to that!

Mr. CLAYTON. I don't know. I don't know the answer, Senator JOHNSON, but I do know this, that in two world wars we were very, very happy that Britain and France and other countries had spent some money on armaments and did have a navy to protect us until we could get ready. I know that.

Senator JOHNSON. And they were mighty glad to have us come in, too.

Mr CLAYTON. They may have been.

Senator JOHNSON. May have been?

Mr. CLAYTON. It was a mutual rescue party. It was not one-sided.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Granik and Senator JOHNSON, I think we are spending a considerable sum upon armament ourselves, and I guess these other countries——

Senator JOHNSON (interposing). We are because they are. We have to.

Senator PEPPER. Maybe they are because we are. It is like which came first, the hen or the egg.

Senator JOHNSON. Oh, no; we are disarming, and there has been a great deal of complaint in this country because we are disarming.

Senator PEPPER. Yes, we are disarming except for the exclusive possession of the atomic bomb.

Senator JOHNSON. We have asked the Council to take charge of the atomic bomb.

Senator PEPPER. No. We won't get off on that.

Senator JOHNSON. You are the fellow who launched it, so go ahead.

Senator PEPPER. We are not telling the Security Council to take it, unfortunately; but what I started to say was, the way we can reduce this armament, the way we can have a more peaceful world, is to have free world trade where we don't build tariff walls, where we don't build these totalitarian economic or political systems around the various countries or country groups, but have the kind of free world trade that will give private enterprise and not collectivism a chance to live in the world.

Representative SHORT. But some of us, CLAUDE, still believe in protection in this country and are not yet going to become free traders.

Senator PEPPER. So did the Chinese when they built a wall around their country.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Clayton, I have a question for you. While Britain is applying for a loan here she is reportedly negotiating loans to other nations. For example, Greece is said to get $40,000,000 in British loans, for which Britain in return receives valuable commercial and political advantages. Why is Britain loaning money if she herself must borrow?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am sorry, I can't answer that, Mr. Granik. Whatever Britain may loan in a small way to a country like Greece would certainly be paid for in British manufactures. What we are loaning Britain is essential for Britain to pay for her imports, her foods, and her raw materials, without which she can't feed herself and she can't work over the 3-year period of reconversion.

Representative SHORT. I want to congratulate the British on their good sense and fine patriotism. She is loaning that money to Greece to protect her lifeline to India and the Far East, to keep Russia out of the Dardanelles. That is why Britain is doing it. Britain is going to look after Britain first, last, and all the time, and if we have any sense we will look after ourselves.

Senator PEPPER. Well, I think the evidence is that we have been able to do fairly well by ourselves over here, and I think that we will in the future.

You asked the question a while ago about what Mr. Wallace had said about $15,000,000,000 of loans to Europe. I understood Mr. Wallace to be talking about the amount of loans which would enable Europe to become normal customers again of the United States. The only way we can have full employment in this country, the only way our factories that are capable of turning out so much of riches can operate is for us to have something like $10,000,000,000 a year of foreign trade, and we cannot have that trade, we cannot keep those factories running, agriculture cannot keep up its present production and we cannot keep up our standard of empoyment, uness we can have those people able to buy from us in dollars.

Senator JOHNSON. Senator PEPPER, right while Secretary Wallace was making his statement about the necessity for our making $15,000,000,000 worth of loans to the world, foreign holdings in the United States, not including $4,000,000,000 in foreign-owned gold, totaled more than $14,000,000,000; American assets belonging to the United Kingdom are three billion two hundred million; and Canada has got a small sum of one billion seven hundred million. That is British dollars in this country.

Senator PEPPER. The British have all together just about the amount of assets in the world that they have liabilities in terms of dollars—in other words, they would be just about even with the world if they had to pay off and could get all their assets suddenly converted into liquid assets, but, Senator, Mr. Will Clayton would not have negotiated this loan to the British if they had had liquid capital in the form of dollars in this country with which they could have done what they can do with this $3,750,000,000.

Representative SHORT. I would like to say to the able Senator from Florida that Britain does have $3,238,900,000 in this country in bank deposits and invested in stocks and other securities, practically the same amount that she is asking for in this loan. You call it a loan. I call it a gift. Tear the mask from its face. They came over for a gift after VJ day. They wanted a $5,000,000,000 gift. No, that wasn't welcome to us, so you dickered with them for a while and finally agreed on the sum of three billion seven hundred and fifty million—and how are they to pay it back? For the first 5 years they pay no interest at all, though it costs this Government 2 percent interest to negotiate and sell bonds to our citizens; then they are given a 50-year period to pay that money back at a rate of interest of 1.62 percent, less than 2 percent interest, while we charge our own GI boys 4 percent interest; and then they pay it back over a 50-year period, provided the balance of trade is in their favor. There is a provision, a loophole. They will never pay it back.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. SHORT, it is perfectly natural, in the position that you take on this matter, that you should concentrate on the loan and the terms of the loan, but you overlook the commitments, the advantages and the benefits which the United States gets for that money, and I tell you that if Britain does not get this money in order to take care of her food and raw materials which she must import in the 3 years in which she is trying to get her boys back home and get them back in the factories and get the factories reconverted and reconstructed for peacetime construction—if she does not get the money to do that, she is driven to defensive methods of world trade, and in doing so, she will make long-term contracts, for example, with some great country that is a great producer of cotton, and she will make a contract with some other country that produces something else, so that we will be shut out not only for 3 or 4 or 5 years of trade with Britain on our agricultural products and other products from this country but we may be shut out for 50 years, and not only with Britain but with many other countries.

Senator JOHNSON. But Mr. Clayton, why is it that when you presented this agreement and this loan proposal to the American people, you did not accompany it with a financial statement of Britain? That is one of the peculiar things that is lacking in this whole deal. As a banker, you wouldn't let anyone come into your bank and borrow money without a clear-cut financial statement. Why is it that we do not have a financial statement?

Chairman GRANIK. I am sorry, gentlemen, we pause briefly for summation of the arguments. Congressman SHORT, will you sum up?

Representative SHORT. We all want, of course, to get along with Great Britain and live on a high level of the friendliest feelings, but we don't feel, with the huge debt we have today, larger per capita than any other people on earth, and with the high taxes that confront us, that we are in a position to extend another loan to Great Britain, which will surely be followed by demands of other nations for loans that will run into the billions of dollars

The British empire has 540,000,000 people in it. It is scattered all over the world and the sun never sets on it. They have vast natural untapped resources of rubber, oil, timber, minerals, jewels, and precious metals, over $15,500,000,000 of unmined gold, about $9,000,000,000 in diamonds, and why, since they have quadrupled their savings during this war, should this Nation of 139,000,000 people be burned for the second time? We were burned a quarter of a century ago. The first time you are stung by a bee, that isn't your fault; it is perhaps the bee's; but if you are stung a second time within a quarter of a century, then that is your fault.

We feel that while our loan to Britain might promote world trade to a certain extent——

Chairman GRANIK (interposing). Talk into the microphone.

Representative SHORT. Oh, I thought everybody could hear me. I don't like to talk into these tin horns. It is like kissing a beautiful girl through a screen door, you don't get the full effect.

Chairman GRANIK. I am sorry, Congressman SHORT, your time has expired.

Senator PEPPER will you sum up?

Senator PEPPER. No doubt the subject which DEWEY SHORT has suggested is far more pleasant to mediate upon than the cold facts of a British agreement. I am afraid I am going to have to yield to him in making the osculatory contributions to the debate.

I think all of us feel that the principal task of this generation is to save the next from the curse of war. We promised these boys when they went forth to war that we wouldn't make the mistake this time that we made after the last war and forget them. We promised them we were going to work with other nations to build a better world. We have gone a long way toward paying that debt to the dead already. We have set up UNO. We have set up the International Bank. We have set up the Reconstruction Fund for the rehabilitation of war-torn countries. Now we are trying to make it possible for those countries that are the bearers of the principal burden of that kind of world able to bear that burden, and Britain can't do it, however much she believes in democracy, unless she gets enough help to get going again.

That is what this loan, this agreement, is primarily for. But we have asked her, too, to make concessions; that is, to contemplate the kind of world trade that we believe in, and that is what she has agreed to, and we are step by step and stone by stone building the edifice of a new world, bearing the craftsman's mark of those men who gave their lives that we might have that kind of world.

That, I believe, is the principal significance of this agreement. We have negotiated through our executive agencies. It has been agreed to by the British House of Commons. It is now before our Congress and our country. I believe that it should be agreed to.

Chairman GRANIK. I am sorry, gentlemen; our time is up. [Applause.]

Wisconsin's War Casualties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of July 3, 1946:

WISCONSIN'S WAR CASUALTIES

Official World War II Army casualty reports just published show Wisconsin's Army losses as 7,038 dead and missing.

There is probably little profit in pointing out that this was about twice the number of Wisconsin soldiers who died in World War I, when the State's total was fourth highest in the Nation, or that Milwaukee's total losses in this war were three times as great as in 1917-18. This was a greater and deadlier war, in which four times as many Americans were put in uniform and many times as many actually went to overseas battle fronts for longer periods of service.

Civilian sacrifices, too, were comparably greater. Separation, anxiety, sorrow, pain, disfigurement, death—these and the hundred other agonies of war have touched every family, and the scars, mental and physical, will never all be mended.

Do we forget? Do we dare forget?

Marble and bronze may help perpetuate the memory of the war and all its sacrifices. But what cold and hollow memorials these will be unless they signify our determination to live in greater mutual helpfulness, in humble gratitude for the blessings now preserved for us, which we want to extend to all men, everywhere.

Only as we now prove by our actions that our town, our State, our Nation, and our world can be better for having shared so universally in the pain and death and devastation of war can we win a truly compensating victory.

Wisconsin, counting its dead and mourning them, can determine to lead the way. To do so would demonstrate a patriotism worthy of the sons who died for us.

Have We Less Courage Now?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of July 3, 1946:

HAVE WE LESS COURAGE NOW?

This Fourth of July marks our one hundred and seventieth anniversary as a nation.

Our country is troubled, its people are confused and uncertain of the future. Self-interest and greed have pyramided the woes and disorders that trailed the greatest war in our history. This birthday, instead of being a joyous one to hail the return of our sons from the danger of war, finds us disturbed and fearful.

Perhaps it would be helpful on this anniversary to look back to the day of our birth—that July 4 of 1776.

Along the Atlantic seaboard stretched 13 weak colonies, disunited, sparsely settled, poor. Driven by hatred of oppression, they had banded loosely to go to war with the greatest military power of the time. They faced this trial with no unified government, no financial stability, no armed forces worth the mention, no war industry, no allies at that time in all the world.

The outlook was never darker than in that July of 1776. The expedition into Canada had retreated precipitately to Lake Champlain, 5,000 of its 8,000 members out of action. The Continental Congress had ordered a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. The British were poising on Long Island for an assault on New York. In the south, Clinton's men were retreating after an attack on Charleston.

With a military situation facing them that must have been black with despair, 54 men at Philadelphia brought a new Nation into the world. They gave final approval to that inspiring document which declared this country's independence in stirring words about the equality of man and his unalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. And to this cause of freedom they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

Those 54 men of courage, along with all the American forefathers of 1776, went through their dark period and saw the infant Nation firmly established. Those who followed them went through other periods of stress—dangerous days of depression and a War Between the States that tried men's souls to the limit of endurance.

Our tribulations of 1946 are not comparable with those of 1776, or 1812, or 1860, or of more recent memory, the terrible days of December 1941. Are we, therefore, such poor men that we shall falter and yield the bountiful inheritance that has come to us?

Let us cease our bickering and our selfishness. Let us march forward again, together, as we did in the recent war, to meet the great destiny that awaits us. Let us advance in confidence, as did those first Americans on that July day 170 years ago. Why not quit feeling sorry for ourselves and get the courage of these men of former days?

Democracy or Dictatorship in Business and Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, July 13 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, Senators all know that one of the ablest, best-informed, and most thoughtful Members of the Senate is the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. We recall his magnificent work as chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee. We know of the many fine contributions he makes all the time to the work of the Senate. The Senator from Wyoming has written a most interesting and timely article captioned "Democracy or dictatorship in business and government." This article was printed in the April 1946 issue of Dun's Review. I hope the article may be widely read, and particularly do I commend it to businessmen and leaders throughout the country. I ask unanimous consent to have the article printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRACY OR DICTATORSHIP IN BUSINESS AND GOVERNMENT

(By JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, United States Senator from Wyoming)

Does American business have a blind spot that prevents it from seeing that what it most detests about government is the adoption by government of the managerial techniques which are the outstanding characteristic of modern industrial organization, and that the most effective way to fight regimentation by public managers is first to prevent regimentation by private managers?

Totalitarianism in government is the outgrowth of economic totalitarianism or, to put it in another way, political collectivism and economic collectivism are blood brothers. Unfortunately, however, in the world-wide struggle between collectivism and democracy in which the existence of free enterprise is threatened, the political collectivists have a great advantage because they know that they want to establish complete public management through the state, but business executives, though vigorously protesting against a state-managed economy, set the pattern for statism by insisting that private management shall have a free hand in running the huge collectivist economic units of modern times. They believe themselves to be the defenders of free enterprise, although their managerial policies set the pattern for statism.

It is management itself, unregulated and absolute, and not merely public management which is the foe of free enterprise. This is the primary fact which must first be understood if we are to make a successful effort to preserve economic freedom. If we desire to prevent the development of dictatorial political power, we must begin by eliminating dictatorial economic power.

ECONOMIC ABSOLUTISM BREEDS TOTALITARIANISM

The point I am making, that absolutism in government derives from economic absolutism, has the support of a notable economic authority who, during the past year, has frequently been quoted with enthusiastic approval in the offices of what we call Big Business. I refer to Friedrich A. Hayek, author of The Road to Serfdom. This economist, with whose primary contention I quite agree that the all-powerful state reduces the citizen to servitude, was at great pains to point out in the introduction to his famous book that the Socialists of the "left" who were driven out of Germany by the Nazis were nevertheless just as vigorous advocates of statism as their persecutors. In a striking note at the conclusion of the introduction of his book, Hayek tells us of the "kinship between socialism and the organization of the Prussian state, consciously organized from the top as in no other country." Then he tells us:

"Long before the ideal of running the whole state on the same principles as a single factory was to inspire nineteenth century socialism, the Prussian poet, Novalis, had already deplored that 'no other state has ever been administered so much like a factory as Prussia since the death of Frederick William.'"

Totalitarianism, in other words, is the application to the state of the factory system of control from the top. What's wrong with the factory system, it will be asked. Should a man not be permitted to run his own business? Of course he should, but it is not what a man does with his own business that creates the problem in economics and government for the modern world; it is what the hired business experts we call management do with the businesses the stockholder-owners of which no longer exercise the active prerogatives of ownership.

It must be acknowledged that Washington during the past decade has given many examples of the adoption of the "factory system" by the Government, but a frank examination of what has been done will reveal the constant imitation by Government management of the techniques of private management.

When Nelson Rockefeller became Coordinator of the Office of Inter-American Affairs by appointment of President Roosevelt, he created a Delaware corporation to spend the millions which were allocated to him by the President to promote health and sanitation in Latin America. By the end of 1944, Federal managers, following the example of private management, had established some 50 or 60 subsidiary Delaware corporations to exercise functions of the Federal Government which were thought to be necessary, and none of these corporations, like their prototypes in business, was directed by the people whose money was spent or those whose lives were affected.

The plain truth is that most of the bright young lawyers who were the architects of the New Deal learned their technique in the offices of the distinguished corporation lawyers of New York just as one of the principal advisers of Henry Wallace, in setting up the AAA, was the managerial expert of the Prudential Life Insurance Co. who handled the farm real estate of that company.

The only real difference between public management and private management is that public management operates in the whole economy while private management operates in different segments of the economy though it affects the whole. Perhaps this is the reason why so many business executives do not seem to comprehend the dissimilarity between an economy carried on primarily by organizations and an economy carried on by individuals. They think of themselves as owners though they are not owners, but employees. Confusion is increased when the owner-manager of a small business thinks of himself as though he were also a modern collectivist economic state.

The lesson which must be learned if we are to resist the world-wide drift toward totalitarianism is that an economy of individuals is utterly different from an economy of organizations and that, if we are to preserve democracy we must find the way to preserve the authority of the individual over all the organizations he creates. Man is a natural person. The organization is an artificial creature of man. The task facing America in the modern crisis is to show the world how to maintain the supremacy of man. It is the old issue of democracy versus dictatorship and it arises in the economic field.

In Dun's Review of September 1945 Lewis H. Brown, president of Johns-Manville Corp., an executive of unusually clear vision and great ability, made an incisive statement of the underlying principle which must be accepted by all who would engage effectively in the struggle of free enterprise against a state-managed economy:

"Experience," Mr. Brown writes, "has made it evident that being trained merely to make a living is not enough to meet the requirements of this day and age.

"We must also as individuals and as a Nation have a clear understanding of how we propose cooperatively to create the political, economic, and social atmosphere in which we as civilized beings can work together for our own general welfare."

This is sound American philosophy. It recognizes the preeminence of the general welfare. It acknowledges that "civilized beings," that is to say, people, as individuals, are the source of all political, economic, and social authority and that they must cooperate to create the atmosphere in which they can live and work together. It is an affirmation of the belief that the national economy, like the national Government, belong to all of us and not to any part or group or class among us.

NATIONAL ECONOMY BELONGS TO ALL

The chief trouble in the modern world has been the failure of people to perceive the fundamental fact that we cannot have free government if we do not have a free economy and that, in our time, the people did not lose the power actually to direct their own government until after they had lost the power to direct their own economy. The drift toward big government did not begin until business had outgrown the jurisdiction of little and local government.

There never was a time in the history of this country when it was not recognized that the people's Government should have the power to regulate commerce. It was written into the Constitution itself at the very beginning and Congress began to exercise the power the minute it was organized. Although those who were to be regulated usually resisted, the desirability of regulation was never seriously challenged.

On the other hand, Congress was always slow to extend national controls over individuals while business was carried on by individuals. When, however, with the development of modern science and technology local geographical boundaries were erased and commerce began to pass from the control of individuals to the control of organizations managed by experts rather than by the stockholders, then began the development of national commercial regulation in a big way.

THE BEGINNINGS OF BIG GOVERNMENT

When modern industrial organization became so great that it spanned the Nation, when management, from central offices, began to direct the labor of thousands of workers and the dollars of thousands of stockholders, Congress began to set up the boards and commissions, the rules and regulations of which are the cause of so much criticism. It must not be overlooked, however, that these Government agencies were created by every administration for a half century past without regard to whether or not the administration was called progressive or reactionary. Liberalism and conservatism have nothing to do with the problem. The political structure is the outgrowth of the economic structure and one cannot be separated from the other.

How else is it possible to explain that an abandonment of the agencies of Government management has not been advocated by any political party in this country since the Government began to grow? It was Governor Dewey himself who, in the last Presidential campaign, asserted:

"In agriculture, in labor, and in money, we are committed to some degree of Government intervention in the free workings of our economic system."

This sort of intervention by the Federal Government in modern business was initiated when the Interstate Commerce Commission was created. Woodrow Wilson signed the bill creating the Federal Trade Commission and President Harding signed the bill giving the Secretary of Agriculture the power to regiment packing houses and stockyards. None of these laws was repealed or weakened during the administration of Mr. Hoover. On the contrary, the powers of Government were expanded under him as they had been expanded under his predecessors. In meeting the problems of the depression under President Roosevelt, then in surmounting the crisis of the war, and now in dealing with the problems of reconversion, the managerial principles of the factory system are still being applied to our Government. We are being ruled from the top. Certainly no one has as yet proposed any alternative. Management and labor, both directed by experts, sit down with the experts of Government, to whom Congress has delegated its powers, and the people instead of governing in the traditional sense are being governed. We all wait breathlessly for the decisions of the experts.

Surely no one can seriously contend that the mere abolition of Government management would restore economic freedom to the people. That would only mean that private managers would operate without regulation in the public interest. They would not be regulated by local government because local government is unequal to the task. They would not be regulated by the National Government because the National Government would, under such a plan, have washed its hands of all responsibility. Chaos then would be the inevitable result for their would be no agency to safeguard the public welfare in the clash of conflicting private groups and organizations.

The so-called pressure group, like the modern corporation, is governed from the top. The members take their cues from the managers rather than from their own knowledge of the facts. Every Member of Congress receives every year thousands of telegrams from his district which he knows were written in Washington by the group managers and telephoned or wired to the country with instructions to be poured in on Congress. This is but another illustration of the confusion which is created by the failure to recognize the difference between the individual and the organization.

This failure to perceive that the economy in which most men use their own capital and manage their own businesses in their own localities is utterly and completely different from the economy in which huge industrial empires are operated throughout the country and throughout the world by hired managers is the chief pitfall for democracy. It is absurd, for example, to think of General Motors or United States Steel as an example of free private enterprise. They are collectivist enterprises consisting of hundreds of thousands of stockholders and hundreds of thousands of workers. They are collectivist economic states which exercise an influence upon the welfare of all the people and which are as far beyond the powers of cities and counties and States to regulate in the public interest as is the airplane that hops from New York to San Francisco through the stratosphere.

The corporate executive will say that he exercises his authority by virtue of the acquiescence of his stockholders. That is precisely what the executive of the totalitarian state says. He claims to act for the benefit and by the acquiescence of the people. He is a master in the use of the proxy. Whether the manager operates in the economic or in the political state he exercises authority from the top according to the factory system whose kinship with the Prussian state was so frankly acknowledged by Doctor Hayek.

Mr. Brown put the issue very succinctly in his article of last September. "We must make our choice," he writes, "we must either completely reestablish our democratic system in America or we must completely accept the totalitarian philosophy. There is no middle road." Obviously, the restoration of the democratic system cannot be attained by urging the National Government to abandon all regulation of the national economy, for that would be merely to advocate the abdication of public government in favor of a multiplicity of private governments.

REGIMENTATION BY BUSINESS

I am sure no one will contend that modern business organization does not set up its own forms of government or that the private managerial authority which it establishes does not undertake to regiment the business activities of the people.

Instances without number could be given. On July 5 of last year, for example, a Federal judge in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, in a suit brought by the United States Department of Justice against several of these modern economic business organizations which had established complete private control of a particular industry, declared:

"It was more difficult for the individual outside to enter this business than for the camel to make its proverbial passage through the eye of the needle."

Again, on December 28, last year, the United States District Court of Chicago entered a decree against an organization of more than 500 separate companies which, in 228 principal cities throughout the United States, had set up their own private system for regulating and regimenting the business in which they were engaged.

Similar examples could be multiplied. Readers of Dun's Review are familiar with the fact that price, production, and territorial priorities have always been subjects upon which business organizations have attempted to legislate through their own private systems of commercial regulation. That these regulations affect the whole public and shape the entire economic system, no informed person can deny.

Surely it can be no secret to management that the appearance of the national labor union was an inevitable development of this system. The CIO did not emerge until long after business management had established the managerial form of government in national industries. The national labor organization was a manifestation of self-defense upon the part of workers who, as individuals, were utterly unable to defend themselves against their nationally organized employers. Lest anybody imagine that this is the conclusion of a radical mind, let me quote from the text of Herbert Hoover's speech to the National Republican Club of New York City on Lincoln's Birthday this year:

"Today we see a gigantic growth of labor unions paralleling big business."

This is the testimony of an experienced observer who certainly cannot be regarded as a foe of business.

OPPORTUNITY FOR INDIVIDUAL

Our task, if we are to preserve a free economy, is to adjust the powers of management and the powers of government in such a manner as to keep opportunity for the individual free. This is not to say that modern industrial organization should be scrapped or that big business should be atomized. Not at all. It is merely to say that leaders in business and leaders in government must open their eyes to the plain fact that we are living in an economy which requires organization. It would be impossible to benefit from scientific progress without organization. We must keep the organizations, but we must make them democratic, that is to say we must make them democratic if we really believe that the people are the source of all authority.

I undertake to say that if capitalism would save itself it must first help to save economic democracy. It will not do merely to preserve the forms of political democracy. The remedy must go far deeper. It must reach the root of economic and political freedom. It must protect the individual, for it is at that level that we find the cause of all the turbulence which has made this era the most violent and bloody in human annals. Men fight to live and they will not hesitate to overthrow any institution that appears to be an obstacle to their living. All history teaches us that the system which does not serve the economic needs of the people withers and dies. Capitalism cannot escape that fate unless it is made to serve the economic needs of men.

Capitalism cannot successfully defend itself if it insists that the modern collectivist economic unit shall be governed from above by management according to its own unsupervised will. Capitalism must begin at the beginning and take whatever steps may be necessary to make the modern economic organization responsive to the people. It must be prepared to accept economic democracy, that is to say, it must be prepared to make private management, as well as public management, subject to the public interest.

This should not be regarded as an attack on management. It is not. The modern world requires management. It requires private management and it requires public management. The necessary objective of public policy is only to prevent excesses whether committed by private or public managers. Conserve the good, but eliminate the abuses.

CORRECTIVE PROCEDURE

Government bureaus, for example, should no longer be permitted to make and interpret economic law. Private management likewise should not be permitted to do the same thing. If Government regulatory bodies are to have set over them, as they should, an impartial tribunal to which the citizen and the citizens' organizations may appeal from administrative rules, regulations, and decisions, then surely there must also be a tribunal to which the citizen and his organizations may appeal from the administrative rules, regulations, and decisions of private management.

It is not sufficient, however, merely to set up a corrective procedure to be invoked after the commission of an act against the public interest. The times cry out rather for preventive procedure which will safeguard the public in advance from the restrictive and coercive practices which all experience teaches us have accompanied the development of the collectivist economic unit.

This was the thought I had in mind when in March 1941, in the final report of the Temporary National Economic Committee, I sought to distinguish between the individual and the organization in the following words:

"Democratic society is willing to permit the individual to exercise the utmost freedom, because no individual acting alone can so injure the entire community (except in the case of crime) as to justify the withdrawal of individual liberty. This is not the case, however, when organizations become so large and powerful that by weight of numbers, by wealth or power they threaten or affect the public welfare. In such instances the public has the right to define the nature and the form of the organization, not for the purpose of regimenting it but for the sole purpose of making certain that the organization shall operate in the public interest."

NATIONAL CHARTERS

If by law we recognize that economic organization, like Government organization, must serve the people, then it necessarily follows that we should by statute clearly define the duties and responsibilities of all such organizations so that none of them may be a law unto itself, and all them may be able to read in the law just what they may and may not do.

This is the basis on which democracy can answer totalitarianism, on which free men can escape both economic and political absolutism. The economic organization like the state itself is the servant not the master of men.

In America the people and only the people may prescribe the nature and the form of government. That's why we have a Federal Constitution written by the people; that's why the States have constitutions and the cities charters. That's why we boast of having "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." If there is now danger of government for the people by public managers it is because we have not taken the time and trouble as a people to draw a constitution for the economic organizations that dominate our business life.

The result has been that economic organizations write their own constitutions without regard to the people, and private management comes into existence exercising such power over the trade and commerce of the people that when things go wrong the people turn to government and expand its powers. Thus business loses the very freedom it most wants and invites the regimentation it most dreads.

If, instead of insisting upon the blank checks of a Delaware charter, thus setting a bad example for the Federal Government itself, business leadership would only recognize the logic of national charters for national business, it could help to stop the growth of "big government." A Federal statute fixing national standards of power and responsibility for corporations engaged in interstate commerce would actually set business free, because it would render unnecessary the creation of discretionary Federal bureaus to manage management.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the July 2 issue of the Daily Worker, Stalin's official New York journal, reports that prices of consumer goods were slashed an average of 40 percent in the Soviet Union, starting this past week.

Can any Member of Congress inform me; does anyone know whether they have had an OPA in the Soviet Union? And if so, why did it let prices get so high? Can anyone inform me whether this 40-percent slash is to come about by reducing labor wages or by cutting the exorbitant wartime profits of the Soviet Government? It must be one or the other, because we have been informed for years that everything in the Soviet Union belongs to the workers, so that either they or the Government must have been getting the 40 percent that is now slashed off prices.

If there was no OPA in the Soviet Union, then why are the Communists so united for its continuance here?

America's First Blow for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of July 8, 1946:

AMERICA'S FIRST BLOW FOR PEACE

By many Americans the financial agreement with Britain, which is now before the House, is thought of as merely an instrument for lending money to the British. It is much more than that. And even as a loan transaction, the agreement provides for nothing outright. Credit is to be made available to the British. But the credit is to be extended over a period of years. At this time the United States happens to be the only world source of credit. Why this is so is clear from a check-up of war gains and war losses. Britain went broke; the United States emerged as the only real victor, the mightiest Nation the world has ever seen. We have the credit because we hold the material power—enough of it to put a ravaged world back on its feet.

But if we extend our credit to Britain, we shall be extending more than our material power. We shall be extending our confidence. In this respect our confidence is even more helpful than our money. This will be apparent on reflection as to what would occur if the agreement were beaten. Such a result would be tantamount to our telling the whole of the trading world that we consider Britain a poor risk. Imagine what would happen to a businessman in any community if a banker said this. He would suffer immediately in prestige and position by the deprivation of confidence no less than by the refusal of actual aid. This is what would infallibly be Britain's lot after any congressional vote of no confidence in Britain.

Britain's immediate reaction would be to acquire elsewhere some of the economic strength for which she had looked in vain to the United States. The price she would have to pay would be in political concessions. Where, over the whole earth's face would those concessions have to be made immediately? Clearly in the area where British weakness is most evident, where her power is most challenged, viz., the Middle East. Britain, uncertain as it is now in resisting the pressure of the Arab world, would have to give way all along the line. There would be no disposition in England, let alone strength, to resist that pressure. Indeed, the disposition would be to court it. As we say, there would be Britain's need, born of our lack of confidence in Britain, to seek the friendship of the whole block of Arab nations. Add also the spur coming from bitterness toward America. That would be intense. A vote of no confidence in an ally which at a critical period in our common fortunes alone held back the Teutonic fury would come as a stunning blow to the British people, whose sacrifices in peace just extolled by Prime Minister De Valera, are matching their fortitude in war. Such a vote of itself would evoke anti-Americanism.

As a sign of a return to American isolationism, any such vote would likewise make any effort to accept our point of view superfluous. This is of immediate importance in the Middle East. In the event of a rejection of this credit, the cabinet committee under Mr. Henry F. Grady, which will take off for London July 15 to discuss the steps necessary to carry out the report of the Anglo-American Commission on Palestine, might as well stay home. By that time the British and the Arabs would be enforced bedfellows.

"Save himself who can"—that would be the British watchword in case the House repudiated the financial pact with Britain. Britain could not subscribe to many other American policies besides our Middle East policy. She would have to export or die, and no holds are barred when self-preservation is at stake. We seek common rules and standards for world trade—equal and nondiscriminatory treatment and stable currencies supervised by a world authority. They are enshrined in this agreement. Some of the agencies which would administer these rules have already been set up, as, for instance, the Monetary Stabilization Fund. With none of these rules or bodies could the hard-pressed British have any truck. In consequence, the world, in its trade and money relations, would return to the catch-as-catch-can of the jungle. It would be as if we at home had no uniform dollar to operate with, no courts to protect dealings in it. The House, by its rejection of this agreement, would condemn the world to an endless battle for markets with the gloves off, and the upshot would inexorably be war.

In this struggle for markets the United States would be bound to suffer. It would suffer because a ruleless world economy would mean a low volume of trade. Our trade would be sure to shrivel because of the predominance in our exports of capital equipment and industrial know how. Our capital resources are now so immense that our domestic prosperity can be maintained only out of the disposal abroad of our capital surplus. This is the testimony of the array of business witnesses who have given evidence before the Senate and House committees. Full-employment estimates provide for $10,000,000,000 yearly in American sales abroad for the postwar decade, and most of the sales would be capital equipment. Such exports require long-term credits, meaning faith in a future of peaceful growth and repayment. But in a world given over to commercial war, this kind of business would be at a discount, and immediate needs, instead, would be the world's stock in trade. In this respect the British would be at an advantage. For they have already corralled 50 percent of world trade, such as it is, in the sterling bloc—demobilizable only by the acceptance of this agreement. An expansion of this bloc would be their aim on the American rejection of aid. Moreover, the dollar-poor British, the world's greatest importer, would have to switch their purchases from America to countries which will buy British goods pound for pound. This the House committee noted. We might find, the majority report said, a large increase in acreage devoted to cotton in India and Egypt, because these countries are tied to the pound sterling. British tastes in tobacco might shift from American to Empire brands, American fruits on British tables might be replaced by apples from Australia and oranges from the Middle East.

This distortion in the pattern of trade (to American disadvantage) is bound to follow the rejection of the financial agreement with Britain. Acceptance is thus the dictate of commercial realism. But this is the lowliest argument. The prime reason for commending the agreement to the House is the contribution that this agreement will make to peace. This is no mere credit transaction. It is the basic peace treaty, because it provides the underpinning for peace in economic disarmament, and because it would put the world to work again. Our boys left the prostrate world to be repaired by our statesmen. They destroyed in order that we might rebuild. The nourishing application of American credit, the return of civilized rules and practices in trade and money relations between nations—these are the tools. Let us use them. Our boys did not win the war by votes of no confidence in our Allies, by retreats, by doing nothing. Nor can the peace be won by such tactics. Statesmanship looks to the end, works toward it; and we trust the Nation's statesmen in the House will be governed by this vision when they cast their votes on the financial agreement with Britain.

Mr. Green's Message

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH E. TALBOT
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, William Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor, has strongly advocated American teamwork between industry and labor as a means of checking threatened inflation. I am referring now to the statement by Mr. Green in the July issue of Labor's Monthly Survey, an A. F. of L. publication. In his message Mr. Green has assured American workers that minor temporary increases in prices can be absorbed with little permanent change in purchasing power of wages. That sober statement in itself, indicative of a thoughtful, forward-looking leader, should go a long way toward calming a jittery American public that is keeping its fingers crossed, not knowing what to expect in the way of price rises in the near future. But I think the most noteworthy point that Mr. Green makes in his statement—and the one for which he should be most heartily applauded—is the fact that increased production—and, therefore, increased supply—can halt runaway inflation. His message urges workers to strive for increased volume of production. It demonstrates that William Green is working for the general welfare of all Americans.

For Mr. Green's leadership and influence in the American economic scene is recognized. Spokesman that he is for millions of American workers, he has, in effect, expressed the basic need of unity and teamwork between labor and industry to make increased production—and the death of inflation—an accomplished fact.

Mr. Green, in his statement, has recognized labor's responsibility in the inflation crisis that is upon us. He has accepted that responsibility on behalf of the American Federation of Labor, and he has taken a long step toward assurance that labor will live up to the responsibility of full, increased production. It has been recognized that America has a great role to play in the assurance of lasting world peace. But such peace can be guaranteed only in a world economically sound. The eyes of the world are focused anxiously on the United States and its leaders, watching closely the outcome of this country's battle against inflation. With the tremendous production of which America is capable and with the backing of such men as William Green to assure that production, we will win the battle.

Mr. Green's statement follows:

MESSAGE TO AMERICAN WORKERS

The sudden ending of OPA brings a responsibility to business and to labor for carrying on policies that will safeguard the interests of all. We were already in the current of inflation and some price increases are inevitable to readjust production to more satisfactory levels. Minor temporary increases can be absorbed with little permanent change in the purchasing power of our wages. Our major need is increased volume of production.

Our safety lies in getting through this period of transition with no major increases in costs or stoppages of production. Major changes will be cumulative in effect and may start the chain of dangerous inflation. Some employers' organizations are wisely taking action against price and rent increases.

For their own safety, the wage earners of the United States should exercise self-discipline and good judgment, and refrain from taking ill-considered and unwise action pending action by Congress. Labor will then be in a position to demand cooperation for holding prices, and especially rent levels. Wage earners can best stabilize their wage dollars by helping to increase volume of production, which can wipe out scarcities and the danger of run-away inflation.

As workers in a free economy, let's first strengthen our foundations so that our strongholds will weather the difficulties. As citizens of a democracy, we must preserve our rights by insuring the general welfare.

WM. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

Changed Demobilization Plans Irk Overseas Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I was particularly impressed with a letter which I recently received from an overseas serviceman, which shows that these men are irked by the recent changes in the demobilization plan. The letter speaks for itself. I quote:

Again I am writing to you; this time to acknowledge your letter of June 8, 1946, and to thank you for taking time to answer my letter. But since I am writing to you, I want to give you a little more information on demobilization. By my continual writing you will probably come to the conclusion that I am either prejudiced or bitter. Dear sir, after the news this morning, and the news prior to this date, you will understand why I am.

Just this morning the adjutant general section of this base received a wire making all fathers eligible and setting a date of August 10, 1946, for all fathers to be off this island. There was nothing said about service whatsoever. Think about this, sir, all fathers, regardless of how much service they might have, with no amount of overseas service to speak of, will be discharged immediately. And men like myself, with long periods of overseas service (my overseas tour is going into the eighteenth month) will be left to continue "sweating out" their discharge—and they will be waiting much longer now because all shipping will be diverted to fathers exclusively.

Just a week ago we had the news in all the overseas newspapers that fathers and men with 21 months of service would be discharged by August 31, 1946. They also said that men with 21 months of service in the States were being discharged immediately in order that they would not slow down the flow of men coming from overseas theaters. But then, what do we find out? The 21 months of service deal depends on what they do with the draft—but does fathers? No. Suppose Congress passes the draft—perhaps they will lower the service angle to 21 months but the shipping will all be going to the fathers and a serviceman will have no chance of getting started on his way home. Even combat men, like myself and another man in this office, has no consideration—we were in combat; so what? All we get is the runaround.

But, sir, I'm very lucky—regardless of what they do, they can't hold me longer than September 15, 1946, because that is when my 24 months of service is ended—20 months overseas, 18 months on Okinawa. Of course, I will have to take into consideration that it will be at least 45 days to 2 months for me to be processed and catch a ship bound for the States, and 14 days for it to get there. Remember when the War Department made the men with 24 months, as of June 30, eligible for discharge? They were most all discharged with 21 months of service, while we have to wait out 24 months and then be kept for an additional 2 or more months before we can be shipped home and discharged. Is it fair? Or does anyone care about such things?

If you have reference to my last letter, you will note that I was deeply interested in getting home in time to start to college. When the news about fathers and men with 21 months of service came through, I was almost certain that I would be able to do just that, and I was very happy. Now the dirt comes out—with the fathers taking all consideration, and consideration that I just cannot see what for, I haven't a chance of a snowball in Hades to be home before sometime in October or November—just in time to miss another year of schooling, when I have already given up 2 years while I went through combat and occupational duties. Yes, sir; I feel pretty good today—pretty good.

The War Department cannot understand why enlistments are not coming up to expectations. It's just such things as this that makes a man never want to have anything to do with any part of the armed forces. The War Department "fouled-up" first when they stopped the point system and took away compensation and consideration for the overseas man—then the draft bill was wound into a tangle; and now a man's service, either Stateside, overseas, or combat, isn't even considered toward an eventual discharge. It's just the select group—the fathers—that are allowed to return home.

Does the War Department take into consideration that men like myself never had a chance to start a family? That they never had the chance to study for their life's occupation? That they are not settled into any one mode of work and play as married men? That interrupting a man's education has a demoralizing effect that it takes many, many hours of study to make up? I think not. From the way things have been run during this year, I would say they were using more of a system of pulling slips out of a hat and hoping the voters will like what they grabbed.

Sir, I agree with what you said in your letter about not putting another teen-ager into my position. It shouldn't happen to a dog. But when it comes down to me spending half my life on a rock in the Pacific when that teen-ager, the one whose mother is going to vote for you if you can keep him out of the Army (and she sure should), does not do anything toward this last war effort, then I'm not so much inclined to believe he should not come out here and take my place for a much shorter time than I have already had to spend.

Sir, I hope you will answer this letter. I would like very much to have your opinion as to why fathers are so much more important than young men with no family. I think I know the reason, but I'd like to hear it from you.

Trieste

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Dorothy Thompson from the Washington Evening Star of July 10, 1946:

ON THE RECORD

(By Dorothy Thompson)

I do not see how it is possible for the United Nations to maintain any international faith in our words and promises when we continually shift our positions.

Mr. Byrnes has been adamant on the subject of Trieste, and, in general, has been right and in harmony with past American policy. Woodrow Wilson was opposed to giving Trieste and Venezia Giulia to Yugoslavia after the last war, even though the ethnographic factors have not changed since then, and even though we then had a Yugoslav Government friendly to the western allies, as Marshal Tito, Stalin's puppet, certainly is not.

In a reasonably organized Europe, in which competent and honest men with some respect for peoples and for history were making decisions, Trieste and Venezia Giulia would be recognized as an Italian province and city with a large Slavic minority, extending into a majority in some sections, whose equality of right and citizenship would be protected.

The port, however, would be made a free port for those Danubian countries which it has always historically served—Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and, to a lesser extent, Croatia. In that sense it should be internationalized. It is far more essential to land-locked Austria, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia than to either Italy or Yugoslavia, since both countries have all the ports they need.

The fight over Trieste has not been, in essence, ethnographical or economic. It has been purely and simply political—a political bone of contention between the three great powers, none of which has the slightest ethnographical or economic interest in the place. And now Trieste is to be internationalized among these three powers, whose chief characteristic is their incapacity for getting on with each other.

Russia, of course, has won the fight, with Tito getting three-quarters of his demands. The real significance of the so-called settlement—which, like every major settlement since Munich, is made without the slightest consideration for the folks it most closely involves—is that Russia has now completed the first partition of Europe. A Soviet-controlled zone runs from the Baltic to the Northern Adriatic, dividing and solidifying eastern Europe from a Balkanized, unorganized western Europe ripe for ruin.

Italian feeling will be hopelessly and endlessly exacerbated, especially against the west. It was to the western Allies that Italy surrendered; to them that she offered cobelligerency; from them that she hoped for treatment at least remotely compatible with the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

To Italy, furthermore, Britain and the United States made repeated promises. "One man and one man alone," said Mr. Churchill, "was responsible for enmity toward Italy." Now the man is dead, killed by Italian insurgents, and exists only as a myth which we are doing our best to revive in heroic memory for the Italian Nation and people. Italy, an infant republic, and still with a high possibility of mortality, is going to be handed a peace treaty which is as likely to ring its death knell a few years from now as the treaty of Versailles condemned the infant German Republic and democracy.

France, who, in her terrible weakness certainly needs friends in Europe, and for whom the Italian masses felt sympathy both before and after their unenthusiastic precipitation into the war, has grabbed Briga and Tenda and their surrounding territory. Tito, from whose beneficent rule tens of thousands of his own people would escape if there were a channel open, has grabbed Venezia Giulia, after staging demonstrations learned, originally, from D'Annunzio—the inventor, incidentaaly, of the Fascist salute. The Italian Navy which came over to us is to be reduced to four cruisers. Reparations are proposed which are preposterous in view of Italy's devastation, desolation, and poverty. And the only political groups within Italy who can profit are the Communists and the presently silent though unreconstructed Fascists who have been given the next rallying cry for a nationalist wave.

None of this is peace-making, and none of it will be accepted in the sullen hearts of millions of men. All Europe knows by now that what the great powers are doing is not making peace but maneuvering into positions for the next war And even in those disgusting maneuvers the United States, having a much harder-boiled and ruthless opponent, is losing

Grain Situation in New England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER E. MERROW
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a telegram received from G. Tilton, president of the New Hampshire Feed Dealers Association:

JULY 12, 1946.

If grain is left off exempt list midwest will sell none to northeast but will feed livestock on own farms and get high prices for products. Black market will again appear. Common sense demands OPA be left off grain. Feel positive grain prices will be satisfactory if given a free chance.

NEW HAMPSHIRE FEED DEALERS ASSOCIATION,
G. TILTON, President.

Also an article from the Manchester Union, Manchester, N. H., of July 11, entitled "Grain Situation Seen Improved," as follows:

GRAIN SITUATION SEEN IMPROVED—FELKER SAYS BLACK MARKET IN FEEDS ON WAY OUT

CONCORD, July 10.—The black market in grain feeds for livestock and poultry is on the way out, Commissioner of Agriculture Andrew L. Felker said today.

The commissioner expressed pleasure over reports he said he had received from reliable sources that grain is today selling at prices without OPA control at less than the money it brought in the black market.

He pointed also to the wheat market which he said has resulted in a drop of several cents per hundredweight, and this was particularly pleasing to the commissioner since New Hampshire and New England use a considerable amount of wheat for feeding livestock and poultry. Oats and corn are selling above the ceilings set by the defunct price-control organization, but, Felker said, the boost in prices has been not at all substantial.

Discussing wheat, Felker said that there is a great amount of old wheat being forced out of the elevators to make room for the new wheat which is now being harvested, and elevator operators are forced to sell at reduced prices to secure space. Corn, he said, will not be harvested until September and October and as a result the operators can hold up prices at this time on this commodity.

Commissioner Felker said that since price controls went off feeds, the situation in the State is very much more satisfactory, and while the supply pouring into the State has not been enough, the amount that has come into the State has eased the problem considerably.

Representative Hays Emphasizes Disciplines for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAYS] recently delivered a radio address from the Luther Rice Memorial Baptist Church in Washington.

It has been called to my attention by Dr. Rufus W. Weaver, of this city, and I have found it to be a very excellent discussion of the subject Disciplines for Peace.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include the address here.

It follows:

It is appropriate in a Christian pulpit to speak of the political and social crises that are upon us and of the decisions to be made in one of the most critical periods of human history.

Great evils persist in the world and in America. I was one who looked for the termination of warfare to bring such calmness of spirit to individuals and such cooperation among nations that quick solutions to many vexing questions would be discovered. I was mistaken.

Admiral Stark said to our congressional party in London shortly before the war ended, "Our job during the war has been tough, but the problems of peace, particularly for legislators, may be tougher." His prediction proved to be true.

I need not give you the startling list of unanswered problems for the Congress. Management and labor are further apart than at any period in this generation. There is no agreement upon methods to control the terrible new instrument of death, the atom bomb. There is a profound difference between us as to price regulations and as a result of this and threatened work stoppages we must be haunted by the fears of a devastating inflation. The revival of nationalism in a world that promised for awhile to substitute justice under law for the arbitrament of arms tends to dash to pieces our hopes for a permanently peaceful world.

Nor are our previous experiences reassuring. A recent editorial widely quoted pointed to the dire forecasts of an editor in 1857—referring to Russia as a threat to peace and to China as presenting insuperable difficulties for the western world. In optimistic vein the editor said, "It didn't turn out to be so bad." Again he made illusions to similar conditions after World War I. And America survived. The editor's conclusion, "It will work out all right, the skies have been dark before and we are still here."

But let us look back at the 1857 scene. Within 4 years after the forecast America was plunged into a terrible civil war—in some respects the worst war in our history. Russia and China did not work out of their internal difficulties, at least not in a way that leaves the world assured that the contagions of war are gone. And the fact that domestic conditions after World War I were just as bad as today is of little consolation when we recall that within 20 years we were plunged into another catastrophe. I am trying to say this—that something more effective in the disciplines for peace—in the government of nations—must be adopted if we are to save our world.

One of my colleagues in the Congress said the other day. "We must calm fears, we must say everything that can be said to allay anxiety and to restore confidence." I agreed and my friend agreed with me that at the same time we must be wise, not credulous in determining where to place our confidence and we must not be blind to the evils in our world.

It is an hour for faith. Faith in those forces that can sustain us—faith in our capacity to distinguish the good and to discard the evil—faith in the moral leadership that is available.

Against the dark picture we can place our tremendous spiritual resources. These resources are adequate if we invoke them with vigor and with confidence, but we must recognize now that we cannot drift into a secure position.

We have relied so completely upon our ingenuity and our dominance of physical things that we tend to become absorbed in material forces, overlooking the requirements of tolerance, kindness, and group cooperation which are inherent in our Christian faith. If, on the other hand, our spirit of goodwill gets into governmental processes, we can have unity. If we develop the ability to see the whole instead of the broken parts of our social life, we can have stability and progress.

If, when the ancient question of Cain is asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" we can convince the cynics that, while not his keeper, we are still our brother's brother, we will be on our way to peace and happiness.

This is a period when the so-called practical man has ascendancy. He disdains ideals. He holds in contempt spiritual standards. He threatens to revolt against government, and he chafes under the restraints which a disciplined society would impose upon him. He is the hard, recalcitrant man. He is having his day but he is failing at the job.

In the effort to prevent economic interests from overshadowing spiritual and cultural life the churches should be our most influential institutions. Government has suffered because the restraints of disciplined Christian character are not imposed. We have permitted ourselves to think of government in terms of power and benevolence, and its largess has too often become our chief interest. Both organized capital and organized labor, and even groups not a part of either, have been guilty of regarding government in terms of what they can wrest from it.

The Christian religion's relation to this problem was well expressed by Dr. W. E. Hocking's epigram, "It is only religion, reaching the ultimate solitudes of the soul, for which your pleasing amiabilities are but husks that can create the unpurchasable man and it is only man, unpurchasable by any society, that can create the sound society"

Between the heresy that religion has no concern with the commonwealth and the other extreme which holds that goodness and benevolence controlling the state can purchase man's loyalty we find the authentic concept of Christian citizenship

How can we make ideals and human service again the standard for political and civic leadership? How can we reappraise the society we are building in terms of true and lasting values? The churches have the answer. By a bolder serving of their historic purpose the churches can help America avoid becoming isolated and materialistic. The churches can help us identify ourselves with other peoples, sharing their sorrows and successes.

In this connection I recall an experience in Glasgow, Scotland, in September 1944, when some of our congressional party visited a little church on Adelaide Street. The minister heard that there were Members of Congress in his congregation and he paused to pay a warm tribute to our country. "Will you take back to America," he said, "the profound and undying gratitude of the people of the United Kingdom for the great service you are rendering the world in providing the means by which we are able to protect our liberties and our Christian civilization?"

I think we merited that tribute, and I pray that our behavior will be such in peace that the world will still accord us the honor of being its best loved nation. Only world-mindedness and an intelligently generous spirit can preserve it for us.

We cannot achieve this attitude without conquering first the selfish impulses which have produced so many group frictions in our economic and political life. We must think less of economic objectives and more of the process by which they are pursued. It is more important that we create the atmosphere for pursuing in a friendly spirit the solutions to problems than that we come up with the right answer to some of the specific questions that trouble us.

Too much energy has been devoted to formulas for quick elimination of social maladjustments. I would not have the church divert its energies from primary functions, but I would have it constantly test its character and the fidelity to its mission by looking at the kind of society it is producing. Germany was a land of churchgoers in the period of Nazi domination. They were a pious people but guilty of a horrible sin because they were unconcerned about the cruelties imposed upon thousands of their fellow men. Indexes to national character must include something beside church statistics.

The Nation derives its sense of justice from religious faith. The great formulations of political freedom contained in the Mayflower Compact, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution are essentially religious in origin. Our regard for human personality—our concept of the importance of the individual—these are rooted in religion and are a part of our Christian tradition.

It explains our greatness. We are great because we have attached ourselves to great principles and if we survive, it will be because we continue in that attachment, not because a providential intervention marks out our destiny. It is ours to determine the direction in which America shall move.

This tremendous responsibility can be met only by men and women who believe in spiritual forces and who can make religion a vital and living thing. Where, except from the Christian teaching of universal brotherhood, can the world find the basis for an organization capable of putting down aggressions and maintaining international relations based on justice?

Statesmanship alone cannot do it. Political leadership is vitally important—there can be no question on that point—but if all those who have political responsibilities were perfect craftsmen, they still could not succeed unless buttressed by the people's faith in brotherhood.

It is religion's mission to teach that there is a purpose in our living and that we are subject to moral and spiritual compulsions. I see no other hope for the restoration of national discipline.

The final test is the demonstration of ability to submerge our group and limited national interests in the aspirations of a distraught world for unity and peace. Thus in a large new realm we may expect judgments to be imposed as to our national character. Beginning with the institutions which have flourished in our Christian democracy, the home, the school, and the church, we must utilize every tested resource for the world's and our own spiritual rehabilitation if we are to survive.

Expressions of OPA Opposition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I suspect that most Members of Congress have received many telegrams and letters since July 1 expressing their views pro and con on the subject of the revival or extension of OPA. Most of those who have wired and written me in favor of price controls have used the arguments which the late OPA officials and propagandists have put out over the radio. There is really nothing new in their line of reasoning except that they nearly always have a personal grievance or express one of the fears instilled into their minds by some of the bureaucrats on the pay roll.

On the other hand, it is so refreshing to read some of the comments of those who feel that we have reached the point where we can think, speak, and act like free Americans again, without being attacked by some bureaucrat. If the administration would manifest confidence in the American people and appeal to their patriotism, and quit kicking us around, and try to encourage faith of our citizens in one another instead of arraying class against class, we might be safely on the road to prosperity, full production, and happiness again in this country. Uncertainty, and fear of reprisals, always result in consternation and bewilderment. The spread of such economic and social unrest is nothing short of demagoguery, and should be condemned by all loyal Americans.

The following are excerpts from telegrams and letters received by me since July 1, after the demise of OPA at midnight, June 30, 1946. They voice genuine American sentiments, and are from people of all walks of life in my part of the country:

NOWATA, OKLA.

It seems that the weather is cool here in Oklahoma this morning and we feel an atmosphere of freedom since we are out from under the OPA, and this is to tell you that the people of northeastern Oklahoma are all very hopeful tha' the OPA will never be renewed again.

I sincerely hope and trust you will stay in there to fight to keep the country free of all further OPA regulations.

BARTLESVILLE, OKLA.

For the benefit of the entire country, I hope you will continue your fight against the strangling powers of OPA. OPA policies have been responsible for high prices on shoddy merchandise. Meat and butter prices have not risen more than amount of subsidy price which we were paying anyway. I urge you to let OPA stay dead. Let the 37,000 employees fill useful jobs in private industry, and let the economy of your country adjust itself in the natural manner, without benefit of regimentation.

TULSA, OKLA.

I am glad OPA is dead. I hope you won't help to revive it. The employees of the OPA were the worst of scamps ever in office in the United States of America. If rent control gets pushed over on us again, it should be with a 15-percent increase to all residential property. Why should we be denied reasonable profits any more than anybody else?

I am against any form of OPA. Think this best time we can ever have to get rid of it. Consider it worst kind of racket.

American ways for Americans. Do away with OPA.

Strongly urge your continued opposition to any rebirth of OPA. This is a start toward cleaning out the bureaucrats.

VINITA, OKLA.

Keep up your good fight on OPA. Our country simply cannot stand another year under former rules.

TULSA, OKLA.

Your stand on OPA has approval of large majority this section. Hope you will hold the line.

I urge you to do everything possible to prevent the reenactment of any price control. There may be a flurry of price increases for a short while. However, I believe the great majority of businesses will exert more effort to hold prices down under a free competitive market. You recall what happened after the other war. If prices get too high now they will very quickly come back down to their proper level.

Your actions relative to the extension of the Price Control Act have met with my heartiest approval. I am asking you to continue your fight against those individuals and groups which are seeking to destroy our constitutional form of government and the American way of life.

ADA, OKLA.

Price control should stay dead. The economy of this country can never recover under any production-stifling control. Urge you to continue the fight to prevent the return of price control.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

The world looks brighter without the dictatorship of Chester Bowles and Paul Porter. Why not let the American way function from now on and discontinue OPA forever? I admire your courage to fight, so don't weaken now, but instead give the New Dealers the works.

LAWTON, OKLA.

The retail merchants of Lawton are in favor of the release of the OPA. They are taking steps to safeguard the public of this area against inflation and unjust prices.

TULSA, OKLA.

Many of our mutual friends are happy and optimistic over the winding up of OPA. We hope Congress will "stand pat" on the situation.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

I prefer OPA dead rather than alive with any semblance of its original form.

TULSA, OKLA.

On behalf of myself and many friends and associates with whom I have talked, I want to congratulate you for your fine stand on OPA. We all hope Congress will stand on its previous actions and let OPA expire, according to Truman's wishes, thereby giving previous American ideas a chance to prevail

Hope you are able to keep OPA dead. We don't need any orders from plutocrats to tell us how much we can pay for our necessities of life. This also includes sale of oil, as we have an overproduction of oil now being prorated.

I was for the OPA bill. Now sustain the veto. Reaction may be violent, up, then down. But maybe we can get on an even keel sooner.

People I talk to are strong for abolishment of OPA in toto, except most feel that some sort of control of rents should be had on account of the real emergency of the housing situation. I believe people are mighty tired of regulation, especially when it results in doing without. I think most people finally realize no profit, no production.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

After returning from 40 months' military service, I am glad to see that you Congressmen are trying to give the government back to the people. The law of supply and demand was in force and effect long before we had "bureaucrats" and the OPA. We can get along better with fewer bureaus, boards and commissions. Please vote against reenactment of the OPA.

PRYOR, OKLA.

To heck with OPA.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

I appreciate your letter of April 17 last and had hoped I would not have to write you again. You have done a good job killing the OPA and I sure hope you will do all you can to keep it from ever coming back—kill it forever. This is the first day in years that I have felt like a freeman. If only they will let us alone for just 6 months they will see there will be no need for any OPA. Now that it is dead please keep it that way We will never be normal as long as it is in operation. The black markets will soon be gone for good. Put my wife and me down as for never having another OPA.

GROVE, OKLA.

Don't revive OPA.

LAWTON, OKLA.

People here believe OPA maliciously holding back reconversion. I am against reestablishment.

TULSA, OKLA.

Elimination of the OPA completely will probably result in sound economic forces being given a chance to correct temporary economic dislocations and I join a lot of other citizens in urging that the Congress let the OPA pass completely out of the picture.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Finally, the will of the great American public has been expressed through its representatives of government in Washington. Thank you for upholding the veto on the OPA bill and for the free fresh air which business can once again breathe.

TULSA, OKLA.

President Truman puts the inflation baby on the wrong doorstep. Apparently his veto message and radio speech inspired by Political Action Committee We hope Congress does not weaken on this issue.

MINCO, OKLA.

We are very much against price controls. If you expect us to feed the world, better untie our hands.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

During the war it was generally believed that some restrictions were necessary, particularly on rents and a few other items. However, since Mr. Truman took the responsibility of ending the act by his veto, we now feel that it is a good time to dispose of the agency entirely. No matter when this Bureau is terminated—now, next year, or 10 years hence—the many thousands of employees will deluge the Members of Congress with letters, wires, and petitions for reenactment and perpetuation of the agency which has delayed reconversion and prevented normal production.

Since the President vetoed the best measure he could hope to get along the line of price control, under existing conditions, we now feel that a fair trial should be given productive enterprise and the democratic way of life should be permitted to again assert itself.

TULSA, OKLA.

Resolution 1

That Oklahoma's Representatives and Senators in Congress and the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, be, and they are hereby requested to take the opportunity which has thus been presented to give the natural economic laws of supply and demand an opportunity to function and correct the imbalance caused by arbitrary controls over the past 4 or 5 years; and

2. That it is the considered judgment of this organization that the elimination of price control can work out for the best interests of all, provided businessmen and the consuming public all do their part as indicated above; and further provided that those in control of the legislative and executive branches of our Government consider the possibilities of achieving results by means of leading and guiding the American people through this period of temporary crisis.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Keep OPA dead. Give the people an opportunity to run their own affairs.

TULSA, OKLA.

We are strongly of the opinion that natural forces should be permitted to operate for a reasonable time and that business should be given an opportunity to prove that price controls are unnecessary before Congress legislates further extension of the price-control program.

Thanks for redeeming our country. Don't give up the fight.

Why not give the public a cooling-off period and see how they act under the present freedom before clamping on further controls.

TULSA, OKLA.

Everyone in this office is glad the OPA is out, and we want to thank you for the part that you played in putting it out. We hope there will be no necessity of any revival of this thing again. It seems to us that this affords an opportunity for all of us to work out these problems in our own way and in the American way. There will be difficult adjustments to make, here and there will be some instances where advantages are taken, but all in all this will eventually seek its own level faster and surer than the route we have been traveling under OPA.

Price control is not necessary in America. We have had enough of this foolishness. There is an overproduction of oil and we need no control on price.

OPA failed miserably to hold down living costs and alleviate shortages, as all Government statistics demonstrate Let the legitimate businessmen, both large and small, plus natural laws, take over now and let bureaucratic artificial price tinkering die forever. In connection with propaganda for restoration of rent control all responsible property owners in Tulsa, and they are the great majority, have no intention of altering rental scales at present. When rents are advanced increases will be normal and sufficient to cover only the increased costs of maintenance and operation which have taken place during the past few years and which OPA during its existence failed to recognize Stand firm and be not swayed by hysterical propaganda from those who would remove the rights of property ownership upon which this country was founded and has prospered.

Congratulations on your vote against OPA. For the good of our country don't weaken, and let OPA stay dead. To revive it would be the worst disaster that could happen. The sooner we can return to the American way and free enterprise the better—so at all costs don't revive the OPA.

Rest assured we shall be with you in thought, knowing that you will hold the line against the invasion of another OPA.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Most people in Oklahoma have viewed the OPA as a necessary evil even though inefficiently and poorly administered, and it was generally believed that some restrictions were necessary, particularly on rents and a few other items. However, since Mr Truman took the responsibility of ending the act by his veto, we now feel that it is a good time to dispose of the agency entirely.

It is anticipated that the President and those groups to whom he has shown special favor will exert all possible pressure and effort upon Members of Congress to force a continuation of bureaucracy and scarcity. It is with this thought in mind that we desire to encourage our Members of Congress who appear to have the interest of the people in general at heart rather than special groups.

It seems to me if OPA is reinstated for a year during that time the wheels of industry will still be throttled. Unemployment will be great, black markets rampant and we will remain in the same mess we are in now and still another year behind.

If we could go a step farther and throttle the appointive heads of bureaus and useless administration agencies and give our Congressmen an opportunity to function and perform the duties for which they are elected and are being paid, the country might eventually become free to some extent from mountains of red tape, delay, indecision, mismanaged and overlapping administration bureaus which have retarded recovery and reconversion.

Kill OPA completely and save the taxpayers' money.

MIAMI, OKLA.

Mr. Truman asks that everybody write the Congress to restore OPA. Glad to write that you make sure it never revives. Inflation is the scare. If we don't have that now we will never have it. And if a little more will kill or cure us the quicker we are dead or well the better off the country.

TULSA, OKLA.

I wrote you sometime ago expressing my desire that the OPA be discontinued. I wish to again express my earnest desire that the OPA be entirely discontinued.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

It seems to me if OPA is reinstated for a year during that time the wheels of industry will stil be throttled. Unemployment will be great, black markets rampant and we will remain in the same mess we are in now and still another year behind. President Truman ought to know as well as anyone what cheap prices will do, from his experience in trying to operate a store a few years ago. If OPA remains dead or is drastically curbed industry will go all out, unemployment will disappear, prices will advance, money will remain in circulation, prosperity will be great, and during that time competition will straighten out prices that go out of line. If we could go a step farther and throttle the appointive heads of bureaus and useless administration agencies and give our Congressmen an opportunity to function and perform the duties for which they are elected and are being paid, the country might eventually become free to some extent from mountains of red tape, delay, indecision, mismanaged and overlapping administration bureaus which have retarded recovery and reconversion to a point that we are in worse shape now than during the war, even though it has been over a year. That fact alone ought to convince anyone we have been on the wrong track. As for me, I am for elective officials for the responsibility of running our government.

TULSA, OKLA.

Congratulations on action takn in sustaining the President's veto, thereby releasing American economy for production and prosperity. The Tulsa Real Estate Board pledges no drastic increases in residential rents insofar as within our control. We urge that OPA and rent control stay dead.

We ask you to do your utmost to kill OPA.

Apparently the proponents of the OPA desire it to remain in effect permanently, and if it is revived you will have the same trouble getting rid of it in the future. Mr. Truman expressed himself as having faith in the American people to believe that they would do the right thing. That being true, why have an OPA? Did he mean to say to the people: I have faith that you will take care of yourselves until we can pass a law to make you good? We are reminded of the old principle that the forces of evil destroy themselves.

If rent controls are continued I will be forced to sell my property, a $65,000 valued apartment building I struggled for 25 years to own. Save property owners from crucifixion.

TULSA, OKLA.

Thanking you for your good work against OPA. Keep it up.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

The Office of Price Administration, with all its blundering regulations and impossible interpretations, is at an end. Thousands of incompetent OPA employees must now seek an honest living in private industry. We will not take space to tell you the outrages and injustices which have been perpetrated on the citizens of this State. There is a general feeling of relief that the Office of Price Administration is ended, and the confidence that the American way of living which we knew 12 years ago has been reinstated. We ask your determined and militant support against any extension or new enactment of the OPA law. We feel that the law of supply and demand and the American spirit of enterprise will soon take care of any temporary rise in prices.

MIAMI, OKLA.

The Miami Real Estate Board and members ask your help in keeping OPA and rent control dead. Also congratulate you on the release of American economy for production and prosperity. We pledge to help keep rent at a reasonable rate.

TULSA, OKLA.

Congratulations on your stand on OPA. I believe if price control can be kept off for 30 days it will be demonstrated that there is no necessity for same, except probably to raise prices. Black-market items not obtainable elsewhere are selling for less.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Congratulations on your stand against OPA. We are firmly convinced building material prices will not be advanced appreciably and that increased production made possible by elimination of OPA restriction will within a few months reduce prices on nearly all lines of building materials, and many more houses will be available for veterans and others who need them. We are seriously considering reducing our prices slightly because we have eliminated all the red tape and procedures necessary to operate under OPA. Keep up the fight and free enterprise system. Let it operate on a production basis as it formerly did without OPA. This is the only way, in our opinion, that we can get increased production and thereby hold down the cost of living by the operation of the economic forces of supply and demand.

TULSA, OKLA.

Both Republicans and Democrats are throwing themselves wide open to charges of insincerity and favoritism by favoring the control of rents to the exclusion of other items.

Urge you to do all you can to prevent any reenactment of OPA regulations. Regardless of how long there is an OPA, when it is taken off there will be a flurry of high and low prices while the law of supply and demand gets under way.

SPERRY, OKLA.

Today there appears an ad in the Tulsa World offering my farm for sale. We like our home and farm here and really do not care to sell. However, we thought that the new OPA bill would become law, and with restrictions still on livestock, poultry, and butter, dairy, etc., we felt selling was about the only thing left to do. You folks in Washington are going to have to let people in agriculture have a break and get more for their products. Most all farm trucks and farm implements on the farms are wearing out and must be replaced. And if we are not allowed an even break with labor, please inform me how we are going to purchase our needed replacements made by high price labor. While the OPA octopus is dead, let it stay dead and let's get back to the American way of life.

TULSA, OKLA.

I wish to congratulate you on your recent votes on OPA, more power to you. It would please ninety-nine and nine-tenths of the population to see OPA abolished completely. What are we? A bunch of nitwits that haven't got sense enough to govern ourselves, without a bunch of long-haired, slide-rule rats, out of supposed-to-be-colleges, telling us what to do and how to do it? Every vote against OPA and its hired propagandists, spending Government money, is a vote to cut off thousands of bloodsuckers, leeches, and officeholders from the teat of Government pap.

BROKEN ARROW, OKLA.

We endorse your stand on the question of OPA extension.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

The manner of administration of OPA has created many inequities, with what appears to be outright favoritism in the establishment of ceiling prices. The creation of rules of conduct to the manufacturers, retailers and wholesalers, in requiring them to do the impossible, in my opinion has resulted in the most widespread disregard and distrust against our Government.

The average American is depending on Congress to dispose of this vicious bunch, and I truly hope you will do all you can to keep the OPA out.

We and thousands of other patriotic American citizens know the OPA is a real detriment to reconversion. Let it die now and relieve the taxpayers of the expense of paying the salaries of 34,000 useless employees.

TULSA, OKLA.

More rents have been paid on time this month than in any period during the last 4 years. The OPA has been the guardian of slow payers, dead beats, et cetera. Let's keep the first of every month the first, not the 15th or 20th. Let's make provision to get these unwanted people off of the property they occupy.

Fate of OPA Recalls NRA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Johnstown Tribune, Johnstown, Pa.:

FATE OF OPA RECALLS NRA

Whatever Congress may do in the way of enacting new legislation to revive the OPA probably will be done this week. That its powers, if it is revived, will be narrower and shallower than formerly is a foregone conclusion. That President Truman will veto the bill unless the major prerogatives of the organization are restored now seems almost as certain.

The pro-OPA camp is filled with prophets of doom predicting a sharp and continuing rise in prices. The anti-OPA camp calls this dire prediction unfounded. It is held by this group that there will be price increases to compensate for the withdrawal of Government subsidies but that this period will be short and prices then will find a moderate level.

The present situation brings up memories of what happened when NRA (the National Recovery Administration) was killed off by a unanimous Supreme Court decision in 1935. The analogy between the NRA and OPA is far from exact, but there are many points of similarity. Each was a keystone in the administration's economic program. Each was deplored by most manufacturers, jobbers, and retailers. Each relied for such support as it enjoyed primarily upon the consumers. Each was becoming more and more generally disregarded, if not defied, toward the end. And predicitions of economic disaster were rife as each died.

At this point the analogy ends. In a sense the NRA was an experiment in voluntary cooperation rather than a law imposed on business. That is, each NRA code was drawn up by representatives of the industry or trade concerned. But once the code had been formulated and accepted, it had the force of law, and violations were penal offenses.

The chief dissimilarity between the two agencies was that while the purpose of the OPA was to keep prices down, the NRA, having been born in a period of low prices, was designed to raise price levels. During the 2 years of its existence wholesale prices advanced, on the average, about 23 percent. In the next year they dropped slightly. But general industrial activity, which had risen only about 5 percent during the life of NRA, increased by almost 20 percent in the following year.

Elimination of OPA should also act as a spur to production, in which case price increases are almost certain to drop to lower levels and in some instances, it is anticipated, even below the ceilings maintained by OPA. Production is the real key to the price problem.

OPA Letter to Correspondents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER C. PLOESER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by me in reply to letters relative to OPA:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 11, 1946.

OPA LETTER TO CORRESPONDENTS

This is to acknowledge your communication on the subject of the Presidential veto of the price- and rent-control bill. Because of the volume of mail I have on this subject, I am compelled to reply to your communication by form letter.

It must be emphasized that it is reliably reported that the President vetoed the price-control bill against the advice of his congressional leaders and in accordance with the political strategy offered by Chester Bowles and Paul Porter. This strategy was as follows:

1. That the flow of official propaganda would be stepped up to convince the public that the type of OPA Congress is voting means ruinous, rising prices.

2. That no effort would be made to compromise the more drastic amendments advocated in the Congress. This would insure the passage of these amendments and bring a crisis.

3. That when the extension of price and rent control, which was voted by the Congress, reached the White House that the President would delay until the very deadline for expiration on June 30; then he would veto and demand a continuation of price control as it has been. The administration would gamble that the Congress, anxious to adjourn, would comply rather than risk the end of price control a few months before the elections.

Not once during the period beginning last September 1, when the President first asked for an extension of price control, through June 30 of this year, was there ever a session on the subject of OPA between the President and Members of Congress with any Republicans present. Never did the administration indicate a willingness to get together with the Congress on a price control measure. The President was advised and persuaded not only that this strategy might work to force continuation of the past maladministration of price control, but he was persuaded that if his veto did not work, "it is good politics even if it fails."

I am forced to the conclusion that the White House has been guilty of playing politics with the economy of the country. I voted for the extension of price control with decontrol provisions. The bill as it passed the Congress was not the most desirable, but it was probably the best measure that could be hoped for, in view of the need and reconversion problems of the Nation. Certainly, Mr. Bowles' wild propaganda statements have not been borne out by the trend of events in the last few days—and politics on the subject continues in the administration. If injury befalls us as a result of the discontinuance of rent control, it must be directly chargeable to the Presidential veto. Administration forces have blocked a separate rent-control measure.

My vote on any new bill will have to be based upon the contents of the bill.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER C. PLOESER.

P. S.—You will be interested in knowing I have received about 400 letters on this subject. There are nearly 600,000 people in my district and 140,000,000 in the Nation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, if my action were motivated by prejudice my vote on Senate Joint Resolution 138 would not be as it will be officially recorded at the end of this meeting. I am not going to vote for Great Britain or against Russia, but I am going to cast an American vote for legislation which, in my opinion, will be beneficial to our Republic and to world civilization.

For 5 days I have listened attentively to the debates in the House and have carefully read reports of the hearings and the vast amount of literature that has been sent to every Member's office, while at the same time I have read with great interest hundreds of letters which I have received from people in the Second Congressional District of Illinois. It has been my earnest endeavor to reach a decision which I believe will be the best that can be made under the present circumstances.

I share with many Members the criticism of Great Britain for its conduct toward Palestine and Ireland, and many other countries and colonies under its vast realm. The British loan, however, as it comes before the House is something that requires immediate action. It is an agreement negotiated by our Government and the British Government. We are asked to ratify the action of our representatives. They inform us that it is imperative that this action be taken now and that the Members of the House have had ample opportunity to carefully study the entire subject. In my experience no matter has ever been gone into as thoroughly as has been Senate Joint Resolution 138.

Britain has been our ally in two world wars and in World War II none can deny that she helped stave off a threatened invasion of the United States, or at least the Western Hemisphere by the then conqueror. England, almost single-handed, fought the enemy with her back to the wall and nearly 60,000 of her civilians were killed while billions of dollars worth of property, including industries, were destroyed by the bombs of the nation that unsuccessfully attempted to invade the islands. In peacetime she is our best customer and it is good business at all times to help one's best customers.

I am not in accord with the statement made about setting England up as a buffer against Russia or any other country. In my opinion there is room enough in Europe for both England and Russia. They were our principal allies in World War II and our forces and their forces won the great victory. It is my belief that the action of the House today in approving Senate Joint Resolution 138 is taking a big step toward lasting world peace, and prosperity at home and abroad. When America's home consumers are supplied we must look for purchasers of our goods in other lands, and England, I feel, will continue to be our best customer.

Joint Committee on the Economic Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER B. HUBER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the honor of having been appointed as one of the seven House Members to serve on the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, and it is gratifying to me to learn that the Honorable KENNETH MCKELLAR, President pro tempore of the Senate, has appointed Senators O'MAHONEY, MURDOCK, TUNNELL, MYERS, TAFT, BRIDGES, and LA FOLLETTE, all outstanding Members of the Senate body. They will serve with the following Members of the House who have been appointed by Speaker RAYBURN: Representatives PATMAN, OUTLAND, HART, BENDER, JUDD, RICH, and myself.

I feel that this joint committee, cooperating with industry, labor, and other groups interested in the welfare and prosperity of our country, will be able to make recommendations to the Congress which, if enacted, will go far toward the prevention of depressions such as the United States has suffered in the past.

Inasmuch as Columnist Marquis Childs has demonstrated his knowledge of the economic conditions with which not only the United States but the entire world will be confronted, I am inserting his column which appeared in the Washington Post on July 11, 1946:

O'MAHONEY'S FORMULA

(By Marquis Childs)

Almost unnoted in the flow of the news was the appointment by Congress of a joint committee under the Full Employment Act. This at least is a beginning even though President Truman has not yet found the right men willing to serve on the Council of Economic Advisers provided under the law.

On the joint committee are some of the ablest men in the House and Senate. It includes Senators LA FOLLETTE, TAFT, and MUR-

DOCK, and Representatives PATMAN, BENDER, JUDD, and OUTLAND. These are serious-minded Members of Congress, acutely aware of the political and economic forces on the loose today.

Likely chairman of this committee is Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, since he sponsored the legislation in the Senate. That is the most hopeful portent of all. For the past 12 years, ever since he's been in the Senate, Wyoming's JOE O'MAHONEY has been talking in his friendly, intensely earnest way about the realities of the world we live in.

He is convinced that even though it was watered down before it was passed, the Full Employment Act can be an important instrument to keep our economy on a fairly even keel. Nearly 2 months ago O'MAHONEY made a speech in the Senate that, unlike most Senate speeches, has had wide echoes. Even the Senate's official reporter, whose ears are beaten down by the daily flood of oratory, came up to O'MAHONEY afterward to say he thought it was a remarkable speech.

It was a warning to America that our confusions and conflicts can destroy us. O'MAHONEY poined to a parallel between the troubled times in which we live and the uncertainty and confusion that prevailed when the founders of this Nation were trying to draft a charter of government.

"What America needs at this moment," O'MAHONEY said, "is an economic constitution just as, 160 years ago, it needed a political constitution. The present situation has come about through perfectly natural forces which could not be resisted. Because of the progress which has been made by science and invention, our economy has ceased to be an individual structure and has become a structure of great organization."

O'MAHONEY was chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee. That committee created by Congress took a long look at what had happened to this country in the past 50 years. The monumental report completed in 1941 showed the ever-increasing concentration of economic power in a few corporations.

In O'MAHONEY'S clear and fair appraisal this had an unmistakable meaning. It meant that if we continued to have a democracy then big Government would grow bigger in an effort to control big business. The one bred the other as sure as night follows day. And O'MAHONEY believes passionately that both big business and big government are destructive of true democracy.

Since the end of the war he has written and talked about this a great deal. He is one of the few men in public life who has faced up to the fact that in a boom-to-bust cycle we may come up against a showdown for which we are totally unprepared. Senator O'MAHONEY wrote about these things recently in Dun's Review, a business magazine, and the response from businessmen surprised him. Many said they realized the jeopardy to freedom in concentration and monopoly.

"The drift toward big Government," O'MAHONEY wrote, "did not begin until business had outgrown the jurisdiction of little and local government."

O'MAHONEY'S remedy is a law providing for Federal incorporation of the giant corporations that stretch across the Nation and the world, making mockery of the State laws under which they are incorporated. This would end the fiction that these "collectivist units," as O'MAHONEY calls them, are private persons.

Such a law, in O'MAHONEY'S opinion, would lead not to more Government regulation but to less. The responsibilities of corporations under Federal law would be clearly defined. Their sovereign power would be subject to the sovereign power of the United States.

Now if only President Truman could find able men to serve on the Council of Economic Advisers, the council could work closely with the congressional joint committee. And the evidence is mounting that we are going to need that kind of cooperation very soon now.

Report on the Activities of the Thirty-seventh Infantry Division

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include Maj. Gen. Robert S. Beightler's report on the activities of the Thirty-seventh Infantry Division, 1940 to 1945:

My fellow Buckeyes: For me this is a long-awaited occasion. It is a good thing to be home after more than three and a half years, and it is wonderful to return to a land unravaged by war—a land secure, peaceful, beautiful, and full of the new-found vigor and strength developed in the great trial over which it has so magnificently triumphed.

I have dreamed of this moment in many places. My dream has been but another soldier's dream—except for one difference. My thoughts of coming home have been so often interwoven with pictures of people I have never met—and yet felt I knew so well. They were people whom I knew thought of me. They were mothers, fathers, sweethearts, wives, and friends of the men who served with me. They were the hope and the faith of the people who had entrusted me with the responsibility of leading their men in battle.

More than 5 years have passed since I was given the administration of that trust—a privilege and a responsibility beyond any I had known. A trust endowed by the people of Ohio with, during the whole time, a total of more than 20,000 of their finest young men. A trust supported by the determination and work from the home front, in its magnificent support throughout the war of all our armed forces.

I know that I have given my best to sustain the faith and prove myself worthy of that trust; but how faithfully I have administered it is, of course, for you to judge.

Some phases are already clear. The interest on that trust has been paid in full, and at a very high rate, I think. The achievement of your men of the Thirty-seventh Division on the field of battle, and their very significant contribution to the defeat of Japan, is proof that they have kept the faith. Certainly no division in the Pacific did more. Indeed, Gen. Jacob L. Devers, commanding general of the Army Ground Forces, on October 18, 1945, addressed the men of the division in these words: "Soldiers of the Thirty-seventh Infantry Division—and there are none more heroic—are deserving of the hearty congratulations of a grateful Nation. Their valor, combined with sacrifice and a strong devotion to duty, did much to break a fanatical enemy's stranglehold on peace-loving nations in the Asiatic-Pacific area and stamp out the threat to our cherished American way of life. The distinguished role played by the Buckeye Division in carving our glorious victory is already history. * * *"

Thus spoke General Devers of the division which, in 592 days of combat, killed 33,590 Japanese and took 2,161 prisoners of war from an army that assertedly didn't know the meaning of the word surrender.

But the principle of that great trust can never be returned to you in full. Beneath the palms of New Georgia and Bougainville, and in cemeteries on Luzon sleep our comrades whom we had to leave behind in the hallowed soil of heroes' graves. This was the highest of the costs to us; yet, in view of the long years of bitter fighting we did, and in view of the fact that well over 30,000 soldiers have marched in the Thirty-seventh's ranks, we have reason to thank God that he was so merciful, and forever to stand in gratitude and reverence before the memory of these brave men, whose unselfish sacrifice helped make possible our return home in victory and in readiness to carry on new responsibilities as citizen veterans.

Yes, I have never forgotten those unknown, yet so well-known, people at home. I often wished I might talk with them about their sons, about the questions that perturbed them, and about what superb soldiers their men had become. And so I looked forward to the day when I could return to Ohio and deliver a talk on the subject which is my title today: Report on your Thirty-seventh Division.

On October 15 the Thirty-seventh Division celebrated its fifth continuous year of service. Those 5 years are, in a sense, a history of the development and utilization of our Army forces. The entire pattern of growth has been experienced by the Thirty-seventh, which was among the first of our divisions to be mobilized, and one of the very few still in combat when the war ended. Few divisions in the Army have such a record. If, in the course of this talk, I may seem unduly to emphasize the Thirty-seventh Division, understand my pride in that grand organization, my respect and admiration for the soldiers that composed it, and my affection for all of them who have so long and faithfully served with me.

We have been a lucky division, and also, we feel, a division that has taken more than its share of tough breaks. On the lucky side has been our homogeneity and family spirit born of a constancy in tradition and composition enjoyed by few other divisions. On the lucky side has been the priceless advantage we have enjoyed from the support and undiminishing interest you people in Ohio have held for us through all these long years. I seriously doubt if any other division in the armed forces has felt, through its service, such warm and steadfast loyalty from home. I think, sometimes, that we received too much of your wonderful support and attention. Actually, the Thirty-seventh Division represents but a small fraction of the great army of men and women Ohio gave to our armed forces. True, at one time we represented the overwhelming majority of Ohio's men in uniform—back in early 1941 when nearly 20,000 National Guardsmen and selectees—all from Ohio—filled our ranks. But that time has long passed and hundreds of thousands of the State's finest young men and women have answered the call of the Nation and now fill the triumphant columns of the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard. The Thirty-seventh Division has become an all-American division in the truest and finest sense of the word. Every State in the Union, and all the territories, have had representatives in our ranks. Yet, the old Buckeye spirit, the old confidence and determination, that animated the Thirty-seventh Division of the last war and the Thirty-seventh Division of this war, has never died in all our service. As the old-timers from Ohio left our ranks, and new, fresh men from other States took their places, that same spirit prevailed and took hold of the newcomers. And through it all a nucleus of key officers and enlisted men, who were part of the division when it was mobilized, remained to give it the guidance and character of the Buckeye tradition.

Much has been written and said about our service. Names such as Fiji, New Zealand, Guadalcanal, New Georgia, Bougainville, Manila, Baguio, Balete Pass, and the Cagayan Valley immediately come to mind when the Thirty-seventh Division is mentioned. I don't propose to undertake a detailed rehash of all our experiences, but something of the general pattern of war in the Pacific, and the division's part in it, may prove interesting to you.

There is time only to mention in passing the year and a half of training we had in the United States before we sailed for overseas, May 26, 1942. This period, and the additional year of training we had in Fiji and Guadalcanal, had polished and perfected the division into a fighting machine wholly ready for the real test of battle. We were confident and ready when, in July 1943, we received our baptism of fire at New Georgia. Much has been written about that horrible island and about the vicious fighting that took place there. Looking back, the amazing thing to me is the contrast between what we had then, and what was available to us when we tackled the Philippines. Our invasion of New Georgia was accomplished with LST's accompanied by a naval force consisting mostly of four-stacker destroyers of World War I vintage. Air Force strength was numbered in scores of planes, compared to hundreds later on. True, important naval forces were nearby, and only shortly before there had been a significant naval engagement between cruisers and destroyers in the Kula Gulf. But our invasion of New Georgia was a shoe-string affair nevertheless. In those days there was no lack of confidence on the part of the Japanese. For them the war was won, and we were impudent interlopers on their private domains.

New Georgia was also the testing and proving ground of the Thirty-seventh Division's artillery procedure, which ultimately was to cause so much anguish to those responsible for getting ammunition to us. The fact was, that the main advantage of the Americans in the Pacific war was their superiority in matériel and the machines of war, and the far greater understanding and appreciation of the use and advantages of the machinery of war. Not to have taken maximum advantage of this edge would have been unthinkable. Each campaign saw the division shoot up greater and greater amounts of artillery ammunition. The figures finally reached astronomical totals, but it is significant that our casualties were proportionately lower, compared to the great amount of fighting we had to do, than almost any other outfit with similar hard fighting.

At the same time, fighting in the Solomons worked a sharp disadvantage to us. The incredibly rugged, jungle-matted terrain and the endless bogs and gorges reduced the warfare to small, sharp, vicious encounters between little groups. It became a comparatively primitive sort of fighting—man against man, machine gun against machine gun, with only our immense superiority of artillery weighing down our side of the balance. Thus we could not use tanks in any appreciable sense, nor could we deploy in the grand maneuvers so particularly adapted to our armor and firepower. Your sons performed magnificently under circumstances alien to their background. This was Jap fighting. The terrain suited the Jap; the close-in, hand-to-hand fighting suited him; and the silent, infiltration tactics of jungle war were right down the Jap alley. Except—our men whipped them at their own game—and whipped them soundly and thoroughly. Our long, vigorous training paid off, our advanced methods of fighting paid off—but above all, the guts and determination of the Ohio gang (and it was still pretty largely Ohio in those days) paid off.

In September 1943 we were shipped back to Guadalcanal for a period of rest and rehabilitation. Here came our first tough break. The division had just emerged triumphant, but weary, from its first campaign. The men wanted a real rest. Guadalcanal is about the last place on earth for an enjoyable rest. It is a hot, wet, malarious, dirty piece of real estate I'm sure the world could do without. But back we went to more training to polish off the rough edges revealed in New Georgia. The invasion of Bougainville was scheduled for November 1, 1943 (just 6 weeks away), and the Thirty-seventh Division was selected as a part of the First Marine Amphibious Corps for that job. The men were pretty low about the prospect, and they did quite a bit of understandable grumbling, but when the inevitable was recognized they fell to with a will. I don't suppose it gave them much consolation, and I can understand why, but the reason the Thirty-seventh Division was chosen, with such a short breather, to go into such a rough campaign as Bougainville was simply because it was the only division in the South Pacific the high command felt was ready to tackle the assignment at that time.

Three Army and one Marine divisions were in rest areas. That about took care of the forces then available—we were certainly working on a shoe-string in those days. One of the things that should never be forgotten about the fighting in the Solomons is that the whole job was done with four Army and two Marine divisions plus attached combat teams. When that is compared with the scores and scores again of divisions sent to Europe, it is plain why battle-scarred outfits like the Thirty-seventh went into the fight again and again. Our major effort was committed to Europe, and so we in the Pacific jungles had to get along as best we could. In those days of precarious defensive-offensive, none of us dreamed that such meager forces would be able to achieve what really was miraculous. There's only one answer to such performances—it lies in the kind of stuff the men of the Army, Navy, and Marines in the Pacific were made of.

The invasion of Bougainville in early November of 1943 was an outstanding success, and comparatively easy due to some very astute advance planning which put our forces ashore where the Japs least expected them, and thus caught them off balance. The marines did a fine job and pushed rapidly into the island to the southeast, while the Thirty-seventh Division moved to the northeast. At that time the marines caught the rough stuff, while we had comparatively little opposition in our sector. The marines were pulled out commencing Christmas Day 1943, and were replaced by the Americal Division. There was a comparative lull until March, when the big Battle of Bougainville took place. This was the attempt of the Japanese Seventeenth Area Army, of which the infamous Sixth Division of rape of Nanking fame was a part, to drive us from our beachhead at Empress Augusta Bay. The Sixth Division was by all odds the finest fighting unit encountered by the Thirty-seventh Division in all of its campaigns. Here the great strength of the enemy was hurled against the Thirty-seventh more than 7 miles of thinly held front. Never before had more frightful or bloody fighting taken place in the Pacific. For more than a month the Japs smashed themselves, time after time, against our front, ultimately losing more than 10,000 killed and an unestimated number of wounded. They ran up against a division of veterans that time, a division that proved as aggressive and powerful in the defense as it had in the New Georgia offensive campaign. We were beginning to feel the weight of more and better equipment by now. We had more air support, more and better tank support, more artillery, and, above all, men that knew the business of jungle fighting from A to Z. We refined our policy of letting machines fight for us to the maximum. For instance, we shot up more than 450,000 rounds of artillery. The dividends that helped pay is exemplified in the fact that we killed Japs at a ratio of 33 to every American soldier lost.

The men had reason to be proud of themselves. They had fought two heavy campaigns within a period of 8 months and they had won the praise of the highest Pacific commanders. Well under 400 Thirty-seventh Division men had been killed in both operations, and nearly 12,000 Jap soldiers had been destroyed. The Japanese hold on the Solomons was finally and completely broken. This, tied in with the successes in New Guinea, spelled the end of Nipponese ambition in the South and Southwest Pacific. It was a job superbly done, and the men felt justifiably entitled to a rest.

From this point on, until the Philippine campaign, morale in the division reached its lowest point. As their commander, my own concern with the problem was great. The discontent was growing and my own power to alleviate it was very limited. Every other division in the South Pacific had, by that time, enjoyed a rest period in one rear area or another. Both General Harmon, commanding general of the South Pacific, and Admiral Halsey, commander of the South Pacific, had planned to send the Thirty-seventh to New Zealand following the Bougainville show. The men were looking forward to this opportunity for rest in a pleasant, civilized country. They had earned it. They had been asked to do more in a short period of time than any other division in the area, and they had done the job well.

By May nothing had happened, so I packed up and flew down to New Caledonia to see General Harmon about our relief. The South Pacific command, he said, was soon to be dissolved. Now that the Solomons were secure, there was no further justification in keeping both that command, under him, and the Southwest Pacific command, under General MacArthur. He said that he wanted to send the Thirty-seventh to New Zealand, and that Admiral Halsey wished it, too. But his command was gone and all of us were now under General MacArthur. General MacArthur's headquarters had rejected sending the Thirty-seventh to New Zealand. We were to remain on Bougainville, and there was nothing more to be said about it. In fact, New Zealand was to be closed down as a rest area, and the Forty-third Division, which was then there, would be the last division to visit New Zealand.

I returned to Bougainville with a heavy heart. It was might hard to face the men. They had given me everything they had; they had never once failed to turn in a magnificent record. But the war was going too fast. Our timetable had been advanced about 6 months because of our unexpectedly swift successes in the Central Pacific and in the Solomons and New Guinea. New Zealand was already too far to the rear. General MacArthur's headquarters could not see sending a division back there, a distance farther than from the United States to Europe, at such a time. Everything was pushing northward. We were just out of luck.

The men were furious about the turn of events. They blamed me, of course, and there was no explaining the matter. I was, after all, their commander, and they endowed me with powers far beyond those I had. I know they wrote home as much, because soon the letters from relatives and friends commenced to pour into my headquarters. Somehow, the idea was prevalent, particularly in Ohio, that I had some wonderful authority that would enable me to grab off some ships, put my men aboard them, and sail blithely away to the United States. I was accused of keeping the division in the Pacific to enhance my own glory, and some of the accusations came from my own men, who really knew better. After going through the last war, the thought of prolonging this war a single hour was horrible to me. Every effort was made to explain the situation to them—I wrote scores of letters to people back home who demanded that I bring the division back. I didn't do much good, I am afraid. And in my heart, I couldn't blame the men—even for their misunderstandings. They had been through too much to want to sit down and listen to me recite pretty explanations There was nothing left to do but sweat it out, and hope that the stuff those fellows had would enable them to overcome their disappointment. The whole Nation now knows how they took it in their stride, and how they went on to the Philippines and did a job second to no other combat achievement in the whole war. And because of all of this, I turned down an opportunity to leave Bougainville for either a leave or a new command in the United States.

And at the same time there were other problems. Our failure to receive a battle star for the Bougainville fighting was an injustice that shouts for correction and which was already, at that time, a matter that filled the men with utterly justified indignation. The rotation system, which came into being during our Bougainville tour, was another "gripe" because of its failure to succeed, at least as it was practiced in the South Pacific. I could discuss each of these problems at great length, and I definitely intend to do so at a later time. My talk now is already a rather long one, and I shall therefore pass on to other subjects. One thing is sure—and that is that I'm not through fighting about that battle-star injustice yet.

Yet, in spite of all these matters which annoyed the soldiers, in spite of their disappointment and feeling that they had been cheated—not once did they fail in their duty. There was nothing to do but get to work. There was no reason for dissembling. The men were told that not only were they not going to New Zealand, or home, but that they were going into more combat—combat in the Philippines—tougher combat than they had ever faced before. This time we were going to war really armed and equipped. No more shoestring fighting; no more elemental stuff. This was to be the big league. The New Georgia convoy of old, four-stacker destroyers would be replaced with battleships, cruisers, and carriers. The skies would be filled with airplanes. On the ground we would have tanks, tank destroyers, all kinds of heavy artillery, all kinds of supporting weapons, and supporting troops. Nothing from the arsenal of the richest country on earth would be denied us this time. We were going into battle for the first time like an American Army in Europe.

The big task on Bougainville was to retrain and to train ourselves to take maximum advantage of the new equipment and support we would receive. For two campaigns we had been fighting in jungles, and the men were the best of jungle fighters. Now they faced fighting in the European tradition—open fighting, fighting in streets and across fields, fighting across rivers, over mountains, across beaches. We had to start all over again on some things. This we did. And the men went to it with a will. They trained furiously—indeed, with such realism that I was astounded and deeply gratified, for I knew that this training was the best insurance against the future we could have.

Thus it was that we landed a veteran, skilled, confident, thoroughly trained division on the shores of Lingayen Gulf, Luzon, that historic morning of January 9, 1945. The beginning was easy; the Japs didn't want to pit themselves against our firepower and armor, and so they took to the mountains and concentrated in Manila, prepared for a last-ditch fight in the streets and buildings.

The first major action came when we were about half way to Manila—abreast of the Clark Field-Fort Stotsenberg area. The Fortieth Division, on our right, was aimed straight for this vital area, but it received such heavy resistance in the hills northwest of Clark Field that it wasn't able to make much progress. The Thirty-seventh Division, in the meantime, had swept down the central plain abreast of Clark Field, with the Fortieth Division no longer on its right flank. Abruptly we were ordered to swing to the right and to capture the fields and Fort Stotsenberg since the other division was not in a position to do the job—as originally planned.

We took the fields. We took Fort Stotsenberg. And we took the strategic heights beyond, the most prominent of which was "Top of the World." It was a furious struggle. The Japs had plenty of tanks, and they used them (although they also eventually lost them). The enemy infantry was confident, tenacious, and operated behind elaborate and formidable defenses. It was no push-over. We lost a lot of men, and we got scuffed up considerably before we obliterated the Japs.

Immediately thereafter we swung south in the now-famous race with the First Cavalry Division for Manila. It was rather one-sided. The First Cavalry had been provided with completely motorized equipment and it rode to Manila. The Thirty-seventh Division slogged along on foot—the whole, weary, hot, dusty, fighting 150 miles from Lingayen to Manila. At Plaridel, junction just north of Manila of Highway 3 (the one we were traveling) and Highway 5 (the one on which the First Cavalry was riding), we arrived first, only to meet a reinforced enemy battalion, strongly entrenched, awaiting us. It took a couple of days of bitter fighting for the One Hundred and Forty-eighth Infantry Regiment to clean it out. They did it just in time to open the way for the trucks and armor of the cavalry to breeze through. Our men were fit to be tied, and more determined than ever to hustle along to Manila.

We got to Manila a few hours after the First Cavalry. But sweet revenge awaited us. In their headlong flight to reach the city, the cavalry pushed out too far and got some of their advance elements cut off and surrounded in the middle of the city. Imagine, then, the unconcealed smugness of the men of the Thirty-seventh Division when we got the order to force through a contact with the cavalry. That was a story that was kept out of the press, but we enjoyed our minor little fun anyway. We reestablished communication with the dismounted horsemen, and all was well.

I think one of the most amusing things about the arrival in Manila was the case of the Balintowok Brewery, which stands on the northern edge of the city. The men were marching along the road in a double file, and I was there, too, watching them move into the city. As we reached the top of a rise there was that fine, white, gleaming brewery, apparently unharmed, standing like a desert mirage. Just beyond was a river, and the bridge spanning it had been blown by the Nips. The men had to wade across in chin-deep water, holding their rifles over their heads, so consequently progress was greatly slowed. Some Filipinos were standing in the road in front of the brewery, passing out bottled beer to the soldiers as they slogged by. Pretty soon the lines were halted by the bottleneck at the river, and I saw no reason to stop them when small groups of soldiers went into the brewery, emerging shortly with helmets full of beer—ice-cold beer. It wasn't long until peeps were pulling up to the oasis, filling loads of five-gallon water cans with the wonderful brew. In a few hours all the bottled beer and two vats of mature beer were gone. What a picnic for those hot, dusty GI's. I'll never forget the sight of the Buckeye Division invading Manila gulping beer from steel helmets as it marched.

We pushed on into the city and got the usual, and by now no longer novel, enthusiastic welcome from the Filipinos. Flowers, fruit, and even bottles of beer, which I parried with my steel-helmeted head, were tossed into my jeep. A few Filipinos were still removing their hats and bowing low, just as they had had to do when the Japanese soldiers passed by. Everything was wonderfully happy and funny. The grim business awaited us downtown.

I often muse over those enthusiastic welcomes—the cheers, the upraised hands with fingers in the V-for-victory sign. After the Japanese surrender, my interpreter drove one day to pick up a Jap colonel, who was coming into our lines for a conference on surrender terms. As they sped along, the Filipinos were beside the road cheering lustily, "Veectoree, Joe!" The Jap colonel commenced to chuckle at the sight.

"What's so funny?" my interpreter asked him.

"It's just like it was when we came in," the Jap officer said laughing, "only they used to shout 'Banzai' for us and now it's 'Veectoree, Joe' for you!"

The division quickly moved into the city, penetrating to the downtown sections, north of the Pasig River, which bisects it. As we advanced resistance steadily increased. That night our forward elements met bitter resistance downtown. As the day closed the ground shook to terrific explosions from mined buildings and great columns of flame burst from within them. A careful and complete plan for the destruction of the city was being carried into effect by the Japanese—and we were powerless to stop it—we had no way of knowing in which of thousands of places the demolitions were being controlled. Imagine the major portion of the downtown shopping and business sections of Columbus or Cleveland or Cincinnati suddenly erupting in smoke and flames. Big, modern, reinforced concrete and steel office buildings were literally blown from their foundations to settle crazily in twisted heaps. Our troops were forced to move back from this holocaust, lest they be trapped and incinerated, as were so many helpless Filipinos.

From the roof of our headquarters I watched, enraged at the wantonness of what I saw. The sky was a copper-burnished dome of thick clouds. So great was the glare of the dying city that the streets, even back where we were, were alight as from the reflection of a reddish moon. Great sheets of flame swept across the roof tops, sometimes spanning several city blocks in their consuming flight. The roar, even at that distance, was like a Bessemer converter, and the earth shook frequently as yet more of the powerful demolition charges exploded, sending fountains of flame and debris in a hot, swirling eruption to meet the dense clouds overhead. We saw the awful pyrotechnics of destruction, spreading ever faster to encompass and destroy the most beautiful city in the Far East.

Our men, those down in the city, were already fighting fire and Japs. Rear guard enemy snipers harassed them as they labored to save the city. That afternoon our forces had reached the famed Bilibid Prison and rescued nearly 1,400 internees: Americans, British, and other civilians plus over 800 American officers and enlisted men who had survived since the fall of the Philippines in 1942. From them came a frantic call for help because the fires of the burning city were rapidly reaching the prison. There was no time for advance preparation. Hastily, every available truck was rounded up. The First Cavalry Division at once sent us many trucks and drivers to augment our own. Through the smoky streets these courageous men went, all night long, ignoring the snipers and flames, and the tottering buildings. The smoke was so dense they burned their headlights, ignoring the peril of doing so. And they brought every one of these internees back to our shoe-factory headquarters. We improvised a hospital, kitchens, and sleeping places. Everything went like clockwork; everyone labored all through the night.

It was a pitiful sight. Men, women, and children. Armless and legless American soldiers—all so cheerful and uncomplaining. The soldiers, particularly, tried to make a big joke of the situation, exchanging quips with our well-fed, well-equipped, eager soldiers. Many wept, unashamed. As one truckload of American prisoners of war drove up, I heard one of them shout to an MP: "You guys sure have made monkeys out of those blasted Nips!" Then, in a self-conscious sort of way he added: "But I guess they kind of made monkeys out of us." They couldn't quite realize that, to us, Americans who meet defeat gallantly, as they did, are heroes as much as are triumphant conquerors.

The city burned all night, all the next day, and the next night. But soon only rubble and steel were left. The flames died for lack of fuel. Meanwhile, the area north of the Pasig had been taken by our troops and the Eleventh Airborne Division was moving up toward Manila from the south to seize Nichols Field and meet us. The real fight lay ahead.

South of the Pasig lies Manila's once-beautiful governmental center—an area of tall, handsome, modern apartment houses and of beautiful residences bordering Dewey Boulevard and the harbor. All of these buildings were of the most modern concrete and steel construction. Who could have foreseen, when they were designed and built, that they would make such formidable fortresses for an invader?

Paco district, the police station, the post office and mint, the Legislative Building, the Finance Building, the Philippine General Hospital, and scores more became military objectives which we had to wrest from an enemy who literally fought to the last man.

And dominating all the governmental section was the famed Walled City, or Intramuros; a centuries-old Spanish fortress that had resisted capture through all its history until it was assaulted by the Thirty-seventh Division. Walls 30 feet thick, studded with gun positions and pillboxes, faced us. Inside, it was a closely packed maze of buildings, ancient and modern.

Our real fight, and the hardest and most costly for us in the war, began with an assault to cross the Pasig River—a regular beachhead-style amphibious assault, using amphibious tractors and assault boats. It was bitterly contested and we sustained many casualties, not only from the defenders themselves but from the heavy Japanese mortars and artillery which plastered the area. Gradually the beachhead widened, but progress from then on was slow and painful. Each modern, fireproof building was a fortress. We used tanks, flame throwers, tank destroyers, smoke, infantry—everything but air bombing, which was forbidden; and artillery was used moderately because it was restricted. The fighting was building by building, floor by floor, and room by room. It was quite usual to have a pitched battle raging between our forces on one side of a corridor in an office building and the Japs on the other. Or for us to hold the first floor, with Japs on the second, and in the cellar below. These buildings had been prepared by the enemy with concrete emplacements—even artillery had been dragged up into the higher floors to be fired down at us. Pillboxes of concrete and steel dominated street corners with machine guns spraying death in every direction.

The instances of heroism that came from the fighting there have become legion. Day and night, week after week, fighting, dying, snatching a wink of sleep in a rubble heap with bullets splattering the walls around, dashing into almost certain death with never a semblance of faltering—such was the life of the doughboy fighting in Manila. These were the men who could crawl across 50 yards of open ground, into the face of a pillbox, lugging flame throwers on their backs, until they were within feet of the strong point and could loose the fiery blast of their machines on the Nips within. These were the men who walked slowly, steadily, fearlessly, completely exposed around a tank, armed only with rifles, to protect that great machine of theirs from a Jap charge of explosive-bearing suicide soldiers. These were the men who could walk fearlessly into a rushing river and steadily wade straight toward the enemy on the opposite bank. These were the men, who though wounded themselves, would painfully crawl to help a wounded buddy and perhaps die in the attempt. These men, and the Ohio men who have served in all the armed forces, accepted the greatest challenge ever hurled into the faces of any men in history. They have won—won hands down—won against the best that could be sent against them. We all owe them more than we ever can pay.

But Manila fell to us. It was a hard battle, the most costly of the war for the Thirty-seventh. Not only was there a shortage of artillery ammunition due to the sinking of several ammo ships, resulting in a matériel limitation being imposed upon us from the time we landed at Lingayen Gulf until we made the assault on the Walled City, but in the early stages of the Manila battle we were permitted to fire only on buildings known to be defended by the enemy. No area fire covering one or more blocks was permitted, so we had to depend mainly upon our point-blank artillery weapons mounted on tanks or tank destroyers. Neither were we allowed to bomb the built-up areas. The reason, of course, was the understandable desire of higher headquarters to save lives of civilians who may have been trapped in these buildings and also to preserve, if possible, the buildings themselves. As a partial result of these limitations casualties were alarmingly high. To me the loss of a single American life to save a building was unthinkable. The Thirty-seventh had always believed in the use of heavy fire power to the maximum and we had, therefore, picked up the reputation of being about the most wasteful division in the theater in the expenditure of artillery ammunition. This reputation certainly has never bothered us, for we only point to the fact that we fought for more than 2 years and lost fewer men than other divisions with comparable fighting. Lavish use of artillery played a big part in making this record possible.

Well, our losses in that inferno became of such concern to me that the corps commander, a grand soldier who was also greatly worried about the heavy toll, and I were able to get restrictions lifted to permit both direct and overhead, or indirect fire. From then on, putting it crudely, we really went to town.

We used these shells and plastered the Walled City until it was a mess. It fell to us with ease we never expected. We made a churned-up pile of dust and scrap out of the imposing, classic government buildings. Our bombers have done some pretty fine alteration work on the appearance of Berlin and Tokyo. Just the same I wish they could see what we did with our little artillery on the Jap strongholds of Manila.

Of course it's too bad. There is no justification for destruction unless it saves men's lives. The Japs had thoroughly burned those buildings out anyway—and they had prepared all of them for demolition should they choose not to fight in them. But the blackened concrete and steel shells of these gutted buildings made even more formidable fortresses than they were when they were untouched and filled with inflammable furniture and fixtures. The buildings were useless except as fortifications. As fortresses they belonged to the enemy side—and we had to take them. I have no apologies to make, although I know there was plenty of weeping and wailing in Manila from property owners who saw their buildings disappear in the blasts of 240-millimeter shells. If I could have had those dive bombers too, I might have made the big rubble into little rubble.

So much for Manila. It is a ruined city—unhealthy, depressing, poverty-stricken. Let us thank God our cities have been spared such a fate.

In passing I would like to mention something about the brighter side of our stay in Manila. This gang of ours took well to the civilians there—and the good feeling was reciprocated in most cases, although the fellows do have some pretty rough gripes about some Filipinos, and you've probably heard them already. Anyway, about the time we were around there the Thirty-seventh Division AEF Veterans' Association sent us a large number of our shoulder-patch insignia—the first we'd had since we left home in 1942. These soon appeared on the streets of Manila, and since we were one of the first divisions there, our men were the apples of many shining, brown Filipino eyes. Even so, I was surprised when, months later, I returned to Manila (wearing my patch, of course) and was stopped not once but several times by giggling, young Filipino girls. The conversations usually went something like this:

"Oh, General—you are from the Thirty-seventh Deeveeshun. (Giggles.) Do you know Corp. Johnnee Smeeth? (More giggles.) Well, Johnnee has not been to see me for many weeks. He can't get a pass. General, could you please give Johnnee a pass this week?" And just in case I didn't remember Johnny, a slip of paper with his full name, rank, company, and maybe even his serial number would be thrust at me.

Well, I never committed my "Johnnees" to visits to Manila. So I'd just tell the little gals that I'd see.

Our stay in Manila was brief. We got orders to head back north again at once and to enter the battle for Baguio, in which the Thirty-third Division was already engaged. That outfit was punching up on Baguio from the south and southwest. We had the job of moving in from the west along the winding mountain highway that led from the west coast of Luzon to the summer capital. It was a big change from the street fighting in Manila. The road hung on the side of mountains nearly all the way and attained altitudes of 5,000 feet, which brought a welcome coolness from the heat of the Luzon lowlands. It was a series of tough, sharp engagements, with the Nips enjoying all the advantages of the terrain. Every turn in the ascending, corkscrew road was a potential ambush. We had to attack frontally and to keep hammering frontally. I hate that kind of war—it's the slowest and most expensive kind. But what choice was there with sheer mountains on one side of the road and vast, deep, precipitous gorges on the other? But we made it. We got to Baguio—and we got there first.

While the Baguio show was going on, the One Hundred and Forty-fifth Infantry was detached from us, so we did the job with two-thirds of our strength. During this time the One Hundred and Forty-fifth was in the mountainous area east of Manila in the operation to take the Japanese-held Mount Pacawagan region * * * a God-forsaken rugged area, if ever there was one. They certainly avoided no mountain fighting by leaving us just before Baguio. In fact, where they went they didn't even have the advantage of a road to follow. They had a fearfully tough job to do—but they did it well and thoroughly.

And, in the time Baguio was being polished off, and the Cagayan campaign was about to get under way, the One Hundred and Forty-eighth Infantry was pulled out and thrown in with the Twenty-fifth Division in the terrific battle for Balete Pass—gateway to the Cagayan. We weren't being sent from one operation to another—we were fighting three simultaneously. This is what is meant when a division is called a "shock" division.

Now came the last phase—a combination of fighting through a pile of mountains and ending up in another dash up a great plain. This was the Thirty-seventh's single-handed job of seizing the Cagayan Valley—rich breadbasket of northern Luzon. We were in this fight within a month after burying the the dead of Baguio. Pound, pound, pound * * * that was the pace of the Thirty-seventh. Rest? Something to think about. General Krueger called us his "trouble-shooters." Yank magazine named the Thirty-seventh the "Heavyweight." Evidently there was plenty of trouble wherever we went. It wasn't fun—pushing the men back into one campaign after another. They didn't like it either, but they never let me down—they were heavyweights.

In the Cagayan Valley were more than 50,000 Japanese troops—the last major organized force the enemy had on Luzon. We were given the job to do alone. A simple job! Just fight 50,000 Japs and cover and seize a valley 240 miles long. Our strength? About 15,000 with major attachments—plus noncombat attachments of diverse kinds.

But strength alone is not the criterion. We had magnificent tactical air support—perfectly magnificent. We had fine armor. We had excellent artillery. Moreover, we had a polished, well-equipped, high-spirited fighting machine. The Japs had no air force, little transport, and very poor communications. They did have artillery, and they had more tanks in this operation than we did—whatever good that did them—for we destroyed all their artillery and knocked out about 70 of their tanks.

The enemy was off-balance. He had pinned everything on holding Balete Pass until the rainy season set in, and made movement of our motorized and mechanized army over those frightful roads impossible. Balete fell, and he had to retire in confusion. We decided that this was the time, if ever, for a lightning advance. Against first-class opposition we wouldn't have dared to do what we did—cover 240 miles in 26 days. Not one lone division. We were so strung out that as many as 50 miles existed between forward and rear elements of the division. We just stuck our chin out and bashed forward—counting on the Japs' confusion to prevent serious flank threats. We were pretty sure it was a good gamble—and it was. It became a business of pushing one regiment hard—resting it and leapfrogging another over it—pushing that one, resting it, and leapfrogging the third over it—and then back to the first. Many days we averaged a mile an hour, even counting delays in cleaning out one Jap nest after another. The Japanese surrendered so fast that we had a big sign painted in front of our headquarters—it said: "Japanese Army Demobilization Center—operated by the Thirty-seventh Infantry Division." It wasn't so far off at that.

The Cagayan operation was a wonderful demonstration of coordinated effort by all arms. The air support was so superb that General Yamashita himself went out of his way to praise it after his capture. The armor was aggressive and very powerful.

And that's the way it was all up the valley. Machine-like killing and destruction wrought by men who fought with precision and skill only long experience, gained the hard way, can bring. We did far more, I think, than our share of the fighting on Luzon, but we did have the honor of delivering the coup de grâce to the last remaining organized forces of old Yamashita. It was a fitting climax for a division that had participated in the original landings on the island. When we met the Eleventh Airborne Division, which parachuted near Aparri and met us thirty-odd miles to the south, the battle for Luzon was over. And, although we didn't know it then, so was the war for us, after 592 days of combat.

Such has been the saga of the Buckeye Division—Buckeye no more, but as all-American as men from 48 States could make it. I am a humble man before the example of sacrifice, determination, and courage set by these men. If war had to be, what more wonderful privilege could any man have been given than to lead such a force in the cause of his people?

It is significant that this is not my opinion alone. Our No. 1 foe, General Yamashita, said of your Thirty-seventh Division, during an interview in Manila, the following: "I did not know that the Thirty-seventh Division was making the drive up highway 5 until after you had taken Tuguegarao. We did not expect your drive to be as intense as you made it, nor did we expect you to use the tactics which apparently are your specialty. When I speak of your tactics, I mean your boldness in concentrating your attack on a narrow front using all available firepower to blast a hole for your aggressive infantry and the extreme effectiveness of the employment of artillery and air power to neutralize any force on the flanks. The close coordination of your armor and heavy fire support with the infantry, together with the most effective employment of close support aircraft we have experienced, won my admiration and demonstrated the tremendous power of your attack."

I have tried to give you a brief report. At best I have touched lightly here and there on an adventure and achievement about which volumes could be written. Nothing I could put into words, nor, for that matter, that anyone else could speak or write, could adequately describe their story of struggle and triumph. What they did has been done all over the world by American men at sea, in the air, and on the ground. The faith and the zeal of America—in the production lines of home and the battle lines abroad—has been the greatest story of power and determination and greatness ever told. If one fraction of that magnificent effort be projected by our people into the future, what a breathtaking prospect is unfolded before us. I believe we stand on the threshold of a tremendous destiny. From what I have seen our young men achieve on the battlefields, and our people achieve on the home front that supported them, I am thrilled not only by the prospect of that destiny, but of the way in which we can seize it if we will.

Rent Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMORY H. PRICE
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to announce to the House the establishment of a local fair-rent committee in Jacksonville, Fla., by our able mayor, the Honorable Frank Whitehead. The organization of this committee followed the appeal by Mr. Arthur W. Binns, president of the National Home and Property Owners' Foundation, for establishment of these committees in cities throughout the United States to seek fair and equitable adjustment of the rental situation following the lifting of rent control. I am now informed that many other cities have created similar boards in a determined effort to show that private enterprise is capable of doing a far better job in running America than the bureaucrats.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a list of cities that have established fair-rent committees together with copies of an appeal made by Mr. Arthur W. Binns, president of the National Home and Property Owners' Foundation, for the organization of these committees:

CITIES IN WHICH FAIR RENT COMMITTEES HAVE BEEN ESTABLISHED

Jacksonville and Tampa, Fla.; Asheville, Winston-Salem, High Point, Greensboro, Salisbury, and Hickory, N. C.; Charlottesville, Va.; Minot N. Dak.; Joplin, Mo.; Cleveland and Lima, Ohio; Indianapolis, Ind.; Billings, Mont.; Pine Bluff and El Dorado, Ark.; Chester, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Altoona, Pa.; Glendale, Calif.; Duluth, Minn.; Wilmington, Del.; Savannah, Ga.; Montgomery, Ala.

STATEMENT BY ARTHUR W. BINNS

To cushion the shock of transition from rent control to a free market, the National Home and Property Owners' Foundation, with headquarters in Washington, D. C., announced last night it would sponsor local fair rent committees throughout the Nation.

The foundation, through its president, Arthur W. Binns, of Philadelphia, said it would place its resources at the disposal of communities and call upon the local municipalities for the establishment of fair-rent committees of impartial groups to create intermediate rent control by volunteer action of property owners.

The foundation will work through its trustees, composed of property, apartment, and home owners in each State.

"The policy of volunteer rent-control committees was eminently successful before OPA was instituted," Mr. Binns pointed out. For about 2 years, completely voluntary rent-control committees held rents to minimum levels. The power of public opinion, of fairness and equity and publicity, are powers even stronger than any legal authority."

Mr. Binns said that the National Home and Property Owners' Foundation's policy has been that rent control in peacetime is not in the public interest.

"We have long maintained," he said, "that the housing shortage which has become increasingly severe with each passing month was the product of a rent-control policy which was progressively liquidating the entire rental housing market."

Between the end of frozen rents and the restoration of a free market with adequate supply there must be, Mr. Binns said, a series of adjustments tempering the intermediate shock. The local committees will probably have to determine, he added, what a fair rent increase should be for each individual community, hold that line for a time, then relax again until rents finally come into balance with the rest of the economy.

"It is absolutely certain," Mr. Binns added, "that a tremendous supply of new apartments and new houses will shortly appear after the abolition of rent control and the restoration of a free competitive market in which production again becomes possible.

"The restoration of an abundant supply of housing, which always exceeded the demand by at least 10 percent prior to the appearance of the planned economy and the destruction by price formula, will again appear as soon as sufficient time has elapsed for the productive power of a free economy to catch up with the very great demand."

Fair-rent committees were established in hundreds of cities throughout the United States during the 2 years prior to OPA's birth. These committees kept rents down by hearing complaints from tenants whose rent had been raised. Public opinion and the threat of unfavorable publicity kept recalcitrant landlords in line.

Records kept in 48 communities show that about 8,000 complaints were received, and most of them are said to have been adjusted successfully. The work of such a committee in New London, Conn., is said to have kept rents in that city about 25 or 30 percent lower than in neighboring cities of Bridgeport and Waterbury.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRENT SPENCE
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Clair Wilcox, Director, Office of International Trade Policy, May 7, 1946:

WHAT WE GET OUT OF THE BRITISH LOAN

1. In addition to the $3,750,000,000 in principal we get $2,200,000,000 in interest if the credit is all drawn and none of the interest is waived.

2. We get participation by Britain in the International Monetary Fund and a consequent commitment that she will not take independent action to put our exporters at a competitive disadvantage by depreciating the pound.

3. We get her agreement, when the loan is made, immediately to remove exchange controls on day-to-day transactions between our two countries, so that Americans who sell to the United Kingdom will then be able to obtain their pay in any currency they chose.

4. We get her promise that within the following year she will remove exchange controls on day-to-day transactions with other countries, making sterling freely convertible into dollars or other currencies, so that foreign businessmen who sell in England will no longer have to buy there but can buy in America if they choose.

5. We get her promise that as she settles her debts within the Empire she will make the pounds she pays convertible into other currencies, so that her creditors can use them, if they wish, to buy American goods.

6. We get her agreement that by the end of 1946, she will so administer her import quotas that they do not discriminate against the United States, thus giving the American exporter, who sells for scarce dollars, an equal opportunity in the British market with exporters who sell for more plentiful currencies.

7. We get Britain's promise to work with us, this summer, toward the reduction of tariffs and the elimination of preferences. Specifically, it is agreed that every cut in tariffs, within the Empire, will cut the margin of imperial preference by the same amount. This, again will enable American businessmen to enter Empire markets more nearly on a basis of competitive equality.

8. We get British support for the American trade program. And this is not a socialist or an imperialist program; it is a program of economic liberalism. In short, we have obtained Britain's pledge that her foreign economic policy will henceforth be devoted to restoring an international order that is favorable to the preservation and expansion of private enterprise.

How Much Do We Love Our Children?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY J. LATHAM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I would like to ask you, in all seriousness, "How Much Do We Love Our Children?"

Our grandfathers, in the single year 1890, contributed $4.61 toward running the Federal Government, and owed $17.92 of its national debt. Our fathers, in the year 1920, contributed $34.83 toward running the Government, and owed $200.10 of the national debt. Today, each member of our families and every constituent in our various districts contributes an average of $722.33 toward running our Government, and owes over $2,000 of the national debt. How much will our children pay and owe in years to come?

The term "national debt" should be changed, in my opinion, and called the "national mortgage" because the national debt is surely a lien and charge on everything we have and hold dear in America. It must be repaid as surely as we must repay the mortgages on our homes.

My district is composed of small-home owners, thrifty workers, most of whom own their own homes. These home owners think that all they owe in the world is the $5,000 mortgage on their homes. They try religiously to reduce this mortgage each month by small payments on the principal. But they are mistaken, for if they have a wife and two children they today must each add to the amount of their mortgage the $8,000 which is their families' share of the national mortgage. I have made up my mind that I shall do nothing to increase this burden on the home owner in my district.

If Government spending in coming years continues to increase at the rate it has increased in the last 50 years we will be increasing this national mortgage on the lives and futures of our children. The poet reminds us: "Who more than he is worth doth spend, he makes a rope his life to end."

America has been and will continue to be generous to the world. We have contributed billions upon billions to UNRRA, Bretton Woods, the stabilization fund, and the United Nations. Most every nation in the world is knocking on our door for a gift-loan to the tune of about $25,000,000,000.

It will be a very easy thing indeed for us to open the door and start voting ourselves into voluntary national bankruptcy. Radical forces in the United States would like to see this happen so that they could move in and take over amid the resulting chaos and confusion. As examples of the results of a spendthrift policy, I refer you to revolutionary France or Germany after World War I. Should this happen here, to whom shall we look for aid?

We have reached the point where we must call a halt, check our bank balance, and resign the role of a drunken spendthrift. Unless we do this we shall be completely unable to survive as a free country, to improve the lot of our own people in years to come, or to continue to be generous to the rest of the world. I do not have to remind you that the Federal income tax seriously depletes the weekly take-home pay of Americans who are today being squeezed by rising prices. The Secretary of the Treasury says the tax will be even higher next year.

If we love our children we should adopt at once the same policy the home owner in my district does with his mortgage. We should agree to each year pay off at least a small amount of the principal on the national mortgage. The plan should be simple and clear. It could easily be accomplished in one measure containing two provisions:

First. To compel Government spending to stay within its income; and Second. To compel the allocation of a small percentage of the tax collected each year toward reduction of the principal of the national debt.

There is no other way.

Adoption of this plan by Congress would strengthen the moral fiber of our people, and instill confidence in our democratic system of government and in the Congress. It would keep America strong, sound, and safe, so that she could continue to be an influence for a better way of life, both at home and abroad.

If we do not do this at once, we might some day have to look into the accusing eyes of our children and admit that we voted away a free America.

Rural Housing and the Wagner-Ellender-Taft Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. SAVAGE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill contains the first effective, Nation-wide rural housing program ever presented to Congress. And rural housing is, in many respects, in greater need of improvement than urban housing. The funds provided are expected to build or improve 100,000 farm houses and provide nonfarm low-rent housing for 150,000 rural families; and the benefits offered farm families under this bill will be of vital importance to war veterans returning to the farm or taking up farming for the first time.

The Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill is a safe, sound, typically American, private enterprise program. It is the culmination of years of careful study by Congress. For the sake of our war veterans, for the sake of our huge farm population, for the sake of all of us, this bill should be passed now.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Record of July 11, 1946:

WILL WE WRECK WORLD PEACE JUST TO SPITE BRITAIN?

Within 48 hours the House of Representatives will make history.

The Members will vote on the kind of world we all will live in for years to come.

Their votes will decide whether it is to be a stable or an unstable world, a world drawn closer together or divided more sharply. Their votes will determine the prospects of peace—or war.

All that is tied up in the vote on the British loan.

How many Congressmen would vote for legislation labeled "a bill to wreck the Bretton Woods program, destroy the new International Bank, and abolish the whole Roosevelt-Truman program for world economic cooperation"?

Few would support a bill so named.

Yet every vote against the British loan will be a vote for all that—a vote to drop an economic atom bomb on world trade.

Here's why:

If the loan is defeated, Britain will be forced to do two things: 1. Withdraw from the Bretton Woods program and the International Bank; 2, trade almost exclusively within her empire, cutting much of her normal trade with us—and the world.

With Russia also outside the International Bank, the Bretton Woods program would collapse with England's exit.

Samson was blind when he pushed apart the great pillars and brought down the walls of the temple. May the Members of the House see clearly how reckless votes can bring down in ruins the whole structure which President Roosevelt planned as America's hope for economic peace.

A United Press poll shows 108 Democrats for the loan, 23 against, and 34 undecided. Republicans also are divided, but 40 percent are expected to support the loan. Even so, the vote will be close.

It is those 34 undecided Democrats who may tip the scales for or against the loan. And among them are four from Philadelphia.

This is a chance for them, and all the other 34 undecided Democrats, to show that they are statesmen, and not just politicians; that they put their country above their personal feelings.

We pay tribute to SOL BLOOM, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and Representative GREEN, of Philadelphia. BLOOM said: "I'm voting as an American and not as a Jew. I intend to vote for the British loan."

GREEN said that he was voting for the loan despite his Irish descent.

Certainly both the Irish and the Jews have ample reason to feel bitterly toward the British Government, particularly the Colonial Office. So do Americans of Polish, Lithuanian, and Finnish descent have reason for bitterness toward Russia. And the Puerto Ricans, some Filipinos, many Cubans and South Americans distrust the United States of America.

But just as some United States policies were hated by most Americans, so it is in Britain. There is reason to believe the brutal policies of the British Colonial Office are as misrepresentative of the British people as, say, our own Congress is misrepresentative of the American people in killing an OPA which nearly 80 percent of the people want.

Today is a day when we should be Americans above all else.

America is trying, with constant and earnest effort, to bring the world together despite these blotches of shame. Then many of the rivalries and conflicts, of which persecution and butchery are byproducts, will be eliminated by peoples united in understanding and progress.

The British loan is simply one part—but a key part—of that program. Beating the loan may rebuke the British Colonial Office, but it will ruin America's world program at the same time.

Is it worth it—to wreck the foundation of world peace to spite England?

The Record does not think so.

Elections in McMinn County, Tenn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, for the past 10 years the citizens of McMinn County, Tenn., have been denied the right to vote and have their votes counted as cast. Elections in that county have been conducted by armed deputy sheriffs and policemen. The officers and judges appointed by the two Democratic majority members of the three-man election commission have in many instances been repeaters, that is, men have been appointed who have repeatedly violated every law in the statute books of Tennessee, for the protection of the purity of the ballot.

The machine has employed six principal methods to steal elections in McMinn County. First, it procured and put in the ballot box thousands of ballots on the pretense that they were the ballots of absentee voters. In hundreds of instances, the persons in whose names these ballots were cast were dead, never lived in McMinn County, or were the names of fictitious persons. Second, the machine officers switched ballot boxes. After an election closed, the officer would take charge of the ballot box, which is usually a pasteboard carton, and run with it to a private building owned by the Cantrell bosses, and prevent the judges and clerks from entering until he had a chance to make the switch. Third, the armed Democratic deputy sheriffs and policemen at the point of their guns and with their blackjacks forced the Republican judges to stand back 10 feet while the Democratic officer called Republican ballots in favor of Democratic candidates. Fourth, boys and girls under 21 years of age, and hundreds without poll-tax receipts have been permitted to vote. Fifth, election records have been destroyed by the Democratic election officials so as to hide their crimes. Sixth, they have stuffed the ballot box.

By this reign of fraud and terror, the machine has maintained its hold on the offices of McMinn County for the past 10 years.

The returned veterans of this war and of the first world war, both Democrats and Republicans, have rebelled against these methods, and as part of these remarks, I include an article dated July 11th of this year appearing in the Knoxville News-Sentinel, published at Knoxville, Tenn.:

MCMINN'S GI TICKET CALLS FOR FAIR COUNT—NON-PARTISAN SLATE OF VETERANS SOUNDS CRY FOR FREE ELECTIONS IN DRIVE TO OUST CANTRELL RING

(By Wilard Yarbrough)

ATHENS, July 11.—The most heated political campaign in a decade shapes up today in McMinn County, with the GI nonpartisan ticket in the role as challenger to the old-line Democrats controlled by the Cantrell organization.

The campaign already has drawn blood and there is every likelihood that more fireworks is in the offing between now and election day August 1, when the race for county posts will be settled at the polls.

The election in many respects is a test of Cantrell supremacy in McMinn County. Should the veterans win then the Cantrell dynasty in State politics would begin to crumble. The Cantrell Democrats—already with a split in ranks—have every intension of maintaining the status quo.

Despite the aggresive campaigning of the GI candidates who have perfected an organization almost overnight, the main Democratic party here is unperturbed. The Democrats are waging a quiet campaign and expect to win in the battle of the ballot boxes.

ONE HUNDRED PERCENT VET TICKET

This first article, however, is primarily concerned with the GI ticket, its candidates, and its campaign pledges and charges against the opposition. Every candidate on the GI ticket is a veteran, four of them from World War II and the fifth a World War I veteran.

Creation of the ticket itself came as a surprise in most political circles—because heretofore the Republicans have mustered their own candidates and this time have stepped aside in favor of the GI's.

The veterans met in convention May 9 and required GI identification before they would admit delegates. They billed the convention thusly in a paid political advertisement:

"If you are interested in cleaning up McMinn County and the return of good, clean, honest, efficient government, don't fail to attend this meeting."

HERE'S LINE-UP

From that meeting 2 months ago came this ticket:

For sheriff, Knox Henry, 33-year-old veteran of the European campaign. Mr. Henry, a resident of Athens, is a Republican.

For trustee, Frank Carmichael, 29-year-old son of a farmer and who rose from the ranks to become a major in the United States Army in the European theater. Mr. Carmichael, who wears the Purple Heart, is a Democrat. He lives with his parents on a farm between Etowah and Athens.

For county court clerk, George (Gump) Painter, 33, a Pacific veteran of 30 months and a resident of Etowah. Mr. Painter came to McMinn County from Polk County not so long ago. He is a Democrat.

William (Bill) Hamby, 29, former Army captain, is the GI candidate for circuit court clerk. A resident of Athens, he is a Democrat.

And Charlie Pickle, 52-year-old World War vet, is the candidate for register of deeds. The second Republican on the GI ticket, he lives in Englewood.

CROSS PARTY LINES

Shortly after the GI's announced results of their convention the Republicans met and voted to endorse the GI ticket, thereby stepping into the background for the first time in memory.

Thus the veterans picked up the united support of the Republicans and, quite significantly, one faction of the Democrats which cannot be ignored.

This is the Rogers' faction of the Democrats. It is headed by John Rogers, veteran politician, and his son, County Court Clerk Clyde Rogers, who lost the sheriff's nomination to Paul Cantrell at the convention. The split is the only one in 10 years and came about during the past 2 years. The clean break came at the Democratic convention with Clerk Rogers dealt a cold hand.

This political split led to the recent bloodshed, but full particulars will be dealt with in the next article on the Cantrell dynasty. Suffice it to say at this time, however, that the animosity between the Cantrells and the Rogers within the same party is much more bitter than between the Cantrell Democrats and the GI's.

FREE ELECTION ISSUE

The GI's charge many things. Candidate Henry has promised to accept only the $5,000 sheriff's salary and to put his deputies on salaries too, thereby eliminating the fee system.

County court clerk records show that Sheriff Pat Mansfield during the past 4 years has received something like $100,000. The average is $25,000 a year.

But the battle cry of the GI's does not involve money. "We want to assure any person that he can become a candidate for office in McMinn County with a chance to win," said one leader.

"If democracy is good enough for the Japs, Nazis, and Italians, then we figure it's good enough for McMinn Countians. We want a fair count at the ballot box, and we expect to get it."

GAMBLING CHARGE MADE

The GI's say, too, that Athens is marked with wide-open gambling houses, with one place having dice and card games. They say that the sheriff's force permits such gambling without attempting to stop it.

The GI's have had county rallies in Englewood, Niota, and Calhoun. They report good attendances, with the daily press here reporting the same. The opposition says the attendance has been poor.

A GI leader said prominent McMinn Countians had underwritten the veterans' campaign, with any amount of money available for the asking. Every county road, regardless of its remoteness, is placarded with GI signs with pictures of all candidates.

CAMPAIGN DAILY

The five GI candidates campaign daily, sunup until after dark. They radiate confidence and display aggressiveness. Regardless of the stated issues, they have but one goal to achieve: to oust the Cantrell Democrats from control in McMinn County and thereby remove them from their favored place in the sun that sets on Ed Crump, of Memphis; Burch Biggs, of Polk County; Gov. Jim Nance McCord; and others, including Senators Tom Stewart and Kenneth McKellar.

It's a perilous journey, and the GI's are aware of the pitfalls, for the Cantrells are firmly entrenched, with a grass-roots organization that touches the four corners of McMinn County.

Anti-Semitism in Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, to spread scorn, hate, and revulsion among men of all classes and faiths is the seed technique of communism in every land where it hopes to flourish. Nowhere is this better to be seen than in Poland today. There, much can be gained for the ultimate goal of a Red and irreligious Poland if Jew and Catholic can be involved in the eyes of the world in soul-sickening programs.

This morning's editorial in the New York Times on this subject warns against the danger for the world of such an attempt:

ANTI-SEMITISM IN POLAND

Augustus Cardinal Hlond of Poland captured the world's attention 6 years ago when he presented to the Pope a full-length report, immediately broadcast, on the Nazi crimes against the Polish church and people. Later he went to France and through the treachery of Marshal Petain fell into the hands of the Germans. If his life was saved it was because they thought him more valuable as a hostage than as a martyr. When the war was over he went back to his people. He was known as a liberal, working patiently for his country's impoverished laborers and farmers, dignifying himself and his church by refusing to take advantage of an ancient Polish law requiring forced contributions.

Now, caught in the internal politics of Poland, he has made an unhappy statement which cannot but injure his reputation for broadmindedness and humanity. He made it under great stress. A dispatch to this newspaper this week expressed the opinion that in the Kielce pogrom trial and in Warsaw the Polish Government is seeking "to lay the charge of anti-Semitism against virtually all who oppose the present regime." This may be part of a campaign, as Cardinal Hlond says, "to introduce a governmental structure that a majority of the Polish people do not desire." But when he says that Polish anti-Semitism is in "a great degree due to Jews who occupy the leading positions in Poland's Government" he must seem to be to some extent justifying it. The debased creatures who started a new wave of pogroms yesterday may have thought so.

It is encouraging to turn from his words to the brave and generous utterances of his church. As the Vatican said in a wartime broadcast, "He who makes a distinction between Jews and other men is unfaithful to God and is in conflict with God's commands." Surely this noble principle is needed now in Poland, where so many millions of Jews perished under the Nazi terror.

Old-Age Assistance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MERLIN HULL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, after authorizing greater loans to foreign nations than any Congress, unless lend-lease gifts made in wartime shall still be considered as loans, the House is preparing to recess. Much important legislation remains undone. Some of it will be hastily considered and rushed through. Other equally important measures will remain in committee pigeonholes and denied the right to come before the House. There now are over 30 petitions on the Clerk's desk, some signed by many Members, begging for an opportunity to have particular measures brought up for action. Some of them at least should receive House consideration, but under the rules of the House, all are denied that privilege.

Among the measures of vast importance to millions of good citizens are those relating to Federal assistance for the aged, a Federal law which will deal justly with all the aged people in every State.

The Townsend plan has been before Congress more than 12 years. It has had and still has the wholehearted support of millions of people whose petitions have been repeatedly received and continue to evidence the great interest of millions of voters advocating the enactment of such a law. Those petitions will continue to come and the interest of the public will be maintained until ultimately Congress will enact a Federal law. A good cause never dies. It may be held back by political leaders and administration chieftains from time to time. But in the end the cause will triumph.

In the Congress nearly one-third the Members of the House have labored hard to obtain consideration of the Townsend bill. Appeals have been made in previous years for hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. This year, that hearing was granted by the committee in its consideration of social-security legislation. The time of the hearing was limited, but proponents of the measure presented strong arguments as to why the Ways and Means Committee should at least permit the Townsend bill to come before the House for a vote.

That permission was not granted. Instead a special rule has been proposed which would prevent the bill from being offered as an amendment to the social security bill when that bill is brought in, thus effectively preventing even the supporters of the bill the right to present it on the floor.

Under this administration, as has been the case of other administrations for years, the committees are permitted to bottle up legislation without even debate on the floor or a roll-call vote. Our country has fought and won a great war for freedom and the rights of the people. Still, this situation is presented denying the aged people of our own land from having their cause presented before the Federal Legislature. The situation is so unfair and so unjust that it must appeal to the sense of justice of every fair-minded citizen.

One big objection made to a Federal old-age pension, to be paid from national taxes, is the cost. Economy advocates who deal so strictly with Federal expenditures are always alert to prevent enactment of such a law. They point to the cost of the war and the dangers of inflation whenever the matter comes before Congress. However, it is interesting to note how so many of the leaders who always raise the objection of economy when the cause of the older people comes up, immediately change front and speak for and vote for gift loans to foreign countries, the most of which will never be repaid.

After the First World War, other nations were indebted to our Treasury to the tune of nearly $12,000,000,000. Except Finland, every such debtor nation refused to pay its loan. With interest also defaulted, the total of that foreign-loan policy, for which our taxpayers are paying, is over $16,000,000,000.

Yet a new foreign-loan policy is being set up in this Congress, supported in part by those who have long opposed a Federal pension law on the ground of expense. Britain wants four billions in addition to seven times that amount it received under lend-lease. Last year France received $1,500,000,000 under lend-lease and recently a loan of $1,250,000,000. Russia is virtually promised a loan of $1,250,000,000. It received over $11,000,000,000, under lend-lease. Italy has received $450,000,000, with more millions flowing out for UNRRA. In all, it is proposed to loan in excess of ten billions to foreign countries at this very time. Many more instances might be cited. I have opposed those huge foreign loans from the start. I shall continue to oppose them.

Every billion dollars represents a per capital share of about $8 for every individual in our country. The new British loan would cost the three million people of Wisconsin more than $90,000,000, which is more than double the amount received annually under Wisconsin's State income tax.

The fight for Federal pensions for the aged and the blind must go on. It will go on, even though the administration leaders will continue to object in order that funds of the taxpayers may be spent in huge foreign gifts and loans. The Townsend bill should be considered now, but if not now, then it will loom as a larger issue later. It is an issue which grows stronger as the increased cost of living further presses upon our older people.

Wisconsin now has 45,154 of its aged people drawing old-age assistance. Half the expense is borne by the State and counties. The average monthly payment for the State is about $31. In many counties the payments are as low as $27. The State and counties should be relieved of all such relief taxes, and the Federal Government should provide the funds.

It is urged at this time that there is a campaign on and the Members want to get home, and, for that reason, Congress should recess. Certainly most Members want to participate in their own primary election campaigns. I am among them. But I want to first perform my duty fully here.

The New War for the Preservation of Our Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BYRNES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address delivered by me at the July 4 celebration at Sturgeon Bay, Wis.:

On this, the first Independence Day since the end of the greatest war in all human history, it is fitting and well for us—the beneficiaries of the Declaration of Independence—to pause and pay tribute to those men who, 170 years ago, not only enunciated that greatest declaration of human rights, but who by their faith and confidence in those principles gave them substance and reality.

Their words, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed," will forever live in the hearts of men who believe in freedom. They have given to us a priceless heritage of freedom.

When it has been under direct attack we have ever proved that we were ready to protect that heritage. It was only a few short months ago that we were locked in a vast struggle against the forces seeking to deprive us of the rights which we have held self-evident since the founding of our country. If you could ask the young men who fought and died in the great struggle just ending what they fought for, you would probably receive many and varied answers, but they would resolve into those simple words of the Declaration of Independence. For those simple words, 396,637 Americans gave their lives within the last 4½ years.

Today, the tribute we pay to our founding fathers must be shared with those men who died that the meaning of the Declaration of Independence should not be forever lost. Today, by way of paying tribute, we must reaffirm our faith in those very principles which sent our fathers into battle at Concord Bridge and Bunker Hill and led our sons to the bloody beaches of Okinawa and Salerno Bay.

That reaffirmation of faith is not only fitting; it is vitally necessary.

Even on this day of national celebration, we hear people questioning the value of the great sacrifice this Nation has just made. There is painted for us a world beset with starvation, fear, and unrest. There is the picture of a great nation stumbling toward peace and prosperity, a great nation beset with selfishness, strife, and confusion. The question is asked, "Was the work, the tears, the blood all in vain?" That question is the querulous cry of the timid. The great question of today should be the positive challenge of an honest people, a courageous people. "Who will dare to take from us that for which our fathers before us and our sons today so nobly fought and died?"

America and freedom were born of an honest people, of a courageous people, a people with an abiding faith so strong that even the breath of life was cheap by comparison.

That profound thinker, John Stuart Mill, long ago made a statement which might well have been written for us today, when he said:

"A people may prefer a free government, but, if from indolence, or carelessness, or cowardice, or want of public spirit, they are unequal to the exertions necessary for preserving it; if they will not fight for it when it is directly attacked; if they can be deluded by the artifices used to cheat them out of it; if, by monetary discouragement, or temporary panic, or a fit of enthusiasm for an individual, they can be induced to lay their liberties at the feet of even a great man, or trust him with powers which enable him to subvert their institutions—in all these cases, they are more or less unfit for liberty; and though it may be for their good to have had it even for a short time, they are unlikely long to enjoy it."

WE CANNOT TAKE FREEDOM FOR GRANTED

We cannot stop fighting for freedom as soon as the last bomb is dropped and the last shot is fired. Freedom does not come to those who are merely willing to fight battles for it. Freedom is a living thing and is nurtured by the living faith of a living people. It is a quality of the soul which must be gained and held and protected, day by day, right by right, privilege by privilege and principle by principle; otherwise, it dies.

We have enjoyed all our lives, more freedom, greater liberty, more priceless privileges than the peoples of any land. Our generation was born into a wonderful heritage of freedom in a Nation rich beyond conception in natural resources, with an unsurpassed religious freedom, and into a land teeming with opportunities for those who have the intelligence, the character and the energy to grasp them.

But, unfortunately, we all too often take that freedom for granted. We have taken as fixed and irrevocable that liberty, which, in fact and in faith, is kept alive only by the exercise of eternal vigilance on the part of all of the people. Those liberties, on occasion, have become weak and impaired only because we were willing to accept them as something to which we were born; a right which could not be wrested from us; a heritage which required no exertion on our part to retain and protect.

During the war, when the issues were clearly drawn, when the enemy could be seen and felt, we had no difficulty in sensing our responsibilities toward the preservation of our unalienable rights.

Should we now, even though the enemy will not speak his name and the issues are wrapped in fog, refuse to carry that fight to the doorsteo of the forces who would seize those liberties from us?

There can be but one answer—No. The American people today will carry on with the same courage and the same devotion and with the same faith as those men whose courage, devotion and faith we honor today. We will go forward to battle and victory.

NEW ENEMIES OF AMERICA

My purpose today is to draw for you the battle lines in this new and subtler war for the preservation of our independence My purpose is to impress upon you that the outcome of that battle—on which hinges the future of freedom in America—will depend upon the vigor and enthusiasm which we choose to throw into the fray.

Here is the order of battle:

Our enemies are hate and greed, masked as new forms and philosophies of government; their weapons are deceit, disunity, confusion, and strife. Their god is power, and their war aim is the destruction of freedom.

You may well say, "But these are intangible foes and difficult to recognize. They hide their faces behind masks and they pay no public homage to their god. How will we know them and where will we give them battle?"

My reply is: By their deeds you shall know them. Beware of those who would deceive, disunite, confuse, and create strife. They are the tools of power, who unknowingly or by design are the enemies of the freedom that you and your fathers and your sons have shed blood to nurture in this great land of ours. If you would recognize those enemies, look for the men who practice deceit, foster disunity, spread confusion, and encourage strife. They will not fight in the open; they will not tell you what they seek; they will not tell you who they are; but, by their actions, you will know them if you are ever vigilant and ever jealous of your heritage of freedom.

They know that under the unfettered system of government established in the early days of our Nation, they have no chance to place their ruthless god on the high throne in these United States by open and honest methods. They are clever enough to realize that the American people will crush any direct attempt to deprive them of their precious form of government. Taking advantage of the natural confusion and maladjustments brought on by the great struggle that has so recently been concluded they have begun their insidious campaign. Snakelike, they have adopted new and far more dangerous methods of attack.

THEY PRACTICE DECEIT

For one, they practice deceit. They shun their true names—Communists, Marxists, Fascists—which, if they were honest, they would acknowledge openly. While scheming to seize totalitarian control over your lives, they don the masks of benevolence and humanitarianism, assume the convenient titles—Liberals, Friends of Democracy, and Conferees for Democratic Rights—and gain credence by mouthing the time-worn phrases, "Justice for all, food for all, clothing for all, and everything for all." Secretly detesting our form of government because it denies the scepter of power to any one man or any one group, they worm their way into it. Feeding on the very government they wish to overthrow, they are the first to cry for the protection of the individual liberties that it offers. They are the first to clothe their activities with the protection of the Constitution. It is from their ranks that one hears the loudest cries for free speech and freedom of assembly. Yes; like termites, they seek to undermine it from within. Yes; they are in our Government today, passing as loyal servants.

It is not by accident that today Federal employees must sign a new oath, swearing that they are not members of any organization seeking to overthrow the Government.

It is by no accident that just day before yesterday the Civil Service Committee of the House of Representatives, of which I am a member, commenced an investigation of Federal employees and their loyalty to the United States Government.

It is no accident that an amendment was recently added to the State Department appropriation, giving the Secretary of State definite powers to rid his organization of fellow travelers and their ilk.

Advocating a supergovernment over all phases of human living, they seek to install it by the gradual application of more and more control, under the guise of humanity, until the threads become strands, the strands become a net, and the net becomes a colossal trap to ensnare our freedom.

THEY SPREAD CONFUSION

Over all, they spread the smoke screen of confusion.

If you protest at the treatment of the small nations of the world, like Poland and Finland, they call you warmonger and hate spreader.

If you attempt to fight for a free government in a land founded on free enterprise, they will decry you as reactionary.

Expose their workings, and you earn for yourself the scornful epithet "Red baiter."

Like the fungus that cannot stand the rays of the sun, neither can their cause survive in the cold light of truth. Truth must be obscured, the issues must be twisted, or their alien-minded philosophy, under any name, will never prevail in the United States.

THEY ENCOURAGE STRIFE

Beware, too, of their left-handed weapon, the encouragement of strife. These enemies prefer strikes to honest bargaining, race riots to the promotion of equality through education, and bloody demonstrations to the due process of law. There is no limit to the means they will use to destroy confidence in the form of government which we now enjoy, including the instigation of civil war.

The present leader of the Communist Party in America was at least once honest. Consider this statement he once made, but has since repudiated:

"He (speaking of the Communist) knows he is engaged in a life and death struggle with an absolutely lawless and unscrupulous enemy and considers his tactics from the standpoint of their effectiveness. With him, the end justifies the means, whether his tactics be legal and moral or not does not concern him, so long as they are effective."

THEY SPREAD DISUNITY AND DISTRUST

Above all others, they prefer their prime weapons of disunity and distrust. They know full well that their cause flourishes when the people are divided, one against the other, thus allowing them to move in with their small group and take control.

They are in the forefront of the ranks of those engendering racial hatred, religious intolerance, and class prejudice. Like seemingly honest men, they deplore the Gerald K. Smiths, but, hypocritically, they are pleased at such handy fomenters of hatred and intolerance.

They would set labor against management, farmer against city dweller, veteran against nonveteran, officer against enlisted man, poor against rich, and everybody against everybody else. They know full well that when the Nation realizes how identical all of our interests are, their cause is dead.

I was amazed last Sunday to hear the man whom we have chosen to administer aid to the starving people of the world, Mr. LaGuardia, talk spitefully of the rapacious producer in contrast to the saint-like consumer. Unwittingly or not, he and others who have echoed his words are playing into the hands of the enemy. A new instrument for class struggle is being forged. A fictitious battle between consumer and producer is being fomented in a Nation where practically all consumers are producers and every producer is a consumer. If we follow this argument to its logical conclusion, then, while we are at work during the day we are Mr. Hyde, the producer. While we are at home eating our meal, listening to our radio, or taking a drive in our car, we are Dr. Jekyll, the consumer.

They foster the formation of pressure blocs. They know that each bloc will strive for such strength as will enable it to override or disregard the desires or rights of all other minorities. They rely on these groups to become selfish, scheming, and unprincipled, and a ready tool for those who would seize power.

These people choose to ignore the fact that no man is neither all evil nor all good, that just as management has no monopoly on evil, neither has labor a monopoly on good; that just as all officers are not devils, all enlisted men are not saints; that just as all of the rich are not happy, all of the poor are not unhappy. They try to overcome the fact that the farmer is first of all an American, that the laboring man is first of all an American, that the businessman is first of all an American—that from the greatest of us to the smallest we are first of all Americans. They ignore all of this, just as they ignore the fact that all Americans have a community of interest, because our enemies' weapon is disunity.

By disunity, deceit, strife, and confusion, these purveyors of a new way of life are right now striking at the cornerstones of our Republic.

My friends, believe me, this is a real menace. I report, in all sincerity, as your Representative in the Nation's Capital, that there is no greater threat today to the principles which we have held dear since 1776 than this insidious, calculated, and cunning spread of totalitarian ideologies.

We can stop it as surely as we have stopped every enemy who ever faced us on the field of battle. We can stop it by depriving it of its weapons.

Recognize deceit when you see it. Refuse to give support to any attempt to deprive you of one single liberty under the name of humanitarianism or benevolence.

Reaffirm your faith in unity. Refuse to lend support to any group which seeks individual gains at the expense of another's loss.

Avoid strife. We can lose the hard won fruits of victory by quarreling among ourselves, by bitterness between class or creed, by failing to practice tolerance and fair dealing in all of our relationships.

Dispel the fog of confusion. Seek the truth, and demand the truth from your public servants.

I do not preach for the static state, the status quo. I appreciate sincerely that much progress can and must be made in this great United States of America toward a greater realization of those ideals of a fuller life, a greater liberty, and the capture of happiness. But let us never forget that our system of free government, responsive only to the will of the people, has given us more freedom, more prosperity, more leisure and more happiness than any form of government devised since the dim dawn of history.

With unity of purpose, with faith and courage, with an unselfish dedication to carrying on the fight for freedom commenced 170 years ago today, nothing in the world can stop this Nation from advancing into the greatest era of peace and prosperity the world has ever seen. With the torch of liberty perpetually flaming, we can guide the peoples of the world along the path we chose to take on that fateful day in 1776.

We must—we can—we will.

Don't Let It Happen Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. MILLET HAND

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, on March 7, 1946, I took occasion to address the House of Representatives on the very serious situation with respect to the supply and distribution of stock and poultry feed. I spoke to Congress as a whole because the constant efforts that I made during the month of February were apparently unavailing to move the administration to attempt to relieve this shortage.

I had called these conditions to the attention of Congressman PACE, who is chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture especially charged with the duty of investigating this problem and making recommendations with respect to its solution. The Pace committee commenced hearings on March 4, and they heard a great deal of important testimony from all sections of the United States, and the testimony they have taken must have persuaded them of the gravity of this situation and need for relief.

I am perfectly certain that the committee is deeply concerned, but I am very much disturbed that it has apparently not been able to agree on any solution.

I am afraid that the present administration and the Department of Agriculture have so wholly concerned themselves with exporting food to a needy Europe that they have almost forgotten the present and future needs of this country. Not only will the lack of poultry and other stock feed bankrupt thousands of farmers and small businessmen, but I want to warn the House that the American people are going to be short of poultry, eggs, and milk—essential items of our diet that our people, and particularly children, should not be asked to do without.

I said, in part, in my speech of March 7:

Food for the starving must inevitably make a strong appeal to our humanitarian instincts, and no doubt the Secretary is right in planning to export a surplus; but the question is, Do we have an available surplus? It is perfectly evident to me that unless some solution is found, we, ourselves, face in the not-too-distant future a very real shortage of essential food, such as eggs, milk, and poultry. The Secretary promised that nothing would be done which would impair the nutritive diet of the American people. I want him to keep that promise. When we talk about exporting 375,000 tons of fats and oils and 1,600,000 pounds of meat, we better be sure that we, ourselves, at least have eggs to eat.

And, Mr. Chairman, I must confess that two recent occurrences have greatly disturbed me. The Secretary states, as I recollect his testimony, that experts were being sent to Japan to inquire as to their needs for wheat, and in the Washington newspapers the following day I observed a brief article indicating that for the first time since the war Japanese were eating white bread made from American flour. It is hard for me to understand why an enemy country that for centuries has lived on a fish and rice diet should now enjoy white bread when the President is asking the American people to eat dark bread. Love them that hate you—yes—but even the Christian compassion of America strains at the treatment which tends to prefer the luxury of our brutal enemies to the welfare of our own people.

So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to eat dark bread, less of it or none at all, but I am unwilling to stand by and see hundreds of hard-working farmers bankrupt, and see the children of New Jersey or any other State deprived of milk and eggs.

Since that time, instead of being helped, we have been badly hurt. It was obvious that under the recent order of the Department offering an extra price of 30 cents a bushel for corn for Government purchase only, it was impossible to buy any corn at a lesser price. I am advised that a great deal of that corn is not being earmarked for export but is being used by the Government for other purposes. This, in effect, is unfair competition on the part of the Government which virtually created its own black market and own black market prices, with the effect that the growers of poultry and livestock were much worse off than before.

On April 23, 1946, Mr. Edward C. Rubinoff, a prominent feed dealer of Vineland, N. J., wrote the Secretary of Agriculture the following letter, which in some measure expresses the desperation of the people in my district with respect to this growing shortage:

APRIL 23, 1946.

HON. CLINTON ANDERSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SECRETARY ANDERSON: We are writing to you in regard to the critical feed situation facing the 2,000 poultrymen in this important egg-producing area of South Jersey. The seriousness of the feed situation in this section is quite typical of that in other eastern deficit areas.

We have been seeking relief from your Department and other agencies in Washington since last December but without any success. A program of steps which could be taken to have feed move in normal channels, with the East securing their just portion, has been presented to you for action.

However, it appears that the food situation in Europe and Asia has been receiving more attention and action than the present feed situation in the eastern part of the United States and the possible egg and milk shortage in the metropolitan centers during the coming fall and winter.

Instead of taking steps to provide feed for these farmers, your latest action is taking feed away from these farmers. For example, we had a good quantity of corn offered to us last Friday for shipment into this area which was withdrawn on Monday because of the bonus being offered by your Department for export purposes. If any one person or agency deliberately tried to cut off feed supplies to our farmers in the Northeast, he could not do a better job than what is being done in Washington today.

While we sympathize with the needs for food in various parts of the world, we should not lose sight of the needs of American farmers who cooperated to the fullest extent in providing the necessary food during the war years to help bring about victory. Now, they are wondering as to what kind of a reward is being given to them for these all-out efforts. We also wonder.

We are led to understand that one of the motivating reasons for shipping food across, in addition to alleviating misery, is to prevent the spread of political unrest. How valid is this reason when you consider the probable unrest among our eastern farmers who are losing their livelihood and the probable unrest among the consumers depending on these farmers for their food supply? Judging from past history, the future value of our present intentions in feeding the world is highly speculative.

As feed dealers, we are being asked every day in the week by our farmers as to their future feed supply. The answer is in Washington. We would like to know whether any feed relief for the American farmer in the East is being considered in your plans. We feel quite confident that you do not wish to let these farmers down and are planning some means of relief. They want to know what these steps are now so that they can complete their plans for the future.

On behalf of our farmers, we hope to receive an early reply from you.

Respectfully yours,

EDWARD G. RUBINOFF.

The secretary of agriculture of the State of New Jersey, for whom I have high respect, wrote me on May 2, 1946, as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Trenton, May 2, 1946.

HON. T. MILLET HAND,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAND: Enclosed is a copy of a statement of the commissioners and secretaries of agriculture of the northeastern States, passed after a thorough discussion of the situation affecting the Northeast. I might add that the statement is a true picture of New Jersey conditions as well.

The feed situation is very critical, as you naturally know and appreciate. It is the hope of everyone here that everything will be done by the Federal administration, particularly the United States Department of Agriculture and Congress, to see that it will be unnecessary to reduce the numbers of poultry and dairy cattle on the farms of the Northeast, not only in the interest of the farmers, but also in the interest of the consumers of this area, who depend upon the farmers of this area for milk, dairy products, poultry, and poultry products.

Yours very truly,

W. H. ALLEN.

STATEMENT BY THE ASSOCIATION OF COMMISSIONERS AND SECRETARIES OF AGRICULTURE OF THE NORTHEASTERN STATES MEETING IN ALBANY, N. Y., APRIL 30, 1946

The present shortage of feed in Northeastern United States constitutes the gravest threat yet to the supply of fresh milk, eggs, and poultry for the millions of consumers in this area.

There is no doubt that the United States must do everything possible to help feed starving peoples of Europe and Asia. But at the same time, the health and welfare of consumers in Northeastern United States must be safeguarded through sufficient production of fresh milk, eggs, and poultry.

Northeastern farmers have been able to barely get by thus far while feed supplies were being used up at a rapid rate in the areas where they are produced. Now with the Nation's livestock at a high level, and supplies of feed steadily dwindling, it is more imperative than ever that the Northeast receive its fair share of available feed.

Recent renewed efforts to get grain moving off farms where it is produced emphasize the fact that the Northeast is not getting its proper amount of feed for cattle and poultry.

The situation has been brought about by inequitable price relationships which make it more profitable for a farmer in the Grain Belt to feed grain to livestock than to sell it as grain.

Proof of the seriousness of the situation lies in the wholesale cancellation of hatchery orders. These cancellations are proceeding at an unprecedented rate. The number of chicks booked for delivery during May and June was 55 percent less than the number booked for delivery during these months last year. There is just cause for alarm.

Northeastern feed distributors are unable to secure feed from their suppliers, many of whom have stopped booking orders and canceled earlier orders. There must, however, be no public criticism of the feed industry which has done an almost superhuman job in obtaining feeds under extremely adverse conditions.

Producers and consumers in this area will suffer unless prompt steps are taken to speed up the flow of feed into the Northeast.

Approved by Commissioner Frank H. Peet, Connecticut; Secretary Ralph C. Wilson, Delaware; Commissioner A. K. Gardner, Maine; Commissioner Frederick E. Cole, Massachusetts; Commissioner Andrew L. Felker, New Hampshire; Secretary W. H. Allen, New Jersey; Commissioner C. Chester Du Mond, New York; Secretary Miles Horst, Pennsylvania; Commissioner Stanley Judd, Vermont.

Mr. Speaker, this statement is not only the position of my State of New Jersey, but has been approved by the appropriate officials of Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, and Vermont, representing generally the Northeastern States. I am advised that the situation is just as serious in some other parts of the country.

It was for this reason that I introduced on May 2, 1946, H. R. 6280, a very short bill which I considered to be important. This bill may have helped. At any rate, a few days after its introduction, this price differential was canceled. The bill provided:

That notwithstanding any law or regulation to the contrary, it shall be lawful to sell or buy any grain for domestic consumption, or for the purpose of feeding livestock, including poultry, for the same price, and on the same terms and conditions as sales made to the Government, for export, or other purposes.

Continuous efforts were made, not only by me, but by many other Congressmen whose districts were likewise imperiled. I believe our efforts did ease the situation somewhat.

Mr. Speaker, with the altered price structure, and new seasonal supplies coming in, the peak of the emergency has temporarily passed, but not without great damage, the effects of which will still be felt in the future.

The recent pictures of countless carloads of hoarded wheat spoiling in Kansas for lack of storage, did not make our New Jersey poultrymen and farmers any happier about their experience.

It is to be hoped that the administration will have learned a lesson in 1946 and that these drastic shortages will not be permitted to happen again.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COLE] was severely critical of the proposal to pay part of the veteran's and GI terminal leave pay with bonds to mature in 5 years and he used this as an argument against the pending resolution through which the United States would further implement its participation in the Bretton Woods agreements.

I was one of the several Members of Congress who introduced terminal leave pay bills in the House and I am deeply interested in such payments for the enlisted men. My bill called for cash payments and, while I still would prefer the cash settlement, let me say it may be the far better judgment, in the light of recent action of the Congress in failing to support an adequate price-control program, to pay the veterans in bonds so that when the maturity date arrives he will have a real dollar value for his service.

At the inflationary prices existing today, and which will rise and rise unless this Congress soon acts to curb the trend, we will not be doing any veteran a favor by paying him in cash. The veterans are already suffering greatly because of inflationary conditions, and my heart goes out in deep sympathy to them as the rising prices eat up the mustering out pay and the small reserves they may have accumulated before entering service.

The veteran will not suffer as much through part payment of his terminal leave in bonds as he will through the abandonment of price controls, or as he will through failure of America to strive for world unity by faithfully fulfilling her part in the broad United Nations plan for lasting peace.

America cannot depend upon domestic trade entirely for full payment. To provide maximum employment for our returning veterans we must have our share of world commerce, and this resolution is a step in that direction. The veteran has a real stake in this matter which we are here today considering.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. EATON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a letter from a constituent.

It so happens that this gentleman, a few years ago, did me the honor to run against me as the Democratic candidate for Congress in my district. At that time he was an ardent New Dealer, supporting without reservation the entire New Deal program for remaking America.

At his request, I insert his letter opposing the British loan, and in opposition to my own position on that legislation:

ROCKAWAY, N. J., July 10, 1946.

Hon. CHARLES EATON,
House of Representatives, United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE EATON: I learn by Washington Star of yesterday that you have spoken eloquently, as always, in favor of the loan to England.

May I submit the following arguments in opposition to such a loan:

1. The Congress does not have the constitutional authority to appropriate the taxpayers' money for the purpose of loaning money to other nations.

2. There is no higher authority to which either of the parties to the loan could appeal in case either one felt that the other had failed to keep its contractual obligations.

3. By its combination of economic with governmental powers the present administration in England is following a policy which leads to totalitarianism and the suppression of the freedom of the individual. We may be obliged to decline to recognize such an administration as a valid or legitimate goverment. We certainly should not encourage the development of a form of government in England which is so inimical to the American conception of the limited and clearly defined government.

4. This country is entirely too impoverished to loan any such quantity of its manufactured products or raw materials as is represented by the $3,750,000,000 of this proposed loan. Let us eliminate some of our own poverty before we try to enrich the rest of the world.

5. Before loaning or giving so much of our wealth to England we should receive by reverse lend-lease a large portion of those colonial lands which are still held in the possession of England, and hope that our great loss of raw materials sustained during the past conflict could be replaced to some extent by the raw materials of the lands acquired from England. The problem is to find a sufficiently large area which offers some hope of yielding raw materials whose value would justify the risk of developing the area. Our methods of developing a prosperous colonial economy would certainly be very different from those of England and might well be more successful.

I believe that these arguments, even in this brief form, merit the attention of you and your colleagues in the House of Representatives, and I would be glad to have them included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES R. M. TUTTLE.

Francis J. P. Cleary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the other day my very good friend and a St. Louisan, Francis J. P. Cleary, Chief of the Office of Information's Inquiries and Distribution Service of the Department of Agriculture, retired, after 54 years of service.

For over 40 years he handled the congressional distribution of farmers' bulletins and the resulting correspondence.

During the period of his service he has supervised the distribution of more than 200,000,000 publications requested by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Congress without a single complaint. I doubt whether there are many in Congress who have not met Mr. Cleary.

His office is recognized by all as the place where prompt and reliable information relative to agricultural matters could be obtained. He was very proud of the reputation that his office has earned in handling requests from congressional offices.

Mr. Cleary's record is truly an outstanding example of success in Government work and I should like to include as a part of my remarks the following statement about him which appeared recently in the Agriculture Department Bulletin. It follows:

REMARKABLE

One of USDA's most remarkable employees is Francis J. P. Cleary, Chief of the Office of Information's Inquiries and Distribution Service. It was 1892 when he went to work in the old red-brick building, during the term of the Department's first Commissioner, Isaac Newton. His entrance salary as a messenger was $25 a month, but he had received a raise to $40 by the time J. Sterling Morton became Secretary, a year or so later.

Cleary was assigned to escort Morton around the building in a survey to discover expenses that could be cut. Just to make talk he boasted of his promotion. Morton was the wrong man to hear that boast. Not only had he been ejected from the University of Michigan for his independent student thinking—but Morton entered the Department with a hatred for bureaucracy, a passion for economy, and an aversion to women employees—all of whom he cut back to $1,200 a year or less. Cleary woke up with $25 a month once more.

But that didn't down him. Not even Morton could subdue him. He went on to become clerk, copyist, editorial clerk, assistant in charge of the document section, superintendent of distribution, assistant administrative officer, senior administrative assistant—holding some 50 positions on his way up to his present assignment. Now he has had 54 years of service and is the youngest old man in the Department, bar none.

He took his degree in law at Georgetown in 1906. He practically cut his eye teeth on the sandlot, is a good marksman, has shot his share of clay pigeons, and went in for amateur theatricals in his (chronological) youth (for he is still young). He is now enamored of golf and is much in demand as master of ceremonies. His extemporaneous speeches waft many a good dinner down the famous alimentary canal.

Today Cleary walks at such a brisk pace that few youngsters even try to overtake him on the street. During the war he was active in civilian defense. He was senior warden in his communiiy, building warden for the Department. He was elected employee member of the board reviewing efficiency ratings for 1944, after serving as alternate in 1943.

We just wanted to say a word in praise of him as he nears 70 and is about to embark on another good long stretch, which is surely ahead of him. Possibly he is champion Federal employee in terms of continuous service; if not, he's the runner-up.

Write to the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article, published as a paid advertisement in the New York Herald Tribune and later in the Williamsport (Pa.) Sun:

SOMEBODY MUST SPEAK FOR AMERICA—YOU CAN DO SOMETHING ABOUT IT HERE AND NOW—WRITE TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE INSURANCE COMPANY IN WHICH YOU HAVE A POLICY AND TO THE HEAD OF EVERY BUSINESS IN WHICH YOU HAVE YOUR MONEY INVESTED

TELL HIM TO DO SOMETHING

Tell him American business should be the champion of American liberty and freedom. Tell him it is the responsibility of business to speak out in direct answer to all the secret, slippery plans ideologists have been attempting to saddle on this Nation and its people since 1932.

Tell him to quit worrying about getting into politics. He has been dragged into politics. Tell him the way to get out of politics is to tell the truth, and all of the truth, about business. Tell him defending the Constitution and the Bill of Rights is no more getting into politics than defending the Red Cross is getting into medicine.

Tell him America is in danger of losing forever its rights to private enterprise and free enterprise. Tell him to tell the man on the street the difference between these two forms of enterprise. One man with a business is private enterprise. He owns the business and it belongs to him, whether it's Henry Ford or a corner grocery store. Free enterprise is allowing the public to buy shares in an enterprise and become part owners. If they don't like it, they can sell out next day * * * whether it be General Motors, General Foods, Westinghouse, the Pennsylvania Railroad, or the Bell Telephone system.

TELL HIM TO GET BUSY SELLING AMERICA

Tell him to be as dramatic in selling America as he has been in selling his soaps, brass, foods, or fountain pens—his automobiles or his radios.

Tell him to hire the best talent available to present facts, facts, and still more facts—and present these facts to the man on the street—out loud. Are we a downtrodden, frustrated, exploited people? Then why do peoples of every other land want to emigrate to America? Is our economic system obsolete, decrepit, broken down, and in need of replacement by a glorious totalitarian state? Then why do they come to America, asking us for gifts made by our system which they pretend to despise? Because we have the wealth their system will not create. And we have the wealth because we have the system that makes it—the free-enterprise system—the competitive profit and loss system—the system in which everyone of us can risk his savings, if he please, to build a new business and new pay rolls. Tell him to point out that there is no Ogpu or Gestapo to tell us what we may or may not do with our own savings.

LET'S LOOK AT THE RECORD

Al Smith used to say: "What are we quibbling about? Let's look at the record." If you, the man on the street, or the president of any business, want to know what the ideologists within our administration plan for all of us, it's in print. And every one of the following statements has been made by men appointed to high office who have sworn to defend the Constitution. All of these statements have been made by men in appointed positions—appointed by men the Nation has elected as custodians—not changers—of our Constitution and our Bill of Rights. Just listen to these:

"Having once captured the Government and shelved the Supreme Court, we Socialists would nationalize as many large industries as we could chew. We would do it peacefully, if possible, and otherwise, if necessary."

"The whole capitalistic shell game can sink and be damned. Tell them we've got a war on—a war to establish a workers' government."

"Ownership will become more and more divorced from any active part in the business of society. The owners will cease to be necessary."

"To take control of industry and Government, abolish the present capitalistic system, and build a workers' republic."

"Congress will surrender to the administration the power to tax * * * directing when and how the money will be spent."

"It has already been suggested that business will logically be required to disappear. This is not an overstatement for the sake of emphasis; it is literally meant."

"The Government will gradually come to own most of the production plants of the United States."

"All owners of stocks, bonds, mortgages, land, buildings, or equipment shall be required to surrender them in return for commonwealth bonds."

"People are too damned dumb to understand."

"The Government will provide the market and say what and how much is to be produced."

NOW WHAT ARE THE FACTS?—FACTS THAT WILL REFUTE CONSPIRATORS WHO OPENLY SPOUT WHAT, IN OTHER LANDS, WOULD BE TREASON?

Answer these recorded claims and plans with this simple fact: The United States of America has been a workers' government since 1776. Rail splitters have become Presidents, privates have become generals, gobs have become admirals, shoemakers have become Senators, newsboys have become governors. That is our history. Everybody starting poor in money but rich in freedom, liberty, and opportunity.

Answer the fellow travelers in Government by telling all Americans this always has been a workers' republic. It was the farmer, butcher, baker, and candlestick maker, the gunsmith, pewterer, and button maker who told Hamilton, Adams, and Jay to get the Constitution adopted and how to make it work. Workers have elected every type of official provided for under our republican form of government * * * but they've had no voice in electing appointed officials who, in appointed sinecures, want to hold onto the easy money, coming from your high taxes, and to keep their appointed power forever and ever.

Tell them that in this workers' republic no appointed official is going to shelve the Supreme Court and capture the Government. Tell them that brands of goods are for people's choices, the logical product of a democracy, and that democracy ceases when a housewife must buy what an official says is to be bought, or else.

Tell all of these conspirators against your liberties what American business has done. How it has pulled down the price of an electric bulb from $1.50 to 10 cents. How it has made the automobile the property of the man on the street, made the telephone a household convenience, put refrigeration, central heating, bathrooms, radios, hot water, and gas stoves in so many homes that these luxuries, almost unheard of in many lands, are staples in the United States of America.

WHO CREATES WEALTH IN AMERICA?

What peculiar "mint" do we have that makes us the richest people in the world, and our money the most stable? We have the mint that is American business, the goose of fable made a fact, laying golden eggs for everyone. Was it a political system that first announced a $5 minimum wage? No. It was Ford, a private enterprise. Was it the politicians who built a little iron furnace into Bethlehem Steel? Was it politicians who developed radio and put radio sets in every home? Was it politicians who brought down the price of electric refrigerators from $400 to $100? Was it politicians who built the railroads, who established steamship lines and air lines? No. It was free enterprise that planned and paid, developed, and produced.

TELL YOUR COMPANY PRESIDENTS TO TELL THEIR STORY

Tell them to dramatize, with all the arts of advertising they have used to sell goods, the most precious commodity in the entire world, the liberty and freedom that is America. Unless they do, we may well walk into slavery blindfolded, and with never another emancipation proclamation to save the day.

A GREAT MAN IS ONE WHO DOES A THING FOR THE FIRST TIME

Tell the presidents of these companies to get right down to cases and show how much of the cost of every item sold generally in stores goes somewhere, somehow, into the pockets of the American worker. Tell them to show what part of the price of every bit of merchandise goes into all kinds of taxes.

DRAMA? SO MUCH OF IT HERE THAT IT SOUNDS UNBELIEVABLE

The millions of common men (as a recent but now ex-vice president has called them) aren't so common after all. They are the most uncommon men and women in the world. They are not so stupid that the wool can be pulled over their eyes and kept there by appointed officeholders. They own the department stores, the mail-order houses, the railroads, the steel industry, the dairy industry, and the beverage industry—by free enterprise investment. They have ventured their savings in American business. They have made possible the thousands of "mints" that produce America's wealth and all her high standards of living.

SO WE ARE STUPID?

We do not know the meaning of liberty? We don't know how lovely it is to be told precisely where to work, what hours, and at what job. We don't know what fun it is to be told exactly where to live, what to eat, what to think, where to buy, and what to buy. We are so dumb about liberty that we offer voters a choice between candidates of two, three, or four parties at elections. So this is undemocratic? The right way is to have one party and to vote for that party always. We do not know the meaning of security. Security is all meals guaranteed, full-time work (and Lord be with you if you think of quitting for any cause), care and close attention from cradle to grave. American business should tell Americans we have that kind of security but we reserve it for criminals at Alcatraz, Atlanta, and Sing Sing. None of the criminals like it, they call it prison. And a prison is what that kind of security would be for all of us, walls or no walls.

YOU HAVE THE RIGHT TO HAVE YOUR SAY IN THIS COUNTRY

So tell the heads of every free enterprise in which you have an interest you want to see action. Tell them to protect their rights to remain in business and thereby protect your savings. Tell them that under the threat of all oppressions, and under the greed of all-powerful factions, there still remains the people, the real America, the real private enterprisers, the real free enterprisers, and the real wealth creators and preservers of this Nation.

TELL THEM YOU WANT IT ALL TOLD

And why shouldn't you? It is your savings that are at stake. It is your children as well as you who are in danger. Your liberty is on the auction block. You have the right to demand that men of business again take to heart that nugget of wisdom that reads, "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance."

Eternal vigilance isn't a matter of saying and doing nothing. It is getting down to cases, displaying uncommon sense, and being that precious thing—a real American.

So tell your company presidents to take over the direction of their advertising * * * to spend of their appropriations to protect the rights and interests of the owners of the business * * * the man on the street.

BUSINESS HAS STORY THAT WILL SELL AMERICANS ON AMERICA

If business fails in its duty to tell the truth now, the truth may forever remain untold. Of one thing we can be sure: the appointed officeholders above quoted will not do it. They must continue to take refuge in half truths, in distortions, and in untruths. The truth is too dangerous for them. The truth about America is too full of proof of the fact that we are a workers' Republic, too full of reasons why we should keep our Constitution and Bill of Rights and not trade them for that joker, "the new economic order."

Tell the presidents to tell all America that the worst crime against the workers a business can commit is to operate at a loss and not at a profit. Tell him to show how profitable operation is profit for all, that operation at a loss is the beginning of shut-down, and loss for all. Tell him to demonstrate how the worst crime against all Americans is Government that each year spends more than it takes in and then taxes to the point of confiscation to pay its bills as it runs into greater debt. To sacrifice fundamental arithmetic in order to keep power is repudiation, by a political party, of everything this country stands for and everything that has made it—and its people—great.

SO TELL BUSINESS TO SPEAK WHILE IT STILL HAS THE RIGHT. AFTER IT SPEAKS IT WILL HAVE CITIZENS OF OUR COUNTRY AS DEFENDERS

Tell business to speak without fear and be unafraid of the mistakes in its record, for the entire American system is nothing but a record of overcoming mistakes and attempting always to make things better, faster. This is what American business has done, but all of its mistakes were paid for by those who chose to risk their savings in business and not, as the Federal Government does it, by taxing all the people for its mistakes. The $60,000,000,000 bill for experimenting by Government between 1932 and 1940 will be paid for by the people. But the few billion dollars spent by American industry in experimenting in those same years already show results in better living, better foods, better transportation, better pay rolls, better everything.

Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely. The wide-open question to be settled now is simply this: Shall America continue to be free? That's why you should write to the presidents of the companies in which your savings are invested. Do it now.

The advertisement above was published in a recent issue of the New York Herald Tribune by Mr. E. F. Hutton, of Westbury, Long Island, N. Y. At the bottom of the advertisement Mr. Hutton made the following statement.

"This expressed viewpoint is my own responsibility; paid for by me, and is in no way connected or identified with any group, organization, or company. This advertisement is placed before the people with the hope of promoting a better understanding of our problems between capital and labor, and the further hope of preserving our competitive profit-and-loss system. 'Error of opinion may be tolerated when reason is left free to combat it.'"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, July 9, I was necessarily absent from the House while in West Virginia on official business. During that absence in the congressional district I represent roll calls were conducted on which I desire to record, for the RECORD, my stand.

Mr. Speaker, on roll call 204, I would have voted yea; on roll call 205, I desire to be counted with yeas, and on roll call 206, I register a vote of nay.

The Townsend Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I desire to include in the RECORD a letter written to the East St. Louis (Ill.) Daily Journal by the Honorable Frank Smith, attorney at law, of East St. Louis, on the subject of the Townsend plan:

To the EDITOR:

Congress is planning to adjourn sine die about the middle of July and because of the many things that need attention, Senators and Congressmen are working overtime. An election is coming on in November and they wish to do some campaigning.

From Maine to California untold millions are lifting their voices heavenward in a plea to Congress for help. The Macedonians made a plea to Saint Paul (Acts 16:9), "Come over into Macedonia and help us." This Saint Paul did. What will our Congress do?

Some millions of the aged are trying to survive on the meager amount allowed, through the social security and the State old-age pension allowance. In some States the allowance is more than in others. It ranges from $10 a month to $40, the maximum, average $18. Under Social Security when one who is covered by the act reaches 65—if he has met all the conditions—he will get from $10 a month up to $85, average is $24.50. In poorhouses, Maine to California, there are about a million old men and women. These, too, raise the Macedonian cry for help.

Under the Social Security Act any State that takes on the old-age assistance plan the Social Security Board—Washington—will advance one-half the cost. That is, if the State allows John Doe $30 a month Social Security will contribute $15 of it. But the Social Security Board makes $40 the maximum. Should a State make it more, Social Security Board will not send another penny to the State. It provides further that no State shall allow a dollar to anyone other than those in actual need (sometimes the State officials are blamed because the allowance is reduced; Social Security, however, is thus to blame).

The Illinois Legislature planned to make the maximum pension $50 or $60—State to take care of such excess. While so considering the Legislature of Minnesota passed a bill allowing those on the State pension roll $100 a year extra—divided into 12 monthly payments. The ink was hardly dry when the Social Security Board, Washington, notified the Governor: Unless the legislature repeals the $100-extra act, not another penny will we send to Minnesota.

A bill was just introduced which if passed will authorize the Social Security Board to allow $5 extra thus making the maximum $45 and if the State appropriated $5 would make the maximum $50. Any State paying less than $20 not to come within the act. And another bill has been introduced to make the maximum $60. The Social Security Board to take care of half of it. This isn't much of an increase but as a Congressman said, "When you can't get a whole loaf better take a half or what you can get."

What Congress should do is to withdraw the Townsend bill (H. R. 2229) from the Ways and Means Committee—and pass it. Of all plans before Congress to relieve distress, hunger, unemployment, and close the poorhouses, coast to coast, there is nothing to compare to the Townsend plan. From the icy lakes to the Gulf, Atlantic to the Pacific, untold millions are lifting their voices in the Macedonian plea to Congress: "Come over and help us."

Sincerely,

FRANK C. SMITH.

OF

HON. WAT ARNOLD

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I believe that all men and women who have served their country during the time of war should have made available to them, full information in regard to benefits provided for them by their Congress, and, therefore, at the end of these remarks, I am inserting a schedule of veterans' benefits as prepared by the Veterans' Administration under date of March 21, 1946.

All veterans should investigate if they have dropped their insurance in order to be informed, and be advised of any privileges or benefits to which they may be entitled under more recent legislation.

During my service in Congress I have consistently supported legislation for the benefit of veterans, and have cooperated with the service officers of various veterans' organizations in my district as well as with all veterans who have written me directly in regard to their problems. I shall continue this service for the veterans in the First Congressional District of Missouri and would call attention to the fact that I am a member of the War Claims Committee.

The Veterans' Administration offices in Missouri are as follows:

Kansas City 6, Mo., Mr. John A. Brody, manager, 1009 Wyandotte Street.

St. Louis 1, Mo., Mr. Edw. J. Wieland, manager, 707 Market Street.

Contact offices are maintained at Chillicothe, 619 Locust Street; Hannibal, Post Office Building; Kirksville, 106 South Main Street.

The schedule referred to follows:

VETERANS' BENEFITS

If you have a son, husband, relative, or friend who is a veteran save this schedule. It contains a list of Government benefits and services available.

The following is a list of benefits to which veterans are entitled, with most of the stress on veterans of World War II; some benefits are for others who served in the armed forces:

The Inflationary British Hand-out—An Additional Weapon for a Socialist Government Edging Toward Tyranny

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting the following editorial from the Wall Street Journal:

DICTATORSHIP'S TWIN

From Great Britain come the first intimations that we may be in for another demonstration that economic planning centrally administered cannot live with the freedoms basic to a democratic society; that economic planning requires that there be in the hands of the administrators authority which is not only unquestioned but unquestionable.

The socialistic government of Great Britain recently instituted bread rationing, a step which went beyond even those of the war emergency. For this it was severely criticized by some sections of the British press. Officials of the government denounced the newspaper critics and—this is important—suggested that counter measures might be both necessary and feasible.

We will not discuss here whether the British Government could or could not have avoided bread rationing. We will not discuss whether its critics were on sound ground. The important thing is that an official of the Government can hint at reprisals on its critics.

A plan requires obedience. Otherwise it is not a plan; if those who oppose or disagree cannot be made to conform, the plan cannot be carried out. Now, if one reasons in a vacuum, it can be said that one can criticize and still obey. Practically, we know that criticism which points out flaws and which questions the judgment of the planners is a serious interference. We repeat, the authority of the planner must be both unquestioned and unquestionable.

There are two main ways in which men can register their questions about a plan.

One of the ways is financial. They can withhold their financial support. In case of a government, they can refuse to lend it their savings or, in an extreme case, they can take their savings outside the authority of the government—if they are free to do so.

This difficulty is not usually hard to meet. It was very easy for the Socialist government in Britain because it had only to continue wartime controls over capital and the financial structure to prevent any flight of capital. Nevertheless, one of the first acts of this Government was to make this control more secure by nationalizing the Bank of England and at the same time to bring the private banks more securely and permanently under Government control.

The other way in which men can register their opinions of a government plan is to speak them or write them.

This control of speech and press is as difficult to achieve as financial control is easy. It can never be complete; not even in Hitler's Germany or Stalin's Russia. In a country where freedom of speech and press are traditional, it cannot—at least not in the beginning—be openly suggested. Nevertheless, wherever we have seen an economic plan centrally administered, or the attempt at such a thing, we have seen oblique attacks on the critics of the plan; the dawning realization of the planners that they require authority unquestionable.

It would be silly to suggest that tomorrow or in any near tomorrow freedom of the press will disappear in Great Britain. It would equally be idle to neglect the fact that curbs on the press have been suggested by an official of a Government which controls finance and controls, or soon will control, the production and distribution of key materials. No newspaper owner or newspaper employee can be unaware of the implications of such power.

During the last few months there has taken place among Americans of truly liberal mind a change of attitude toward Russia. Many of the sincere men and women who were loath to believe the critics of the Russian dictatorship have turned to denounce that dictatorship in terms hardly rivaled by the critics. They have seen that the Russian idea must suppress freedom, not only of its own people who never knew freedom but also the freedoms of other peoples over whom Russia can claim domination.

However, a good many of these sincere people believe that the unwholesome features of Russian policy are because of some peculiarity of the Russian people or of some peculiar quality in their rulers. They persist in believing that in some other place and under some other conditions the attempt to impose a plan will have more wholesome results.

This newspaper would like to see some evidence that these people are right. It can find none. In Germany, Italy, Russia, and Japan the attempt at planning produced dictatorship among peoples whose backgrounds and characteristics vary widely one from the other. In light of that, it seems to us that there are ample grounds for believing that the attempt to effectuate the plan and the tyranny of dictatorship are inseparable twins.

It is true that the peoples who tried planning had little tradition for self-government. The British who have that tradition may find a compromise that will allow planning in a free society. But it is a fact unpleasant to record that the omens are otherwise.

Price Increases Granted by OPA From March 1 to May 31, 1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, by way of general information for the membership I ask leave to extend my remarks and to include therein a table showing all price increases granted by OPA from March 1 to May 31, 1946.

The following colloquy took place between myself and Mr. Paul Porter, Administrator of OPA, as recorded on page 810 of the printed hearings on the third deficiency appropriation bill for 1946.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Do you think at that point you could put in a list showing all the price increases in the last 90 days by industries and commodities?

Federal Public Housing a Failure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit a letter from Hon. Joel L. Fletcher, president of Southwestern Louisiana Institute, of Lafayette, La., which is self-explanatory.

Mr. Speaker, this college is located in southwest Louisiana and serves my district as well as the entire State, and this institution is considered one of the outstanding colleges of the South. The work of this institution during peacetime, and especially their work during the war, is recognized throughout the United States, and my colleague from Louisiana [Mr. DOMENGEAUX] and I have been in constant contact with the Federal authorities for many months in an effort to obtain housing for the hundreds of veterans who have selected this college, and, while we have had promise after promise, we have received no satisfaction nor any housing for our veterans.

The letter from President Fletcher follows:

SOUTHWESTERN LOUISIANA INSTITUTE,
Lafayette, La., July 11, 1946.
Congressman HENRY LARCADE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LARCADE: I have protested so many times during recent months at the failure of the Federal Public Housing Authority to provide facilities at this college, that I would say nothing more on the subject if it were not for the great need which exists here. Southwestern has turned away hundreds of these men who left here to enter the armed forces as well as hundreds of others who left the high schools of southwest Louisiana to serve their country and who now want to take advantage of the GI bill of rights.

To date the Federal Public Housing Authority has not furnished one unit for one veteran at this college. This is a true statement in spite of the pages of reply which I have received refuting and alibiing for lack of accomplishment by that agency.

It is true that this college secured the army airport barracks from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on a directive from President Truman, but the Public Housing Authority has not spent one penny on those barracks or been of any assistance in providing units there. I have repeatedly requested them to take over these barracks and reconstruct them into family units, in which form they would be very useful. This they have consistently refused to do. Since March 1 they have been at work upon 50 units, but there is little prospect of having these ready by September 1, and I sincerely doubt that they will be ready by January 1.

Congressman LARCADE, I honestly believe that the only way you will get this housing problem solved is to do away with the Federal Public Housing Authority and turn this work over to the Army. Less than 100 miles from this college, there are many barracks and other wartime buildings, and I am confident that the Army could transfer such buildings to college campuses if the job was turned over to them. Again I wish to apologize for continuing my requests in this matter, but I feel so strongly upon the subject and I am so discouraged at the failure of Federal Public Housing Authority, that I am obliged to write you in spite of my reluctance to do so.

Very truly yours,
JOEL L. FLETCHER,
President.

The Government Still Stands

REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN PHILLIPS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to suggest a means of raising the money we voted Saturday to loan, or give, according to varying opinions, to Great Britain:

In May of this year, there were 33,900 employees of the OPA in the United States and 422 in the Territories, a total of 34,332. This figure will be particularly interesting when I tell you that it is an increase of 1,066 over the number employed the month before. It is characteristic of OPA economy theories. OPA was gradually giving up its controls and reducing its work. So, according to its own statistics, the less work OPA has to do, the more people it takes to do it.

In March, the last month for which figures are available, OPA cost the United States $8,052,033. That, Mr. Speaker, is $268,401 per day. OPA went into a cataleptic state on June 30 at midnight, a condition for which the President of the United States is responsible.

Congress passed what might be called the "pulmotor resolution"—House Joint Resolution 371—on July 1. The other body discussed it until 2 a. m. Saturday morning, the 13th, and then sent it back, after several major operations. The distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] says he expects it to come to this floor on Tuesday, the 16th. Sixteen times $268,401 equals $4,294,416.

Already, Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers of the United States, the consumers, the little people and the big people we like so much to talk about on this floor, have been saved over $4,000,000. But that is not all; along with the OPA, the disaster-inviting consumer-subsidy program also went into eclipse. If there ever was a subject to which the familiar phrase "good riddance" could be properly applied, this political subsidy program is it. It was costing the American people $1,900,000,000 a year, borrowing the money to pay the subsidies, so the people will have to pay back the loans at a time when they may be less able to put up the money than they are now. This amount of almost $2,000,000,000 represents $5,205,480 per day. Multiply that by 16 and we get $83,267,680, already saved by the Senate discussion.

Add the two savings, and we get $87,582,096. I think that is important money. Shall I give the credit for this saving to the President, who killed OPA on June 30, or shall I give it to the Senate, which has, quite properly, been giving adequate consideration to its reenactment? Perhaps credit should be divided. Anyway, the people of the United States have benefitted, and I again call to your attention the fact that the dire predictions of the Bowles propaganda machine have not come to pass. To quote a President of the United States, at the time of another crisis:

God reigns and the Government at Washington still lives.

I hope Mr. Bowles will think of this, while he is taking his well-deserved, and too-long-postponed, fishing trip. Mr. Speaker, if the Congress will only keep on discussing OPA for 486 more days, we will have enough money for the loan to Britain.

District Attorneys of California Write Congressman Against Gambling Ships Off Coast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent having been granted me so to do, I now insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter dated July 8, 1946, to me from District Attorney Cleary, of Modesto, Calif., as secretary of the District Attorneys Association of my native State of California, together with the resolution he therein referred to.

The reference in the resolution itself to the district attorney of the county of Los Angeles and to the fact that the preferred location of the gambling ship would be off the coast of California off Los Angeles County, bestirs my emphatic interest in and support of S. 2199, by Senator KNOWLAND, of California. For my home city is the great harbor and port and seacoast city of Long Beach, Los Angeles County.

Here is the base of the Fifth Fleet and the great Roosevelt Dry Dock and Terminal Island naval yard. These hundreds of thousands of men of the fleet should not have these gambling hells tucked under their very eyes. The theory of getting something for nothing never contributed to our economic stature as a Nation, nor did it in practice add to our national morale or security. Morality is the strongest armor for a nation, and the flouting of it on the waterways to our ports, under the attention of our men of the Navy, is a damnable insult to the attitude of our Nation towards decency and rectitude.

The waterways of the seas off any coast port of entry is too close to permit any floating gambling ship and floating insult to morality and forthright citizenship.

My resolution bespeaks Federal legislation in the premises. I hope we may enact it.

The letter and resolution follow:

DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF STANISLAUS COUNTY,
Modesto, Calif., July 8, 1946.
Hon. CLYDE G. DOYLE,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN DOYLE: At the request of the district attorneys of this State, I am enclosing copy of resolution passed at their annual convention relative to the possibility of Federal legislation controlling gambling boats off the shores of California.

We direct your earliest attention to this situation and will appreciate any efforts you may make to produce some satisfactory results with reference to this matter.

I am also enclosing copy of another resolution concerning H. R. 2635. This bill is of vital importance to the State of California, due to the fact many people who take their family responsibilities too lightly migrate into our State and within a comparatively short time, we find the father of the family leaving California and going to some eastern State. This places a considerable burden on California and it would be very helpful if we had a Federal law that would aid in prosecuting fathers of this character, or aid in returning them to California for prosecution.

Sincerely yours,
LESLIE A. CLEARY,
Secretary, District Attorneys' Association.

Whereas it has recently been announced that certain persons plan in the near future to circumvent the desires of the citizenry of the State of California as expressed in its statutes pertaining to gambling by anchoring a gambling ship off the coast of California; and

Whereas it appears to the district attorneys of 58 counties of this State assembled at this Thirty-sixth Convention of the District Attorneys' Association of the State of California that such an operation would directly result in a flouting of the moral standards prescribed by this State, and as expressed in our laws pertaining to gambling; and

Whereas such an operation in the opinion of the district attorneys will provide avenues for entrance into this State and into the United States for persons not legally entitled to enter therein; and

Whereas such an operation would materially interfere with the orderly process of the law of this State, particularly in those coastal counties directly affected by the proposed location of said gambling ship; and

Whereas it appears that Federal legislation enacted by the Congress of the United States, by virtue of the Federal Government's jurisdiction over matters maritime, would be of great aid to law enforcement officers of this State in prohibiting gambling operations of the type herein referred to; and

Whereas His Excellency, Earl Warren, Governor of the State of California, has in his address on the 11th day of June 1946 to the delegates to this convention assembled, called their attention to Senate bill 2199, introduced in the Senate of the United States on May 15, 1946, by United States Senator from California WILLIAM KNOWLAND, which bill has been read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which bill in substance provides against the maintenance of gambling ships on the high seas, and also the operation between such gambling ships and the shores of the United States of water taxis or tender boats; and

Whereas it has been expressed by the district attorney of the county of Los Angeles, Fred N. Howser, which county of Los Angeles, it appears from facts now within the knowledge of law enforcement officers, will be directly affected by the proposed location of the gambling ship herein referred to, that Federal legislation would be of great aid in combatting the maintenance of said gambling ships off the coast of the State of California: Be it therefore

Resolved by this convention assembled, That we heartily support such bill above referred to and urge its enactment by the Congress of the United States and any other needed legislation which would prevent such gambling operations on the high seas to the detriment of the citizens of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this association be and he is hereby authorized and directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the Honorable Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND, the author of this bill; to the Honorable Senator SHERIDAN DOWNEY, and to each Member of Congress from the State of California.

Comment on Communists and Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, more than 20 years ago I took an active part in fighting communism in the United States. It was during the 1920's that Communist schools were conducted in large city slum districts and also in the homes of "pink" intellectuals. Small children were marched around the American flag spread upon the floor, told to spit upon the flag and to repeat in unison: "I hate the American flag." Many children so taught then are now acting as leaders in the Communist movement in this country. Our Government departments are harboring Communists in key positions where they can best carry on their subversive activities. Communist leaders, taking orders directly from Moscow, have penetrated labor unions only to use the organizations to stir up strife in an effort to destroy free enterprise.

The time has come for the Government to rid itself of the Communists now in its employ. Furthermore, if labor unions are to survive, as they should for the benefit of labor, they, too, should clean their unions of the communistic leaders who now cast discredit on those who tolerate such leadership.

Under leave to extend I am inserting the opinion of those who realize the danger of communism to our safety and freedom:

COMMENT ON COMMUNISTS AND COMMUNISM

Soviet Russia being a military ally alone prevented a Communist attempt to overthrow our Government during the war.

Now, however, they are making up for lost time. Already the Nation is seething with strikes, many of them engineered by notorious Communist agitators in defiance of patriotic American union leadership. Already the comrades are spreading discontent, suspicion, and fear among our people.

Our society and Government is under attack by the disciples of Marx, Lenin, and Stalin. President Truman is a target for Communist abuse. Our hero generals, MacArthur and Patton, are smeared at Red meetings and in the Red press. The Catholic Church is denounced at a Red rally in Madison Square Garden and on an international radio hook-up. The new class-war to destroy our Republic has begun. The conspiracy to create a Soviet America is again under way.

The American people cannot afford longer to ignore this threat to their institutions and way of life. The situation calls for intelligent action.

HERE IS THE ANSWER

Is communism a threat to the American way of life?

Or, are so-called Red-baiters unduly alarmed?

Is there really an organized plot to overthrow our Government by force?

Or, do Communists intend merely to promote their aims through "democratic" means at the ballot box?

Are the Communists strong enough and smart enough to accomplish their avowed purpose—the creation of a soviet America?

Or, is the Red movement composed of a weak and woozy lot of scatterbrains talking through their hats?

In any case, is communism something which should concern the average citizen?

Strange as it may seem, loyal Americans will be found taking opposite sides on all of these questions.

Small wonder that the public is confused over the importance or nonimportance of this vital issue. Diabolically clever and heavily financed propaganda by the Communists has brought about this bewilderment. It is part of the plan to disarm all thinking citizens.

The result has been that realistic, factual warnings of official investigating committees and similar expressions of concern by reputable individuals have been ignored while communism has gone on building strength until today the peril has drawn too close for comfort or disregard.

And a host of individual patriots who have been courageous enough to sound the alarm have been smeared so badly that whatever they say now is taken by many people with a grain of salt.

Inquiries into Communist activities by the New York, California, and Massachusetts State legislatures and two investigations by committees of Congress have disclosed Communist intent and subversive action to destroy our form of government. In each instance the official investigators have issued grave warnings. But the public paid little attention.

Fifteen years ago, there was appointed a congressional committee to Investigate Communist Activities, which revealed the Red plot in all its sinister aspects. These revelations should have put the Nation on guard, but unfortunately the warnings went unheeded because a campaign of vilification and smear by the Communists and their dupes was immediately directed against the chairman, the committee, and its findings.

In recent years, Representative Martin Dies and his congressional Committee on Un-American Activities also issued revealing warnings from time to time. The Red smears became increasingly vicious. Doubt, disbelief, and confusion were planted in the public mind. The warnings, for the most part, were ignored.

Numerous other warnings by alarmed leaders received but casual mention in the press or on the radio due to the influence of the Communists or their friends, many of whom hold strategic positions in the various channels of public information. They were able to "black out" many of these warnings and confined dissemination of news about communism to playing up the weakness of the Communist Party and belittling the danger to American institutions.

It is true that during that part of World War II when Rusisa was on our side of the conflict the Communists drew in their horns and sidled along with us. They even went so far as to embrace capitalism and free enterprise—with tongue in cheek, of course.

But now all bets are off. The Communists are once more bold agitators for world revolution and for liquidation of the capitalist system. And the United States is one of their chief revolutionary objectives. Encouraged by the Communist trend in Europe, Red plotters are once again making plans for America's downfall. Communism is back in full force, stronger, more aggressive, and more confident than ever.

The Communists will have reason to be confident if the American public is permitted to remain in ignorance of the true nature of the Communist threat.

It is up to the responsible leaders of public opinion—public officials, newspaper editors, radio commentators, leaders of veteran, civic, and fraternal groups, public speakers, etc., etc., etc.—to tell and retell the sordid facts about this conspiracy against our country and our people.

Above all, they must somehow penetrate the Communist black-out and get the truth across convincingly. And they can add emphasis to their disclosures by quoting the words of warning already expressed by those who have long known the Communists and their destructive philosophy.

In the following pages are comments on Communists and communism by outstanding American public officials, investigators, leading citizens, and newspapers. Many of the warnings they sounded never reached a wide audience. Nevertheless their words should now be seriously regarded and deeply pondered.

Here, too, are statements by leading Communists and from their official documents, revealing the plans and purposes of their whole sinister plot. Out of their own mouths they convict themselves and by their own words they confirm the integrity of all those Americans who sought to expose them.

CHANNING POLLOCK.

OCTOBER 15, 1945.

J. Edgar Hoover, for more than 25 years director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, in a commencement address to the graduates of Holy Cross College on June 29, 1944, said:

"Over the years the American Communists have developed a propaganda machine and a nefarious and elaborate school system of their own * * * and even in the chameleon cloak with which they have now enshrouded themselves, the American Communists still proclaim their loyalty to Marxism, the antithesis of American democracy.

"The Communist Trojan horse has now become the Trojan snake in American life.

"They continue to pervert and complicate the solution of our perplexing domestic problems.

"That we have a growing problem of juvenile delinquency is known to all informed persons.

"The Communists also recognize this and see in it an opportunity for further infiltration.

"The mere association of the names 'American' and 'democracy' with the Communist youth movement does not make the organization either American or democratic."

Kent Hunter, Washington correspondent for International News Service, on August 16, 1945, reported:

"From the White House to Capitol Hill there is an evident groundswell of feeling that Communist infiltration into government, labor, education, and even the outer fringes of business, has reached the danger stage."

JOHN S. WOOD, Representative in Congress and chairman of the House Committee on Un-American Activities on July 14, 1945, declared:

"This Nation is bound to become the happy hunting ground for new and old subversive forces attempting to overthrow our form of government.

"The Communist movement is highly organized and strongly financed. It already is back on its old party line—revolution. Europe appears already to have turned to communism, and it looks as if American democracy faces an intensified campaign of Red propaganda."

The House Military Affairs Committee, reporting on June 29, 1945, on its investigation of the commissioning of Communists by the Army, said:

"Since 1919 communism has been everywhere at work within this country, supported and financed liberally from abroad, and if they are able to do so they will penetrate within the armed forces, on which we rely for security.

"The aim of overthrowing our Government by force and violence in order to set up a Communist state has not been visible in Communist propaganda since Germany invaded Russia.

"Now, however, we are entering on a new era in which none can foresee the turn of events.

"Groups of determined Communists here have not changed their ideas, and will continue, with or without outside aid to plot such a revolution as they think will realize the Marxist-Lenin dream and will stop at nothing to accomplish their aim."

"I consider that the Communist Party of the United States is one of the few Communist Parties to which history has given decisive tasks from the point of view of the world revolutionary movement. The revolutionary crisis has not yet reached the United States, but we already have knowledge of numerous facts which suggest that it is approaching. It is necessary that the American Communist Party should be capable of meeting the moment of crisis, fully equipped to take direction of future class wars in the United States. You must prepare for that, comrades, with all your strength and by every means. You must forge real revolutionary cadres and leaders of the proletariat who will be capable of leading the millions of American workers toward the revolutionary class wars."—(From an address of Joseph Stalin delivered to a group of American Communist leaders and published by the Communist Party of the United States under the title "Stalin's Speeches on the American Party.")

Louis F. Budenz, former editor of the revolutionary magazine Labor Age, instructor at communistic Brookwood Labor College, for 10 years a functionary of the Communist Party, and for some years president and managing editor of the Daily Worker, said, when he renounced communism to join the Catholic Church:

"Communism and Catholicism are irreconcilable. Communism, I have found, aims to establish tyranny over the human spirit; it is in unending conflict with religion and true freedom.

"The average Communist, no matter how much his desire for integrity, tends to become a puppet. He mutters phrases which he does not fully understand and he commits himself to actions of which he knows not the objective or consequences."

Lynn Perkins, in a feature written for the Hearst newspapers on September 10, 1945, declares:

"Communism—and the socialism and liberalisms which it uses as a smoke screen—talks so well of the wonderful things which it does for people. It has talked so much that liberals and progressives never think to ask for any proof. Doped with 25 years of devious propaganda, the younger generation believes in a vague sort of way that socialism and 'planning' will automatically bring about the prosperous conditions which communism has talked about * * * and which capitalism has brought about all around them, without their realizing it!

"All the Communist writings from Marx and Engels to Harold Laski and Earl Browder have not a single fact or figure to show that communism has done anything to make life more interesting, more comfortable, or more amusing.

"How fantastic it seems that the American 'Commies' could take over this country! And how fantastic it seemed, 12 years ago, that a funny little man with a toothbrush moustache could take over Europe!"

Rev. Maurice L. Bates, chairman, Textbook Committee of Kentucky Baptists, in October 1945, wrote:

"All strict followers of Marx must be militant atheists. Only such ever become members of the Communist Parties of the world. All atheists are not Communists, but all Communists must be atheists."

It is significant that the Communist Party, more than any other labor group, has been able to achieve successful united fronts with church groups on the most important issues of the day. This is not due to any compromise with religion as such, on our part. In fact, by going among the religious masses, we are for the first time able to bring our antireligious ideas to them. (From Earl Browder's book What is Communism? Browder was top leader of the Communist Party in the United States for 16 years.)

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, wrote in an article in the American Federationist, in September 1945 as follows:

"The Communist Party (of Russia) seeks domination in other countries and institutes ironclad controls making all subject to the dictates of the central authority in Moscow. Party representatives have bored their way into many institutions—even our own Government. Any party representative immediately establishes a nucleus wherever he may be sent. These facts have been most obvious in the wake of the conquering armies in Europe, but the situation described also exists in Asia and on our own continent."

Lewis Mumford, Left Wing editor and author, in his book The Condition of Man (Harcourt, 1944) writes:

"Wherever official communism penetrated, its tactics had only one aim: To seize power and hold it; and no lies, brutalities, frauds defamations or self-contradictions stood in the way of this aim.

"Espionage, punishment without open trial, secret imprisonment in remote concentration camps or equally secret death, forced labor, the suppression of free speech and rational political alternatives, the creation of an official ruling class almost as remote from the masses as the capitalists and bureaucrats they supplanted, the complete centralization of economic power—all these new attributes of communism (in Russia) helped betray its original aims."

The Bar Association of New York State through its committee on American citizenship on January 21, 1938, reported:

"There is a tendency to close our eyes to the spread among our people of malicious propaganda and to regard it as unworthy of dignified attention.

"This attitude is indulged in by many of our most respected and most patriotic citizens, who mean well, but who should know better.

"They unwittingly aid the dissemination of subversive influences by their apathetic attitude and their consequent failure to probe into the malignant growth. We refer specifically to the growth and spread of communism in our large cities, which we consider an imminent danger to the structure of our form of government.

"The labor movement in the United States, which has done so much to improve the conditions of the American worker, now is being threatened by the infiltration into labor's ranks of communistic forces of discontent.

"These forces bend their efforts not to ameliorate the conditions of the American worker within the framework of our institutions, but to destroy our American system by creating dissatisfaction, discontent, and disillusionment.

"The propaganda of communism is cleverly and subtly administered to our people, so that they are unintentionally seduced by it."

Roane Waring, former national commander of the American Legion, said in a speech at the University of Virginia:

"Whenever communistic or socialistic ideologies strike at our capitalistic system of government they are striking at the very basis of our free existence. They would reduce the free American workingman to the status of a state-controlled peon."

"Our morality is entirely subordinated to the interests of the class struggle of the proletariat. We do not believe in eternal morality, and we expose all the fables about morality."—From a pamphlet entitled "Lenin Speaks to Youth," published by the Communist Party of the United States.

Upton Close, noted author and radio commentator, said in a statement on October 1, 1945:

"Our American system is in vital danger. As free citizens of this Republic we are at the barricades. Communism and collectivism beat against us on all sides. Magazines, many newspapers, and 90 percent of radio commentators follow the Moscow line. Their success would mean slavery for you and me. The fate of this Nation could be decided for hundreds of years by the congressional elections in 1946. The Political Action Committee, headed by recognized Communists, is out to spend millions to gain control of Congress next year."

JOHN E. RANKIN, Representative in Congress from Mississippi and member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, in a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives on June 11, 1945, said:

"President Truman should take a tip from George Washington and 'put only Americans on guard.' He should not only clean out those traitors in the State Department who have been stealing secret documents for foreign governments and giving out Government secrets to Drew Pearson and Walter Winchell, but he should clean such elements out of all other branches of the Government and put a stop to the War Department commissioning of subversive individuals into the United States Army.

"Every Communist in America is dedicated to the overthrow of this Government, and yet they are being commissioned into our Army by the War Department and placed in positions where they can do the most harm, if and when it becomes necessary to exercise their sabotage proclivities in order to serve their alien masters."

Alexander Barmine, once a brigadier general in the Red Army, who broke with the Soviet regime in 1937, warns the American people, in the Reader's Digest, October 1944, of Communist plans for the United States, as follows:

"Recently the American press has talked less and less about the Communist danger. Yet that danger has never been greater than it is today. As one who worked 20 years under the Communist dictatorship in close association with the Soviet leaders, I feel it is my duty to warn the American people against this insidiously growing menace to their free institutions."

The Dies committee, more correctly the House of Representatives Special Committee on Un-American Activities, summarized its findings on the Communist Party, in part, as follows:

"It is under direct control of the Third International, which has its headquarters in Moscow.

"It seeks ultimately the overthrow of the American form of government as established by the Constitution of the United States.

"It aims at the complete confiscation of private property in the means of production, including the socialization of the land.

"It hides behind civil liberties in pursuing ends which will destroy civil liberties for all but the ruling few of the proletarian dictatorship.

"It is energetically applying the Trojan horse tactic of penetrating other organizations for the purpose of seeking to control them, or, failing that, to destroy them.

"It is unusually active in our schools, both openly and subtly insinuating its propaganda into the minds of students.

"It is boring from within the two major political parties.

"It is the enemy of all forms of religion and looks upon faith in God as an outworn superstition.

"It is boring from within labor unions on a wide scale, seeking to dominate or wreck the unions for purposes that are alien to the interests of organized wage earners.

"It deliberately provokes violence in labor disputes for the purpose of training a revolutionary group in the tactics of civil war.

"It seeks to sabotage and cripple our economy on every possible front, with a view to its profiting by the resulting economic crises.

"It alines itself with every crackpot scheme to undermine our system of free enterprise and private initiative.

"It has penetrated the Government itself, with the result that some Communists hold key positions in Federal agencies and projects.

"It aims to incite race war by its special agitation among the Negro population of this country.

"It fears to have the spotlight of publicity turned upon its real aims and methods, and will stop at nothing to discredit, if possible, those who fearlessly expose its program and activities.

"It dangles the promise of economic security before the victims of economic distress, offering them a new slavery in the name of emancipation.

"It systematically and deliberately deceives many of our people by the use of high-sounding names for organizations which profess laudable objectives, but which, underneath, are designed solely to advance the cause of communism.

"It exercises extensive influence among several millions in this country through the device known as the united front.

"It persuades thousands of careless or innocent Americans to lend their names for the propaganda purposes of the Communist Party.

"It employs numerous 'fellow travelers' who outnumber its card-holding membership, and by the use of these 'fellow travelers' extends its influence into organizations and institutions of every description.

"Finally, it is diametrically opposed to the principles of Americanism as set forth in the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence."

You cannot cure unemployment except by the overthrow of capitalism and the establishment of a Soviet government in the United States. * * * We explain to the workers, and we teach the workers that only by violence finally can a revolution be accomplished.—(From a statement by William Z. Foster, present chairman of the Communist Party of the United States, published in the Daily Worker, official organ of the Communist Party.)

Max Eastman, well-known writer and former Communist, wrote in Reader's Digest for December 1941:

"Call them (the Communists) what they are—totalitarians, agents of Stalin's power, conspirators against the democratic way of life."

William F. Russell, Ph. D., LL. D., Ed. D., dean of Teachers College, in an address at the New York department convention of the American Legion at Endicott, N. Y., August 12, 1938, declared:

"Communist leaders have steadily insisted that communism cannot live in just one country. Just as we fought to 'make the world safe for democracy,' so they are fighting to make the world safe for communism. They are fighting this fight today. Every country must become communistic, according to their idea. So they have sent out missionaries. They have supplied them well with funds. They have won converts.

"These converts have been organized into little groups called 'cells,' each acting as a unit under the orders of a superior. It is almost a military organization. They attack where there is unemployment. They stir up discontent among those oppressed, particularly among Negroes and Jews. They work their way into the unions, where they form compact blocs. They publish and distribute little papers and pamphlets. At the New York Times they passed out one called Better Times. At the Presbyterian Hospital it is called the Medical Worker. At the College of the City of New York it is called Professor, Worker Student. These are scurrilous sheets. The idea is to try to entice into their web those generous and public-spirited teachers, preachers, social workers, and reformers who know distress and want to do something about it.

"These Communists know what they are doing. They follow their orders. Particularly they would like to dominate our newspapers, our colleges, and our schools. The campaign is much alike all over the world. I have seen the same articles, almost the same pamphlets, in France and England as in the United States."

Benjamin Gitlow, former Communist leader and candidate for the vice-presidency of the United States on the Communist Party ticket, has said:

"The situation more nearly resembles insurrection than a labor strike. The distinction between loyal labor leaders and those following the Communist Party line is easy to observe. Loyal labor leaders fight for a settlement of grievances. Disloyal men who have wormed their way into the labor movement don't want settlements. They want strikes. That is the Communist Party line."

"Mass action (under Communist leadership) includes a combination of strikes and demonstrations; a combination of strikes and armed demonstrations; and, finally, the general strike conjointly with armed insurrection against the state power of the bourgeoisie." (From the Program of the Communist International, an official Red document published with the imprint of the Communist Party of the United States.)

The New York Sun, in an editorial on September 28, 1945, declared:

"For four whole years Communists in America have been suffering from a bad case of frustration. In 1939, when totalitarian Russia and Nazi Germany signed their famous pact and a capitalistic war seemed inevitable at last, the Commies hailed it as their golden opportunity and were thoroughly prepared to take advantage of it. They had wormed into control of enough key labor unions to dominate a large section of the CIO. They had operated schools for industrial sabotage and knew the surest ways of burning out a boiler or freezing a bearing. They were all set.

"But when Germany attacked Russia and the great war plants of America finally swung into action and began to produce the tools of victory in quantities that staggered belief, they dared not sprinkle sand in a single gear box nor pollute a single quart of oil with emery dust. They found that their beloved Mother Russia could not survive without the product of American capitalism, and they saw that these products were going out to her in a great flood—as a gift. So they twiddled their thumbs and burned inwardly.

"Now, however, they face a new day and a happier one. Mother Russia is safe. The war is over. And so is the humiliating honeymoon that they have spent with capitalism. They are on the loose again.

"Determined that private industry must not bridge successfully the reconversion gap, and relying on the strategic pattern of the labor unions which they dominate, they have hit upon a simple and effective plan of action designed to prevent reemployment on the one hand and bankrupt the Federal Government on the other.

"From management their inspired labor leaders are demanding 40 hours' pay for 40 hours of work and 12 hours' pay for doing nothing. Of course, if stubborn, pig-headed management refuses, it's just too bad and there wil be no steel, no rubber, no oil, no transportation—no industry. If management crosses them up and agrees, on the other hand, prices go up, new wage demands follow, inflation arrives, and the life savings of every thrifty, capitalistic-minded American are automatically wiped out.

"From Government they demand the ideal legislative program. When it is enacted under the coercive lash of the CIO's efficient Political Action Committee everything will be rosy. Every man who can't hold a job in private industry will get one from the Government at Treasury expense. Any man who gets tired of working can quit for a while and get as much as $25 a week for as long as 26 weeks. Marginal industries which cannot pay high wages to unskilled labor and survive will pay 65 cents an hour minimum or else. And there will be free, hot, school lunches; free medical care and freedom from all contaminating necessity to work.

"Since not even the American Treasury can foot these bills in a country where everyone will then be unemployed and no taxes will be coming in, VA-day will shortly arrive—but not too shortly, they hope."

Abolition of the family. Even the most radical flare up at this infamous proposal of the Communists. On what foundation is the present family, the bourgeois family, based? On capital, on private gain. The bourgeois family will vanish as a matter of course when its complement vanishes, and both will vanish with the vanishing of capital.—(From the Manifesto of the Communist Party, by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels.)

Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, in the March 1940 issue of the American Legion magazine, wrote:

"Let's stop coddling the foes of our own household.

"Why do we hesitate to deny a place on the ballot to Communists?

"Shall we continue to forget that there are institutions that are intolerable in the American sense?

"The hammer and sickle on the American ballot is a fake and a fraud. If the Communists had their way the Bill of Rights, which guarantees our democratic form of government, would give way to autocracy."

The Department of Justice, in a legal opinion in the matter of The United States v. Harry Bridges (in which the Government tried unsuccessfully to deport the CIO leader as a Communist) officially held:

"The Communist Party of the United States, a section of the so-called Third International, was founded in 1919; and after its name was changed several times finally became the Communist Party of the United States of America.

"The Third International advocated the class struggle, which was described as entering the phase of civil war in America. Illegal methods were also advocated, where necessary, to carry on its work—systematic agitation in the Army, the renouncing of patriotism, and the revolutionary overthrow of capitalism.

"The 'American section' adopted a program declaring 'The Communist Party will systematically and persistently propagate the idea of the inevitability and necessity for violent revolution and will prepare the workers for armed insurrection as the only means of overthrowing the capitalistic state.'

"The Communist Party teaches the violent overthrow of existing governments including the United States. This concept reaches back to the famous manifesto of Marx and Engels of 1848, which declares, 'The Communists openly declare that their ends can be attained only by the overthrow of all existing social conditions.'

"In the theses and statutes of the Third International (1920) this doctrine is expanded. This and other documentary evidence established that it is an organization that advises, advocates, and teaches overthrow by force and violence of the Government of the United States."

John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America and former head of the CIO, said in a published interview in New York on February 29, 1944:

"The Communists dominate the CIO today. Philip Murray is today the prisoner of the Communists in his own union. They control him through their seats on his executive committee and there isn't a blessed thing he can do about it. Sidney Hillman is just as badly off. Both of them have got to play ball with the Communists now or die.

"Communism has an antinational and basically an antieconomic quality. It does not care for history or the experience of humanity, for the freedom or the dignity of man. And the last thing on earth the American Communists are interested in is the American way of life."

America, a Catholic weekly, said editorially in July 1942:

"This review stands unalterably opposed to atheistic communism for the same reason it is opposed to atheistic nazism. Both systems are enemies alike of God and man. They are both enemies of those rights and liberties which are our own sacred American heritage. * * * We shall continue to fight against the spread of communism in the United States as we would fight against any plague."

United States Naval Intelligence, in reporting on an official investigation into Communist activities, declared:

"A major problem is not only the Communist with his philosophy of hatred, destruction, and revolt, but individuals, supposedly intelligent, occupying positions above the average in life, whose names and works carry with them a certain prestige, and who, although not subscribing to the Communist program, philosophy, and doctrines, pick certain sections of the Communist program to promote, uphold, and espouse. * * * These are the 'fringe revolutionists' too lacking in intestinal fortitude to go all the way with communism, but who stand by and urge the Communist to do his worst, and provide him with protection, sympathy, and defense while he commits the overt act they have not had the courage to commit themselves."

Herbert Hoover, the only living former President of the United States, in speaking before the Iowa Association at Long Beach, Calif., August 11, 1945, stated:

"A score of Fascist nations have shifted to communism; and half a dozen nations once liberty loving are shifting to socialism. The most recent chapter is the Socialist victory in Britain. Whatever the particular name of these European systems may be, whether it be communism, socialism, or the decoy term 'planned economy,' they are all collectivists.

"You have seen a form of colectivism in our own country. You are familiar with the prewar growth of governmental power over our own citizens.

"Have you not seen with your own eyes the flood of bureaucratic violations of liberty and the moral degeneration which comes with this collectivist process?

"We do not question the right of these other nations to decide for themselves. But equally we have a right to make our own decisions.

"There are persons who talk of the middle of the road. The middle between what? Fascism? Communism? Socialism? Thinking American people are allergic to all of them. We should have none of them.

"A million have been wounded or have died that America may be free. Those who survive look to a return to the free America they have known.

"The American way has moved men to deeds of daring, of unimaginable bravery.

"They have fought four great wars for it.

"Is it not a faith? Is it not a belief for which men die? Is freedom to be defeated by slogans, or foreign propaganda, or fifth columns?

"You and I must not be marked as the generation who surrendered the heritage of America."

The theory of communism may be summed up in one sentence: Abolish all private property.—Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, in the Manifesto of the Communist Party.

The Chicago Tribune in an editorial on May 18, 1942, said:

"Communists are cockeyed. Of course, if they weren't, they wouldn't be Communists. They are no less dangerous for being cockeyed, just as the criminally insane are no less dangerous for being insane; but today we shall dwell not upon their dangercusness, but upon their cockeyedness.

"Consider America. For long years the Communists hereabouts did their level best to destroy the American Government and the morale of American industry. Now the American Communists say American democracy and American industry are wonderful, but as soon as the war is over, if not before, the agitators will be back at the old stand seeking once more to destroy both.

"Cockeyed? We'll say they're cockeyed. They have been on all sides of every question. They have been for and against Hitler, against and for Britain, pro-New Deal, anti-New Deal, and again pro-New Deal, for totalitarianism and for liberty at the same time, pro-imperialist and anti-imperialist. They have been all over the place in an exhibition of silliness that is unequaled. And in spite of their record they continue to talk as if they alone were capable of consistent thought and as if they possessed integrity of character. They are so cockeyed they can't even see themselves in the mirror."

The revolutionary way out of the crisis begins with the fight for unemployment insurance, against wage cuts, for wage increases, for relief to the farmers through demonstrations, strikes, general strikes leading up to the seizure of power, to the destruction of capitalism by a revolutionary workers' government.—(From Election Platform of the Communist Party of the United States.)

JAMES O. EASTLAND, United States Senator from Mississippi, said in a speech before the Senate on June 19, 1944:

"We are much closer to a dictatorship by the Communist-CIO than the people of this country realize."

Most Rev. John F. Noll, D. D., of Fort Wayne, Ind., in a public statement declared:

"Why all this fear of communism since the Communist Party has never been able to build up a large membership in this country?

"The immediate danger is not principally in the Communist Party but in the Communist philosophy, which has infiltrated into the souls of numerous college professors, elementary and high-school teachers, and into the minds of untold numbers of factory and mill workers, as well as of the unemployed. Most of these may not be willing to endorse the whole program, declared and implied, of the Communist Party, but they accept enough of it to make the movement a real threat and danger to our republican form of government."

George W. Maxey, Chief Justice of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, in a speech on September 28, 1945, said:

"Americans are required to choose between the liberties won for them by their forefathers and communism, socialism, planned economy, or whatever you may call it, all of which mean slavery to political despots.

"The people who want communism and socialism shrink from accepting those labels yet foster principles which lead to them.

"The lawyers of America ought to fight them, for law cannot flourish under tyranny."

WILLIAM ALVIN PITTENGER, Representative in Congress from Minnesota, commenting, June 30, 1945, on the House Military Affairs Committee's report on its investigation of the commissioning of Communists by the Army, said:

"The report states the facts. It is not a political declaration. It is signed by Republicans and Democrats alike. The charges they make are indeed serious. The American people will do well to be on their guard. They must watch not only the Communists but a still more dangerous group of people known as fellow travelers. They are a curious bunch of odds and ends—pinks and punks, and so forth—who would disguise themselves.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty and the same eternal vigilance is going to be needed in the days to come if the people are to preserve our constitutional form of government and the Republic of the United States."

THE MENACE FROM WITHIN

(By George E. Sokolsky)

The American Communists have with rare skill been able to create an atmosphere in which they stand sacronsanct. It is, for instance, altogether within the mores of the American people to criticize the ideas, methods, actions or personalities of the Republican or Democratic Parties, but when one applies precisely the same yardsticks to the Communists, he is called a Red-baiter, anti-labor, anti-Semitic, anti-Negro, and Fascist. It is permissible to criticize the life and career of Herbert Hoover or Harry Truman, but let one so much as unearth a fact or express an opinion concerning Franklin D. Roosevelt or any member of his family or Henry Wallace and the Communist press and its allies rise in moral indignation, shouting "reactionary," "isolationist." Every country from the Argentine to the United States may be viewed with microscopic challenge, but let one so much as query the wisdom of the Stalinist autocracy in Soviet Russia and he is dividing our allies.

This is the product of one of the most brilliant public relations jobs in history. At the end of the last war, had any one dared to hiss and boo General Pershing, he would have been swatted like a roach, but when the Communists recently gathered in Madison Square Garden to indorse William O'Dwyer's candidacy for mayor of New York, booing and hissing General MacArthur for upholding American dignity in the Pacific and Japan, the protest was like a whisper in the wind. The enemy sits within our gates.

The Communists represent an alien power in our midst. They serve the purpose of that power. When that power was in alliance with Hitler, the Communists conducted an antiwar policy, called the war an imperialistic adventure, picketed the White House, called strikes in war industries, and adopted the slogan, "The Yanks are not coming."

When that power was attacked by Hitler, the American Communists changed their attitude overnight, became patriots, adopted Thomas Paine and Abraham Lincoln as patron saints, became part of the New Deal apparatus, supported a no-strike policy, elevated Franklin D. Roosevelt, whom they had called a Fascist, to equality with Lenin and Stalin and even consulted the National Association of Manufacturers.

Then Roosevelt died. The war ended. Relations between the United States and Soviet Russia at times became strained over Russian imperialism and arrogance and a difference of opinion over the rights of countries and peoples and the nature of democracy. The Russians particularly are antagonistic to our policy in Japan because, although they were in that war only 5 days, they expected the same lion's share of the spoils that they got in Germany. Although they took Manchuria and Korea and the Kurile Islands, they were unable to develop even a toehold in Japan because they were dealing with MacArthur who is tougher stuff than our generals in Europe.

So MacArthur is smeared and attacked and hissed and booed and a constant campaign is conducted in the Communist press and its allies against the President and against what they call State-Army-Navy policy. In addition, the no-strike policy is voided. The Communists kicked out Earl Browder, reconstituted itself as a political party, went revolutionary, dropped Tom Paine and Abraham Lincoln, filled its newspapers and magazines with willful and vicious anti-Americanism.

The evidence is clear and can be charted without deviation that the American Communist Party follows strictly the policy of abject obedience to a foreign power. In principle, it does not matter whether that power is friend or foe, ally or enemy.

But no country can long permit a conspiracy within its own borders to serve an alien friend or foe. No country can tolerate either friend or foe utilizing its own citizens for purposes of lessening its industrial competence or controlling its political organs. In New York and Detroit, in this year, the Communists are organized to win municipal elections which would give them an overwhelming influence in the industrial life of the Nation. The time has come for Americans to put an end to this chicanery in the interest of national existence.

The Tablet (a Catholic weekly), in its issue of September 29, 1945, said editorially:

"On one day they (the Communists) attack General MacArthur because he has taken definite steps toward peace, as opposed to vengeance which can only mean more war. The next day they are damning and denouncing the United States Army Generals in Europe because they are not liquidating all those whom the warriors at home dislike. The third day they have their sniping rifles out for anyone and everyone who protests against Soviet imperialism and the determination of Russia to keep and loot every nation it has seized, making Hitler's world claims seem puny. The fourth day they are meeting in Madison Square Garden and demanding war on Spain, with whose government we are at peace, and applauding alien propagandists who demand a class war, a religious war, a racial war, in order to fulfill the Communist ideology, namely that hate comes from war, from war comes chaos, from chaos comes despair, and from despair comes communism. This ideology can be seen in action at the five-power meeting in London where Russia insists on its right to foment revolution, to seize by might everything she desires and to laugh to scorn the Atlantic Charter and Christian idealism."

The United States Chamber of Commerce, at its twenty-third annual meeting, received the report of its committee formed to combat subversive activities which read, in part, as follows:

"Like anarchism, communisim in the United States advocates a program of violence. Unlike anarchism—which advocated the elimination of all government and of man-made laws and the substitution of a 'no-government' regime—communism has a program for the establishment of its own Soviet type of revolutionary dictatorship."

William R. Castle, former Under Secretary of State and Ambassador to Japan, on January 10, 1938, said:

"Politically, economically, and spiritually, men are groping for sanity and light. Old standards have been destroyed and still older fallacies have been revived. What is communism but a reversion to a primitive state of society long antedating the dawn of what we call civilization?"

Bishop Adna Wright Leonard, of the Methodist Church, who was killed in an airplane crash while on a tour of duty for the armed forces in World War II, made the following statement on December 15, 1938:

"These three nationalisms, communism, fascism, and nazism—in other words, the theory and practice of the totalitarian state—are the enemies of religion, of democracy, and of the rights and liberties of the people."

Homer L. Chaillaux, director, National Americanism Commission of the American Legion, declared:

"There is no thought in our mind but that the greatest need at this particular time is the enlightenment of all our people to the menace of communism, fascism, and nazism."

"In every struggle of the working class, the place of the Communists is in the very thick of the struggle, right among the other workers and toilers, training them for the fight against capitalism.

"This is the time above all to be among the armed forces, which are the capitalists' final defense against the working class. What good can a militant worker do locked up or shot as an objector?

"Should a new imperialist war break out despite all efforts of the working class to prevent it, the Communists will strive to lead the opponents of war, organized in the struggle for the transformation of the imperialist war into civil war against the instigators of war, against the bourgeoisie, for the overthrow of capitalism."—From the Daily Worker, Communist newspaper, on December 3, 1935, advising Communists to enlist in the Army or Navy in the event of war.

Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, has declared:

"It is well known that there are those who would have others believe that communism is no menace to the United States. It is precisely this doctrine that led to whatever success communism has had in our unions. * * * Just as truly as ever a foeman's army invaded another state, the Red regime has its invading army in the United States today, armed and expert with the weapons believed by the Red power to be most effective under the circumstances."

"We Communists say that there is one way to abolish the capitalist state, and that is to smash it by force. To make communism possible the workers must take hold of the state machinery of capitalism and destroy it."—From a pamphlet entitled "Why Communism?" by M. J. Olgin, late editor of the Morning Freiheit, an official newspaper (in Yiddish) of the Communist Party.

The Providence Journal, on May 27, 1945, said editorially:

"There has been developing in this country a form of so-called 'Popular Front,' spearheaded by the Political Action Committee of the CIO, which was a catch-all in the last presidential campaign of Leftists in general, collectivists, Communists, and others inclined to the philosophy of looking to the state rather than to the individual as the central driving force in life; in other words, to the Soviet idea as against the American idea.

"So greatly had the distinction been obscured that there were many people in the United States who championed and defended the CIO-PAC without seeing that they were bestowing a blessing upon an ideology-direction which was fundamentally antagonistic to the philosophy of individualism and a free economic system.

"The return of the American Communists to their status as a political party should have the desired effect of making people stand up and be counted. It should mark a boundary line between the collectivists and the believers in the American system, that boundary line which was being skillfully erased. It should help clear a confused situation."

The California Joint Fact-Finding Committee on Un-American Activities on April 16, 1945, reported:

"Plans for destruction of the institutions and democracy of the United States are being carefully laid and worked out with vicious exactitude by the Communists.

"The committee states unequivocally that a new period in Communist strategy in the United States will begin when the war is concluded.

"The Communists of America have carefully laid the groundwork and are prepared for the events that are to come. They expect social upheaval and economic disruption to follow in the wake of war.

"They believe there will be a bitter and discontented people throughout this broad country of ours; widespread unemployment, rising prices and staggering public debts.

Hundreds of thousands of war veterans will be attempting to adjust themselves to civil life. The groundwork for race riots is already laid. There will be confusion and chaos.

"In these moments in which the war effort of the United Nations must be harmonious in order to end the might of the Axis, the opportunities for the infiltration of communism throughout the world are superb, not only in the proletarian field, but also in the intellectual and cultural field, in the military field, in the fields of finance and international commerce."

Henry J. Taylor, internationally known journalist, radio commentator, and author, said in a speech before America's Town Meeting of the Air, on January 11, 1945:

"Communism is no more an early stage of democracy than a duck is an early stage of a dove. Communism is the beguiling philosophy that glorifies the state and subordinates the individual dignity of man as a creature under God. It is a collectivist philosophy—a collectivist plan—which claims that the good things of life flow from the Government.

"Is communism a threat to the American way of life? Ordinarily, it would be absurd, or a joke, for Americans would be flabbergasted over the idea of having communism or Stalinism here. Americans would protest against communism or Stalinism from 99 out of 100 housetops throughout the land.

"But what we are getting is the core of the Communist idea, namely collectivism, without the label of communism; collectivist-minded pressure groups, instead of the Communist Party; collectivist thoughts, instead of the imprint of the official Communist press; collectivist words, instead of call signals from Communist radio stations. For it is collectivism that threatens the American way of life.

"The atmosphere of political dependency, of collectivism, is fostered here even by many well-meaning people who would be horrified to realize that they are following the Communist line.

"Now, this does not mean that official Communists here are not a threat within a threat, for they are whooping it up for collectivist legislation, collectivist pressure groups, and collectivist-minded officeholders, staging purges, and giving blessings whenever they are able to do so under any party names or through any innocent-sounding organizations like the 'League of this or that for Democracy,' and utilizing various bellwethers of the party line.

"It is typical of collectivism that it calls itself liberal when it is, in fact, utterly reactionary. But stop, look, and listen when they only discuss the size of the Communist organization—always the size, the small size—but never the principles of collectivism as they are."

We know very well that capitalism cannot be abolished without the use of force. (From the Manifesto of the Communist Party of America.)

Herbert Morrison, veteran leader of the British Labor Party and Home Secretary in the Churchill Cabinet, declared in a speech in June 1943:

"The Communists still believe in revolution by violence. They still believe that bloodshed is necessary. You cannot mix our policy of government by persuasion with a party which fights in elections and prepares for violent revolution at the same time. The trouble with the Communists is that they have dual-purpose minds. They tell you one thing and mean another."

The Massachusetts Legislature Special Commission to Investigate Subversive Organizations, made the following findings in its report:

"In educational enlightenment and a penetrating understanding of the actual methods and objectives of the Communist lies the greatest protection of America against civil war. By knowledge our American people can be protected against the efforts of a diabolically clever psychology and technique by means of which Communists and their sympathizers, setting up a pseudo plea for protection of 'civil liberties,' seek to engender discontent, disbelief, and bitter class hatred; seek to substitute in America a plan of government ruthlessly barbaric and wholly alien to our ideals—a plan which sanctions torture, persecution, and liquidation of the nonconformist—all in the name of peace and democracy. The constant misuse of the term 'fascism' as synonymous only with anticommunism is significant of communistic misrepresentation and deceit. Communism is a present menace in this country."

Westbrook Pegler, in his column of July 15, 1943, wrote as follows:

"That our Communists are traitors there is no possible doubt. They are enemies of our Government and of our form of government and of the capitalistic system on which it is based. Their method is violence, riots growing into civil war, and their objective is a dictatorship of a minority of the people over the majority under the rule of a small committee or one man.

"There is proof of all this in their literature and their history and if we accept the proof, as we must if we weigh the facts honestly and without cowardice, then we should realize that they are as dangerous to the United States as the Nazis and Fascists in our midst ever were. In fact they are more dangerous because they have enjoyed the special favor of our Government for 10 years and have been helped into a position of threatening power in our sea commerce, our radio communication, our propaganda, and our bureaucracy and Government.

"In their ethics, morals, and purposes they are equivalent to the Nazis as two nickels are equal to a dime and the intense, arrogant nationalism of the Nazis does not constitute a material difference because the Nazis were trying to spread national socialism, under Hitler and from Berlin at the source, just as the Communists, working out of Moscow, worked to spread communism."

Most Rev. Richard E. Cushing, archbishop of Boston, on September 2, 1945, declared:

"It would be a brutal tragedy if totalitarianism and materialism—or the blending of these two which is atheistic communism—should take over the peace.

"We are beginning once again to detect the efforts of false friends of labor to divide workingmen from their spiritual leaders, Catholic people from their hierarchy, 'the proletariat,' as these false friends would call them, from those whom the same group would call 'the prelates.'"

Don Herold, artist and writer, in his nationally syndicated newspaper cartoon-editorial, July 23, 1945, said:

"I say to my Socialist and Communist acquaintances: 'Some kind of collectivist government might be all right if all the officials were as honest and intelligent as you are.'

"But they would surely be politicians and theorists. Some would be crooks. Some would be crackpots. All would be human. Every few years we'd want to kick some of them out.

"And that's the trouble with a totalitarian government. When you get it, you've got it for life. You can't kick it out—if you don't like it, it kicks you out."

William M. Floyd, commander of the Regular Veterans Association which up to 1942 was an organization for enlisted men of the Regular Army, on August 6, 1945, said:

"Veterans and service men and women will not accept subterfuge from any subversive movement boring from within. Records show that this undermining of our form of government is being financed by foreign agencies. Unless this world war is also to be in vain we must take action that will unmistakably put this entire seditious element out of business as well as their foreign sponsors and paymasters. Veterans can and will be the leaders in this enterprise.

"America cannot exist half democratic and half Communist or Fascist."

Frederic R. Coudert, Jr., chairman of the New York Legislature subcommittee inquiring into subversive activities in the educational system of New York City, in a radio address on May 17, 1941, said:

"We found that under the prevailing cloak of complacency subversive groups of dangerous fanatics had succeeded in infiltrating into the educational system and so exercising their corrupt influence at the very source of citizenship, to wit, in the education of our youth.

"In numbers, the Communist group appears to be an insignificant minority that could never have achieved its position if citizens had been giving sufficent attention to public affairs. Certainly the great mass of teachers appear to have no sympathy for them. The measure of their success is necessarily the measure of public apathy.

"Nothing could be more completely un-American than the doctrine and purposes of the Communist. His objective is the destruction, whether by corruption or force, of all that Americans hold dear.

"In pursuit of his purpose to destroy American freedom, the Communist knows that the truth will destroy him.

"He therefore throws every obstacle in the way of ascertainment of the truth so that he may continue his destructive work under the cover of darkness.

"A Communist will be known by his acts rather than by his words. The truth is not in him."

"It is necessary to be able to agree to any and every sacrifice, and even—if need be—to resort to all sorts of devices, maneuvers, and illegal methods, to evasion and subterfuge, in order to penetrate into the trade unions, to remain in them, and to carry on Communist work in them at all costs."—From Lenin's Left-Wing Communism.

Louis Waldman, for many years a leader of the Socialist movement and expelled as a Red from the New York Legislature after the last war, in an article for the Scripps-Howard newspapers wrote on October 27, 1944:

"It has become customary, and even fashionable, in some liberal and labor circles, to denounce any criticism of totalitarian personalities and tendencies as Red baiting. Further, the idea that such an antidemocratic organization as the numerically small Communist Party can constitute a threat is laughed at.

"No greater fraud has ever been perpetrated on the American people than that of selling them the idea that the number of Communists is so small and their influence so slight as to be insignificant.

"The American public is entitled to know the facts about the Communist holding company, and the fronts created to attain power.

"And is its influence insignificant when in the largest city in the country the Communists control nearly one-fifth of the members of the city council?

"In spite of Sidney Hillman's denials, the Communists control the American Labor Party, which polled over 400,000 votes in New York State.

"Many labor unions, national in scope, have been captured by the Communists, and they dominate a large number of locals within international unions not under their control.

"The actual number of members of the Communist Party is no criterion of their future power. When the civil war began in Spain in 1936 there were far fewer Communists there than in the United States in 1944. But in 1 year of crisis the Communists gained dominance over all the other parties in the loyalist government.

"That is not likely to happen in the United States—not yet—because our democratic traditions, our love of freedom, are too deeply rooted. But complacency has its price. The infiltration of Communists into our trade unions and into political and cultural organizations brings in its train an acceptance of a totalitarian way of thinking that is more alarming than their numerical growth. We are urged to accept as inevitable certain trends and tendencies which, in the view of many honest liberals, are a threat to our American democracy and to our fundamental values.

"These trends, accelerated by the war, create a social climate alien to democracy, in which totalitarian policies, tactics, and organizations get themselves accepted and defended. Unless they are recognized for what they are, and checked or reversed, they will come to dominate the American political scene."

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, on September 1, 1940, said editorially:

"Under the law, it seems, any group of persons—no matter how ratty their purpose—may qualify as a political party in Ohio and get a place on the official ballot, if only they can persuade enough other persons to sign a petition.

"This is part of the freedom a democracy bestows. Even Communists, self-dedicated to the task of overthrowing the Nation which guarantees them all the political privileges they have, may call themselves a 'party' and parade in decent company—provided, only, they can get the signatures.

"We heartily agree with Governor Bricker when he says that 'any organization that would tear down the structure of our Government has no right to be called a political party and to go before the people of our country on a ballot.' That it is done testifies more to American patience and tolerance than to American good sense.

"Communism has no place in Ohio. It has no place anywhere else in the United States. The Communist confesses first allegiance to a foreign power and to a political philosophy utterly alien to every tenet of the American faith.

"He should be given whatever 'rights' the law assures him. If he wants 'privileges' let him return to Moscow where he belongs. And above all, as long as he remains an unwelcome guest, turn the light into his burrows. Moles don't like the sunlight."

Communists are active in the PAC, in AFL nonpartisan committees, the Republican Party, Democratic Party, Elks, Kiwanis, and ministerial associations, and I hope some day a Communist will be active in Congress. (From a statement made by Earl Browder, president of the Communist Political Association, before the House of Representatives Campaign Expenditure Committee on September 19, 1944.)

It may be stated that Stalin is one of those who think that an economic crisis after this war is inevitable in the United States. * * * Conditions are more ripe for revolution in the United States than they were in old Russia. The American revolution, when the workers have finally seized power, will develop even more swiftly in all its phases than has the Russian revolution. The American soviet government will be organized along the broad lines of the Russian soviets. (William Z. Foster, national chairman of the Communist Party of the United States, writing in the Daily Worker (July, 1945), and in his book Toward a Soviet America.)

ALEXANDER WILEY, United States Senator from Wisconsin, in a statement issued on August 20, 1945, declared:

"The shooting war is over, but the war of ideas in America between collectivism and Americanism is heading to a new peak of fury.

"Russian communism has infiltrated into high positions in American labor, in American education and in American government—all accomplished by long-range planning, all made possible because, while Americans devoted every pulse and heartbeat to winning the war the Communists devoted every heartbeat to winning America.

"I propose that we match and surpass the Communists' offensive by a counter-offensive. On the domestic front we should:

"Reconvert to constitutional Americanism.

"Test every measure that will come up before Congress by these questions: 'Is it American? Is it constitutional?'

"Promote pro-American activities, the patriotic efforts of our citizenry.

"Ferret out and expose the anti-American subversive."

House of Representatives Special Committee to Investigate Communist Activities in the United States, Seventy-first Congress, known as the Fish committee, declared in its report:

"The Communist Party of the United States of America, section of the Communist International, is an alien party whose avowed purpose is to destroy the Government of the United States, wipe out our Constitution, our legislatures, our courts, our religions, our homes, our schools, and churches, set up a dictatorship of the proletariat, confiscate all property, and make of the United States simply another member of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, with headquarters at Moscow.

"The postulates of American communism, openly declared, are as follows:

"To arouse working-class consciousness.

"To teach that our Government is dominated and controlled by and for the capitalist class; that the workers 'produce everything and own nothing,' and the capitalists 'produce nothing and own everything.'

"To educate the masses to a common viewpoint and set them up as enemies of capitalistic society.

"To prepare them for the revolution that is to usher in the dictatorship of the proletariat.

"To expropriate all means and instrumentalities of production, and to suppress or eliminate all those who may oppose them.

"To make America a Soviet Republic."

The New York Times said editorially on June 2, 1938:

"The American Communist Party has just concluded its national convention in New York with adoption of a new party constitution affirming devotion to democracy and American principles of freedom. Apparently the Communists are proceeding on the theory that the public will not stop to inquire how support of American principles of government and society are to be reconciled with devotion to the principles of Lenin and Stalin * * *. Here the Russian Communist Party was hailed as a 'brother party' and Stalin as the great leader pointing the way to a 'soviet America.'"

J. Reuben Clark, Jr., former Ambassador to Mexico and first counselor in the first presidency of the Mormon Church, in warning the people of America on January 26, 1945, that the Communists and their coconspirators for a new American revolution will have their way unless the rest of us are awake, declared:

"A great depression will follow World War II and the Communists will stake everything to cash in—to transplant Russia to the United States.

"There will be postwar strikes and industrial tie-ups—brought about under the tutelage and direction of alien revolutionists—so the government can take over, with the revolutionists figuring to go into the driver's seat later.

"For as their sort have worked in other countries, they stop at nothing—initimidation, lawlessness, plunder, arson, and murder, which they have rechristened with the sweeter name of 'liquidation.' In other countries they have used all of these things wholesale wherever they have operated. They will do the same here, if their opportunity shall come."

Eugene Lyons, former Red sympathizer and United Press correspondent in Russia, in an article, It Was Smart To Be a Red, in the Saturday Evening Post, December 9, 1939, wrote:

"The Communist cultural periphery imposed something like an intellectual Red terror in the New York area and in Hollywood—which is an extension of New York in this respect.

"The movement to denounce, ridicule, and ostracize any critic of Moscow operated through a freemasonry of Communists and fellow travelers on newspapers and magazines, in book-publishing houses, little theater groups and the like.

"The social intellectual pressure was such that it intimidated many reviewers and columnists who were not themselves part of the Communist movement. As New York sets the country's intellectual fashions, dictates the tone of book and theatrical reviews, this influence has been national. It was powerful enough to make communism fashionable in literary and artistic circles wherever such circles exist."

The Farm Journal, in an editorial in the September 1944, issue, said:

"Red radicals have been steadily penetrating into places of power in the United States. They have rushed into controlling offices of many labor unions, notably the CIO. From behind respectable fronts they have erected propaganda organizations to befuddle and confuse the natural loyalties of the American people to American principles. Their keymen have pushed into radio and the movies. Their writers review our books and distort the meaning of our news."

Workers stop work; many of them seize arms by attacking arsenals. Many had armed themselves before as the struggles sharpened. Street fights became frequent. Under the leadership of the Communist Party, the workers organize revolutionary committees to be in command of the uprising. There are battles in the principal cities. Barricades are built and defended. The workers' fighting has a decisive influence with the soldiers, the workers, and the marines.

The movement among the soldiers and marines spreads. Capitalism is losing its strongest weapon—the army. The police as a rule continue fighting, but they are soon silenced and made to flee by the united revolutionary forces of workers and soldiers. The revolution is victorious.

Armed workers and soldiers and marines seize the principal government offices, invade the residence of the President and his Cabinet members, arrest them, declare the old regime abolished, establish their own power, the power of the workers and farmers. (From M. J. Olgin, Communist Party leader and editor of the Morning Freiheit, describing the Communist plan for an American revolution in his pamphlet entitled Why Communism?)

Lewis G. Hines, national legislative representative of the American Federation of Labor, said in a statement issued on October 4, 1945:

"Communism is a social philosophy dedicated to the overthrow of our American institutions and our American way of life. A Communist cannot be a good union man because while he would in all outward appearances carry out the principles of the trade union movement, he would be prepared at any moment to destroy the trade union movement in the furtherance of the program of communism, and this goes for all of our American institutions, including the church, the school, or anything that would interfere with the final consummation of the Communist program.

"The time is here when every loyal American should be keenly interested in what the Communists are doing and the manner in which they are doing it."

Lenin looked upon trade unions as the elementary units of working class organization, as the place where the masses are trained in organization, in collective management, and in communism. (From a booklet entitled "Lenin—the Great Strategist of the Class War" by A. Lozovsky (American edition translated by Alexander Bittelman, a top leader in the Communist Party of the United States). Lozovsky is now Assistant Commissar for Foreign Affairs under V. Molotov).

The Washington Times-Herald, in the words of its editor, Frank C. Waldrop, said on February 26, 1943:

"The whole of Communist doctrine in the United States stands in evidence that the Communists want to destroy our form of government and our way of life. They are dedicated to that purpose, and to achieve it neither lying nor false witness are embarrassments to them. They have used both before. And will again. All this flag-waving of recent date will disappear the instant their party line dips into some new rat hole of their design. Nobody can be a Communist and a good citizen."

Franklin D. Roosevelt, who recognized and maintained cordial relations with Communist Russia, in a Jackson Day speech in 1941, during the Stalin-Hitler honeymoon, declared:

"We have seen how the workers of France were betrayed by their so-called champions, the Communists. For no matter what Communist lips have to say their actions have proved that in their hearts they care nothing for the real rights of labor."

The Washington News said editorially on October 23, 1944:

"Most of us are annoyed rather than impressed by what we know of Communists in this country. We accept the knowledge that they are busy, but we do not credit the authenticity of the danger.

"How many Communists would be required to seize control of the American Government? Not many, compared with the total population. We had a touch of that with prohibition. There weren't many Anti-Saloon Leaguers yet, through strategic placement of forces and by measured application of pressure at vital points, that organization dominated the two major parties for years.

"At the outbreak of the Russian revolution there were only about 200,000 Bolsheviks among 178,000,000 people. But they were in the spots that counted. The Communist technique is to worm, to burrow, to seize strategic places.

"There are not so many points of control in our political and economic system. Already the Communists have secured some of them. They have burrowed into labor unions. They have taken over the American Labor Party in New York. They are strong in the CIO Political Action Committee. They occupy many positions of importance in the administration at Washington.

"Many who know all that do not as yet give full credence to the extent to which the Communists have eaten into the New Deal.

"Nevertheless, the danger does exist. It is real. But Americans do not scare easily. It won't be fright, but a sober acceptance of the truth, that will cause a realistic estimate by the masses of the people of the Communist danger. The truth of it has implications so foreign to American concepts that even a wholly calm and sober appraisal of the danger makes it hard to believe.

"We Americans cannot be easily fooled—as Hitler's people were—by the monstrous lie. Our danger is that we cannot believe a monstrous truth."

Msgr. Fulton J. Sheen, well-known Catholic radio speaker, author, and educator, in his book Freedom under God writes:

"Which of the three offers the greatest danger to America? No clear answer can be given because they operate differently. Nazism and fascism attack from without, but communism attacks from within; nazism and fascism rob you by breaking down your front door. Communism robs you after it has been your house guest for a week end. As far as internal dangers are concerned, there is no doubt communism is the most dangerous. Their tactics are more clever. They use nonrevolutionary language to attain revolutionary ends."

EDWARD EUGENE COX, Representative in Congress, told the House on October 18, 1945:

"Communism is rampant in this Nation at this very hour. We let an alien minority come in and practically take over various bureaus of our Government and sections of our press.

"While Russia began to plot how she might extend her domain and grab country after country to subjugate and bring under her rule, communistic unions in this Nation began to stir up industrial strife and strikes."

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, Representative in Congress from Connecticut, on her return from a tour of Europe immediately following the Nazi surrender, declared:

"We believe in a free press, free speech, and free worship. The Communists, wherever you find them in America, Mexico, China, or Europe, believe that the press should be precensored and controlled, that men should refrain from criticizing their leaders under pain of death, and that any religion not subject to state control should be liquidated. In short, we and the Communists are exactly 180° apart on our most fundamental political concepts. Moreover, the very words 'right,' 'good,' and 'just' mean exactly what Stalin says they mean—but only on Monday morning. For on Tuesday morning he may change his mind. Truth to a Communist and Moscow leader is never an absolute. Truth is exactly what suits the Communist leaders' political policy or purposes, or even personal whims, at any given moment."

There are 12,000,000 Negroes in the United States; about 9,500,000 live in the South. There is a stretch of land runing from the Eastern Shore of Maryland down into Texas through 12 States and embracing about 397 counties, in which the Negroes form the majority of the population. This is the homeland of the Negroes.

The governments and armed forces of the white ruling class must be removed from the "black belt," which by right belongs to the Negroes, and must be organized as a distinct political unit. The Negro majority must have full governmental control. It is where today they have begun to battle. The land should be divided among Negro farmers, croppers, and tenants.

Full economic, political, and social equality should be guaranteed for Negroes in every section of the country. We therefore say to the Negro people, "Violate the Jim Crow rules. The Communist Party is the only party in America that has actually introduced Negro equality. Freedom must be fought for—and this fight cannot wait. It is literally a life-and-death struggle—this means civil war." (From the Communist propaganda booklet, The Negroes in a Soviet America, by James W. Ford and James S. Allen.)

Isaac Don Levine, author, columnist, and critic, on February 11, 1938, wrote:

"Communism in America or in Great Britain, for example, parades as an independent political movement indigenous to the country or its operation. The truth is that every Communist Party abroad is a branch of the Soviet Government of Russia and functions as an auxiliary of the Stalinist state."

New York State Legislature subcommittee investigating Communist activities in the public school system of the city of New York (popularly known as the Rapp-Coudert committee), 1942, made the following findings:

"Communism is not just another form of radicalism. It is the Russian form of totalitarianism, which appoints itself the champion of a class, the proletariat. This distinguishes it from the German form, from which it does not basically differ in other respects, German totalitarianism being the self-appointed champion of a racist or nationalist group. Communism, like fascism, teaches that there is no objective truth or morality: that is true or good which serves the desired end. Under Communist dialectics, evil is that which is non-Communist, hence, Fascist; that which is non-Communist is Fascist, hence evil."

ATHEISTIC COMMUNISM

(From an encyclical by Pope Pius XI)

Aware of the universal desire for peace, the leaders of communism pretend to be the most zealous promoters and propagandists in the movement for world amity. Yet at the same time they stir up a class warfare which causes rivers of blood to flow, and, realizing that their system offers no internal guaranty of peace, they have recourse to unlimited armaments. Under various names which do not suggest communism, they establish organizations and periodicals with the sole purpose of carrying their ideas into quarters otherwise inaccessible. They try perfidiously to worm their way even into professedly Catholic and religious organizations.

Again, without receding an inch from their subversive principles, they invite Catholics to collaborate with them in the realm of so-called humanitarianism and charity; and at times even make proposals that are in perfect harmony with the Christian spirit and the doctrine of the church. Elsewhere they carry their hypocrisy so far as to encourage the belief that communism, in countries where faith and culture are more strongly entrenched, will assume another and much milder form.

No one who would save Christian civilization may collaborate with it in any undertaking whatsoever. Those who permit themselves to be deceived into lending their aid towards the triumph of communism in their own country will be the first to fall victims of their error.

Ninety Percent of People of United States Need OPA—AFL Paper Comments on Front Page

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent having been granted me, I insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following text, appearing on the front page of the Labor News, the official publication of the Central Labor Council, AFL, at my home city of Long Beach, Calif., on July 12, 1946:

ONLY TOP 10 PERCENT GET GRAVY—90 PERCENT OF PEOPLE NEED THE OPA

Ninety percent of the American people will take it on the chin if Congress seriously cripples OPA and prices skyrocket.

This flat statement was confirmed this week by an official Government report, which knocked out the lie that American workers have built up huge bank accounts.

Forty percent of the people have practically no savings, the report showed, while the top 10 percent of the people have liquid assets averaging $10,500. Those outside the top 10 percent class include 20 percent of the people who have assets averaging $2,350, 30 percent of them who have assets averaging $700, and the bottom 40 percent who have assets averaging only $40.

The report was made by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture and was issued by the United States Federal Reserve System. It was based on a survey of 3,000 carefully selected and weighted spending units, consisting of all persons living in the same dwelling and belonging to the same family who pool their incomes to meet their major expenses.

The report said that the American people had $130,000,000,000 in currency, bank deposits, and Government securities at the end of 1945—excluding amounts held by trust funds. The report did not deal with currency holdings because of reluctance of those interviewed to disclose amounts. However, said the Federal Reserve System, "it appears that adequate results were obtained by the survey."

Startling figures were contained in the report on the spread between the very rich and the very poor:

Those in the top 20-percent bracket had 45 percent of the money income, accounted for 82 percent of the saving, and held 77 percent of the liquid assets—savings deposits, demand deposits, and United States Government bonds.

Of money income, those in the top 10-percent bracket had 29 percent and those in the bottom 50-percent bracket had only 22 percent.

Of liquid assets, those in the top 10 percent had 60 percent and those in the bottom 50 percent had only 3 percent.

Yet still there are some who deny that a continuance of OPA is needed.

DO WE NEED RENT CONTROL?

Many conflicting answers to this question may be obtained in Long Beach, the answers depending to a large degree on whether the person asked is a renter or a landlord.

Stories of notices of exorbitant rent increases can be heard on all sides. Not all are true, and it is difficult to believe many fantastic rumors that are flying around so prevalent.

But once in a while concrete evidence of arbitrary rent increase is submitted. The following is a case in point, and photostatic copies of the July rent receipt and an accompanying notice are on file at the Labor News office.

Dated July 1, the receipt for $28 for rent from July 1 to August 1 is acknowledged and signed by the owner. The notice of increase reads as follows:

JULY 1, 1946.

Mr. and Mrs. RUST,
Apartment 10, — Pine Avenue,
Long Beach, Calif.:

This is to notify you your rent for apartment No. 10 will be $100 per month beginning August 1, 1946, plus your electric bill and plus $5 deposit to cover same, or you may sign with Edison Co. for your electric if you prefer.

OWNER AND MANAGER.

This one instance should prove beyond question that while such cases are not the rule, there are among local landlords a certain percentage of greedy persons who, if not curbed, demand more than the traffic will bear.

While the city council is to be commended for its speedy action in correcting a possible evil, we believe it should have conformed with the 15-percent limit put into effect by many other surrounding cities and the county government.

THE EXPERTS SAY IF OPA IS MURDERED—

Chester Bowles, Economic Stabilization Director:

"With a good price-control bill, free of dangerous compromise and corner-cutting, we can maintain relatively stable prices and rents during the coming months. We can buckle down as a united Nation to the tremendous task of stepping up civilian production to levels far above the peacetime record. * * *

"But with a weakened price-control bill, hampered by compromising amendments or without adequate appropriations or subsidy funds, the cost of living is bound to move upward at an increasing tempo. * * * There is no question that tens of millions of people would suffer needlessly—businessmen as well as farmers, white-collar workers, and factory workers."

Lewis Schwellenbach, Secretary of Labor: "Renewal of the Nation's safeguards against inflation will enable us to go forward to levels of production which will help assure real long-range prosperity for all groups.

"Without these safeguards, I fear that industry may move into a new cycle of wage demands and work stoppages which will do irreparable harm to our reconversion efforts."
